Atherton and J. A. Russell shewed cause.—It is admitted that there was not sufficient evidence to support the first and second counts, which were framed on the common law liability, and the only question will be, whether the third and fourth counts are good. The argument is confined to the arrest of judgment, as that was the only point on which the Court decided. The third and fourth counts are framed on the 59 Geo. 3, cap. xxii. s. 4; but it is urged on the other side that that Act being repealed by the 14 & 15 Vict. cap. x. the counts are now bad, and that judgment must be arrested thereon. The only effect of the repeal is, that the form of charging the offence is changed, the liability to repair the road remains the same. The form of the indictment being different to that now required, does not prevent the Court giving judgment upon it, the mode of procedure remains the same. (R. v. Mawgan, 8 A. & E. 496; Surtees v. Ellison, 9 B. & C. 750; Hitchcock v. Way, 6 A. & E. 943; Moon v. Durden, 2 Ex. 22; R. v. M'Kenzie, Rus. & Ry. 429.)

Knowles, in support of the rule, elected to abandon that part of the rule that related to the new trial, and was not called upon to argue the point, as to arresting the judgment on the third and fourth counts.

Lord CAMPBELL, C.J.—I am of opinion that judgment must be arrested upon these counts. It is admitted that they would be bad but for the repealed statute, and that judgment could not be pronounced upon them. The prosecutor must be supposed to be asking the Court now to pronounce judgment upon them, and that we are called upon to do something not yet done. The general rule is, that a repealed statute cannot be acted upon after it is repealed, but all that was done under it before the repeal remains valid. This Court acted upon that principle in Rex v. Mawgan, which cannot be distinguished from the present case. It is said that in that case, the Court was called upon to take a step in the nature of procedure, and that the substance of the offence was affected, but that here the form only of charging the offence and not the substance is affected by the repeal. It is impossible to make that distinction, and the effect of the repeal must be the same in both cases. Indeed, the mode of prosecuting the indictment is a procedure. So that as the law now exists, these counts are bad, and we cannot pronounce judgment upon them. We are not giving a retrospective operation to the statute, but giving effect to it only from the time it passed.

COLERIDGE, J.—It was stated two or three times [illegible] wrongly conducted, and the repealed statute has not specially saved bygone transactions. What has been perfected under the statute is not to be disturbed, but if we want the assistance of an Act of Parliament at any particular time, the Act must then be in operation. This was expressed by Lord Tenterden, C. J. in Surtees v. Ellison. "It has long been established that when an Act of Parliament is repealed, it must be considered (except as to transactions past and closed), as if it had never existed. That is the general rule, and we must not destroy that by indulging in conjectures as to the intention of the Legislature." R. v. McKenzie is to the same effect.

ERLE, J.—The rule of law gives the meaning to the repeal of a statute, as to further operation, and says, that it shall be as if the Act repealed never existed except as to bygone transactions. To act upon it after its repeal would be to contravene the meaning of the word repeal. As to giving judgment on the substance, and disregarding the form of the charge, that ground fails, because the liability was created by the 3rd section of the repealed statute; and if the form of the indictment had been expressly enacted therein, it would have been argued that the ground of the charge now failed.

BARNES v. MARSHALL.

County Court—Prohibition—Cause of action.

The plaintiff, by a written contract, undertook to carry for defendant, by canal to London, timber lying in a field a little distance from the plaintiff's wharf. When the defendant's horses were on the spot the timber was hauled by them to the plaintiff's wharf, at other times the plaintiff provided a team for hauling the timber to the wharf, and made an extra charge to that for the carriage to London. The plaintiff sued out a plaint in S. County Court: the place of delivery of the timber was not within its district, neither did the defendant dwell within it:

Held, that there was no distinct cause of action in respect of the hauling the timber to the wharf; and that the cause of action arising only on the delivery of the timber in London, the case was not within the jurisdiction of the S. County Court.

This was a rule nisi for a prohibition to the judge of the County Court of Swindon to restrain him from proceeding in a certain plaint, whereby the plaintiff claimed to recover from the defendant 50*l.* for carrying timber from Swindon to London by canal.

It appeared that the plaintiff was a carrier by canal, having a wharf at Swindon, and that the defendant resided in Surrey; that the timber was lying in field a short distance from the wharf, and w... removed to the wharf at intervals, sometimes by the defendant's horses, when they happened to be on the spot, and at other times the plaintiff would find a team, and make an additional charge for so doing beyond the rate (stipulated for by written contract) at which he had engaged to carry the timber to London.

The plaint shewed on its face that there were two items for hauling timber to the wharf in the amount sought to be recovered.

Hodges shewed cause.—The cause of action in this plaint arose within the district of the Swindon County Court, and consequently the summons might issue from it under sec. 60 of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. The plaintiff was entitled to claim the amount of the carriage as soon as the timber was delivered to him to be carried. (Pickford v. The Grand Junction Railway Company, 8 M. & W. 372; Wyld v. Pickford, 8 M. & W. 443.) [By the COURT.—But the plaintiff was not entitled to sue for the carriage before the goods were conveyed.] Secondly, as to the two items for hauling timber to the wharf, there was a distinct contract, and the cause of action in respect of them arose clearly in the Swindon district. (Harwood v. Lester, 3 B. & P. 617.)

Bovill, in support of the rule.—The words "cause of action" in sec. 60 mean the whole cause of action. (Buckley v. Hann, 5 Ex. 43; Wilde v. Sheridan, 19 Law T. 126; Grimbley v. Aykroyd, 1 Ex. 479.) As to there being a distinct cause of action in respect of the two items, that is not so, for it is denied that there was any distinct contract.

ERLE, J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be made absolute. As to the part of the cause of action for carrying the timber to London from the wharf at Swindon, the plaintiff clearly has no demand for which he can sue until he has carried the timber to its destination. Then, as to the two items for hauling the timber to the wharf, they do not constitute a distinct cause of action; for if the [illegible] of action as to the charge for carrying the timber to London arises where the delivery was. It is a very different proposition to say that the plaintiff need not have taken the timber until he had received the carriage. Then, as to the two items for hauling, it is not made out that there was a distinct contract in respect of them. It never could have been intended that the plaintiff should be paid for the work without conveying and delivering the timber in London.

Rule absolute.

BISHOP, Surviving Executor, &c. v. CURTIS.

Conviction—Property of felon passing to the Crown—Bequest—Chose in action.

A testator bequeathed a promissory note to C. not to be sued upon or made available until he became of age. But before then C. was convicted of felony:

Held, that C. did not acquire any legal interest in the note so as to enable him to sue upon it, and that the Crown, by the conviction, only took C.'s equitable interest in the note, and that the conviction was no defence to an action by the trustees upon it, as they were legally entitled to it, although they would only be trustees of the proceeds for the Crown.

Assumpsit by the surviving executor of E. Curtis, deceased, upon a promissory note for 1,000*l.* made by the defendant (the son of the testator) payable to the said E. Curtis on demand.

Plea.—That the said E. Curtis, by his will, bequeathed to Charles Curtis the said promissory note not to be demanded or made available until the said Charles Curtis became twenty-one, &c. That the executors assented to the said bequest of the said note, whereby the said C. Curtis then became entitled to the said note and the money due thereon. The plea then averred a conviction of C. Curtis at the Central Criminal Court for stealing in the dwelling-house of E. Curtis, his master and employer, money and a bank-note; by reason of which said felony, and by force of the said judgment, the said C. Curtis forfeited to our Lady the Queen the said promissory note, and the money due thereon, and all interest therein, and causes of action in respect thereof.

The plaintiff replied to this plea, and the defendant demurred to the replication; but as the plaintiff's counsel abandoned the replication and objected to the plea, it is unnecessary to state the pleadings more fully.

Maxwell, in support of the plea.—1. The Promissory note was vested by the bequest in Charles Curtis by the 1 Vict. c. 26, s. 3 (the Wills Act), which enables a testator to bequeath all personal estate which he may be entitled to, either at law or in equity, and which, if not so bequeathed, would devolve upon his executor. [Lord CAMPBELL, C.J.—The Wills Act does not affect the nature of the personalty to pass by will.] By sec. 1, personal estate is defined to include choses in action; and on the assent of the executors to the bequest, C. Curtis was entitled to sue upon the note. 2. This note passed to the Crown on the conviction of C. Curtis for felony, for the Crown, by virtue of its prerogative, takes every species of right belonging to the felon. (Bullock v. Dodds, 2 B. & Ald. 258; Hawk. P. C. b. 2, c. 49, s. 9; Bracton, lib. 3, c. 14, s. 12.)

Lord CAMPBELL, C.J.—I think this plea is clearly bad. The first question is, whether the legal interest in this promissory note vested in Charles Curtis, and for that proposition the Wills Act was relied on. It was admitted that before that Act such a bequest would not have vested the legal interest in him, and it is clear to me that the Wills Act had no such operation as to a bequest of personal property, and that it only affected the mode by which such a bequest was to be carried into operation; in other words, the mode in which a will as to personalty might be made. As to real estate, a change was introduced as to what might be devised, but there is nothing to indicate any intention to enable a testator to give to a legatee a right to sue in respect of a chose in action. Before the conviction, then, the legal interest in this promissory note was vested in the executors, and not in Charles Curtis, and the conviction does not take the legal interest out of the executors and vest it in the Crown. The executors became thereby trustees for the Crown as to the interest which Charles Curtis had; but, as he had not the legal interest, the conviction did not vest the legal interest in the Crown, though the executors, when they recover the money, will be trustees of it on behalf of the Crown.

COLERIDGE, J.—The Wills Act does not change the equitable interest under this bequest into a legal interest. Supposing Charles Curtis to have sued upon this note, he must have done so in the name of the executors.

MARDELL v. THELLUSSON and OTHERS, Executors.

Set-off—Mutual debts—Executor.

In an action brought against an executor for a debt which became due during the lifetime of the testator, the defendant may set off a debt due to him as executor for money had and received by the plaintiff since the testator's death.

Assumpsit against the executors of Wm. Theobalds, for work and labour and money paid in the lifetime of the testator, and on an account stated with the executors.

The defendants pleaded a set-off of a debt due to them as executors for money had and received by the plaintiff since the death of the testator, and on an account stated with the executors. A verdict having been found for the defendants upon that plea, a rule was afterwards obtained for judgment non obstante veredicto.

Saturday, May 22.—Channell, Serjt. and C. Wood shewed cause. The plea is good. The plaintiff sues the defendants as executors; and they may therefore set off a debt due from him to them in that capacity. If the defendant was suing for money had and received since the testator's death, the plaintiff certainly could not set-off a debt due to him from the testator, because in that case the defendant would be suing in his own right; and if the creditor were allowed to make the set off it would interfere with the distribution of the assets by the executor. The same reason does not apply here. (They referred to Williams's Executors, 1333; Shipman v. Thompson, Willes, 103; Hutchinson v. Sturges, ib. 264; Schofield v. Corbett, 6 Nev. & Man. 527; Blakesley v. Smallwood, 8 Q.B. 538.)

Ogle, contra.—The right of setting off mutual debts depends wholly upon the statute 2 Geo. 2, c. 22, and this is not a mutual debt. The defendant shews that it is not, by admitting that if he were suing for money had and received since the testator's death, the plaintiff could not set off the debt due from the testator. Cur. adv. vult.

JUDGMENT.

Lord CAMPBELL, C.J.—Upon a rule for judgment non obstante veredicto, the question is raised whether a debt due to the defendant as executor for money had and received after the death of the testator can be set off against a debt due from the defendant as executor, having become due from the testator before his death? The statute 2 Geo. 2, c. 22, gives the right of set-off where there are mutual debts between the plaintiff and defendant. The debts above mentioned are comprised in these words, "they being mutual and due in the same right between the plaintiff and the defendant." Although the thirteenth clause, authorising, in case of a suit by or against an executor, a set-off of the debt due from the testator, does not apply, we think that that clause was intended to restrict the operation of that which preceded it. This construction was adopted in Blakesley v. Smallwood, executor, in 8 Q. B. 538, where the set-off of a debt from the plaintiff to the testator was allowed against a count on an account stated by the executor with the plaintiff. Against this view the plaintiff contended that such a set-off had been held illegal in Shipman v. Thompson, Willes, 103, and the cases referred to in the notes to that case. But, upon examination, the authorities do not appear to support the position contended for. In Shipman v. Thompson the plaintiff sued for money due to the testator received by the defendant after his death, and the defendant attempted to set off a debt from the testator before his death, so that the question appears the same, the parties being reversed. But the plaintiff in that case sued in his own right, and not as executor. This he had the option of doing in respect of money received after the death; and as he was suing in his own right, a debt due from the testator was not a mutual debt within either clause of the statute. In respect of such a debt, an executor may sue in either capacity, and by so suing in his own right, and so preventing a set-off, he prevents the creditors from interfering with his distribution of assets; while, on the other hand, if the party sued as executor for a debt due before the death, is allowed to deal with the debt accruing after the death as due to him as executor, the same mischief is avoided. The plaintiff, while wrongfully withholding assets in his hands ought not to be allowed to take from the assets a further amount in payment of his debt, and force the executor to the risk and waste of another action for the assets so wrongfully withheld, and so he may set them off in the first action. Therefore the rule will be discharged. Rule discharged.

ERRATUM.—In the judgment in Howes v. Barber, ante, p. 201, col. 2, for the sentence beginning "Again, if an undefended action," read the following: "Again, if an unfounded action is brought, and the evidence of the party improperly sued is necessary, he is not indemnified unless his own expenses as a witness are allowed."

COUNTY COURT APPEAL.

(Before MAULE and CRESSWELL, JJ.)

Tuesday, June 22.

TEMPLEMAN, App.; HAYDON, Resp.

County Court—Negligent driving—Running down—Duty of judge.

The defendant driving his cart down a hill, the horse, which was usually quiet, suddenly commenced kicking, and proceeded at a furious pace down the hill, the shafts broke, and the horse and cart came into collision with the plaintiff's gig, and injured it. The plaintiff brought his plaint in the County Court, and the judge, being of opinion that the breaking of the shafts shewed a defect in the cart, which raised a presumption of negligence in the owner, gave judgment for the plaintiff:

Held, on appeal, that the decision was right.

In an action for negligent driving, the evidence for the plaintiff did not establish that charge, but it appeared by evidence given for the defendant that the shafts of defendant's cart broke, and a collision between the vehicles of the plaintiff and defendant immediately took place:

Held, that the judge was not limited to the consideration of the plaintiff's evidence alone, having respect to the nature of the action, but might look at the whole evidence of both sides before him, and give judgment upon that.

This was an appeal from the County Court of Somersetshire. The action, which was tried between the above parties in the above court on the 28th of April last, when a verdict was returned in favour of the plaintiff for 16*l.* 1s. 10d. The following is a copy of the claim:—"This action is brought to recover the sum of 40*l.* damages done to a horse and gig, the property of the plaintiff, on the 6th of December, 1848, by reason of the negligent driving of a horse and cart, the property of the defendant, whereby the same came into collision with the plaintiff's horse and gig, in the parish of Crewkerne, in the county of Somerset." The plaintiff proved that on the 6th of December, 1848, he was driving in his gig from Crewkerne to West Chinnock, and had come to a place called Red-gate, having just passed a lane on his left hand, immediately beyond which, on the same side of the road, was a large heap of stones, against the bank. Facing the plaintiff, was a hill called "Broad-shard-hill," descending which, and about 100 yards from him, he saw the defendant's horse and cart coming towards him at a very fast rate, the horse kicking violently. The plaintiff attempted to turn back, but in doing so got his horse and gig across the road, leaving, however, sufficient room for the horse and cart to pass on the proper side; he then jumped out of his gig, and went behind it to take care of himself; while in this position, the defendant's horse and cart came into collision with the plaintiff's horse, and inflicted the injury for which the action was brought. The collision took place within a minute and a half from the time the plaintiff first saw the horse coming. It was contended on the part of the defendant, that the plaintiff ought to be nonsuited, as he had not proved any specific negligence or facts from which negligence might be presumed. The judge, however, overruled the objection. On the part of the defendant three witnesses were called, the driver of the horse and cart, a woman who was riding in the cart with him, and a third witness named Perry, who was riding his horse close behind the cart, and witnessed the accident from beginning to end. It was proved that the cart contained the driver, the woman, and four dead pigs; that the driver had reins, but no stick or whip, and drove very slowly and steadily: that about 100 yards from the place of collision the horse began to kick very violently; that after kicking for some little time, both shafts of the cart broke off, the cart tilted up, and the driver and the contents of the cart were thrown out into the road, where he received a blow which rendered him insensible; that up to the time of his being thrown out he had the control of the horse, which was walking, though kicking violently; that after he was thrown out, the horse started off at a faster pace in the middle of the road towards the plaintiff, the cart was still attached to the horse by the traces; that the horse made a rush to pass on the side where the heap of stones was, and in their opinion there was not sufficient room for him to pass with the cart on his proper side of the road. It was also proved that, up to the time of the accident, the horse had been perfectly quiet, free from vice, and steady in harness, and was properly harnessed in the cart on the defendant's premises on the morning of the accident. The judge found a verdict for the plaintiff, being of opinion that the breaking of the shafts, even under the circumstances stated by the defendant's witnesses, shewed a defect in the cart which raised a presumption of negligence in the owner, and that presumption was not satisfactorily rebutted. But he reduced the claim of the plaintiff, on the ground that although he could not avoid some accident, he had subjected himself to greater damage by his own act.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether, upon this evidence, the plaintiff ought not to have been nonsuited, or a verdict found for the defendant instead of the plaintiff.

Phipson for the appellant.—The question here is, whether the judge, upon the whole of the evidence before him in this case, came to a right conclusion when he gave a verdict for the plaintiff. Here the judge has not only to decide upon the law, but stands in the place of a jury and decides upon the facts. The action is for negligent driving, and it is submitted there was no evidence of such negligence in the plaintiff. The plaintiff's case did not disclose the breaking of the shafts; that appeared in the evidence for the defendant. All that the plaintiff shewed was, that he saw the defendant's horse and cart approaching him at a fast rate, the horse kicking, and that collision followed. [CRESSWELL, J.—The question must be considered, not upon plaintiff's evidence alone, but upon the whole evidence.] Taking it in that way, it is submitted that the judge came to a wrong conclusion when he gave judgment for the plaintiff. What he really decided was, that the fact of the breaking of the shafts shewed a defect in the cart, and so raised a presumption of negligence in the defendant. [MAULE, J.—We are not entitled to take into consideration the steps by which the judge arrived at his conclusion, be that conclusion right or wrong.] There being no evidence of negligent driving, and the action having been brought for negligence of that nature, the judge should have nonsuited the plaintiff; for he could not properly give a judgment against the defendant on the ground that though there was no evidence before him of negligent driving, there was evidence of negligence in the unsound condition of the cart. Assuming that the judge had a right to look to the whole evidence, the judgment possibly might not be impeachable. The judge, however, tries both facts and law, and there is consequently no means of ascertaining on what grounds he has decided, whether on the facts or the law, or on both together. [MAULE, J.—It would be most mischievous if that were otherwise. The policy of the County Courts Acts is to avoid technicalities and nice limitations of the law, and to enable the judge to give judgment on the entire merits—on the substantial justice of the case before him. He has to draw his own conclusion upon both facts and law. He has not to direct a jury, but to direct himself: he comes himself to a conclusion, and in the present case he has explained what actually passed in his mind, and the grounds for his decision.] All duties which were on the defendant, both with regard to the plaintiff and the general public, were complied with. He was driving an habitually quiet horse, which, for some unaccountable reason, began to kick, and this occasioned the injury. Suppose, for argument's sake, that a wasp settled on the horse's neck and stung him, or that a boy threw a stone and frightened him so that he became unmanageable, and this collision was the result. The judge says, I do not care whether it was a wasp, or a boy with a stone, I consider the facts are sufficient to shew some negligence in the defendant, and shall therefore put the question to the jury;—surely that would be a misdirection, and the Court above would not sustain him. That would be in reality just this case. There was no evidence before the judge of furious driving, and that being so, as the action was for that, he was not justified in saying there was negligence in the defendant with respect to his cart.

MAULE, J.—My brother Williams and myself are both strongly of opinion (and if we had here another puisne judge we think he would be of like mind), that it is evidence of negligence not to drive an infirm vehicle with the care such a vehicle required in order to obviate accident. It seems to me that we cannot reverse the judgment. There was no more evidence of negligence in this case than in that where sparks from a railway train set fire to corn stacks. Aldridge v. Great Western Railway, 2 Railway Cas. 852. If the horse had not kicked, the shafts could not have broken. [Kingdon, interposing.—The case does not shew that the shafts broke in consequence of the kicking of the horse.] No; but it is an irresistible conclusion that the one thing resulted from the other. There was here no evidence for a jury of negligent driving, nor of any defect in the cart. But the judge took on himself to say that there was a presumption of negligence, though on the evidence no legitimate presumption can properly be said to arise. This appeal should therefore be confirmed.

Kingdon, for the respondent, was not called on.

MAULE, J.—Entertaining so clear an opinion in this case, we do not think it necessary to hear counsel for the respondent. This case comes before us under the 14th section of the County Courts Extension Act, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61, which gives to any party in any cause in a County Court, who shall be dissatisfied with the determination or direction of such Court in point of law power to appeal to two or more puisne judges of a Superior Court. In this case a number of facts have been stated, and the judge's conclusion on them was, that the plaintiff ought to recover a certain sum of money. Now, if from the whole of the facts before him the judge could legitimately come to the conclusion to which he did, he might properly do so, and his judgment is not reviewable here. Where parties leave law and facts to the decision of a judge, he alone has to determine upon those mixed matters; and the Court above, having no means or power to separate them, cannot review his judgment. But in this case, considering every thing, I am far from saying that the judge's decision was erroneous. Negligence is want of care applicable to the particular occasion, and I think a fair presumption of it arose here. I hold, therefore, that this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

CRESSWELL, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and concur fully in all that my brother

Maule has said. The judge here has stated the reasons which led him to the conclusion he arrived at, and the judgment which followed it. The question is, whether the plaintiff, on the evidence, ought to have been nonsuited, or a verdict entered for the defendant? I think the judgment was right, and that the plaintiff should not be nonsuited on the facts before the Court below. Whether or not the judgment should have been for the defendant, I have no means of saying; that was a question for the judge of the County Court, and not for us.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Horton v. The Westminster Improvement Commissioners.

Where a Board of Commissioners, authorised by Act of Parliament, to raise money for certain purposes, gave a bond in pursuance of the Act, it was Held, that it is not sufficient for them to plead to an action on such bond that they did not borrow the money for the purposes of the Act, and that certain third parties were entitled to receive from them certain bonds, and that the plaintiff and certain others conspired and combined to obtain this bond, and by fraud practised on the said third parties did cause them to procure the said defendants to make and deliver the said bond to the plaintiffs.

Debt.—The declaration stated that the defendants, by their bond sealed with their common seal, acknowledged that they, by virtue of the Westminster Improvement Act, 1845, and the Westminster Improvement Act 1847, were bound to Thomas Pooley in the sum of 10,000*l.* subject to a condition thereunder written, whereby, after reciting to the effect following, to wit, that by virtue of the said Acts, the defendants were authorised to borrow any sum of money for the purposes of the said Acts, and to secure the same by their bonds; and that the defendants, in pursuance of the said Acts, had borrowed of the said Thomas Pooley the sum of 5,000*l.* for enabling them to carry the said Acts into execution; the condition of the said bond was declared to be that if the defendants or their successors should, on the 3rd of June, 1854, pay to the said Thomas Pooley, his executors, &c. the sum of 4,000*l.* with interest at 5*l.* per cent. then the bond should be void, otherwise to remain in full force; and to the condition was annexed a proviso that it should be lawful for the defendants, their successors or assigns, giving three months' notice to the said Thomas Pooley of their intention so to do, to pay off the principal sum. It was then averred that the bond was duly transferred from Thomas Pooley to the plaintiff. Breach.—That although 125*l.* was due for interest which was duly demanded by the plaintiff, yet the same had not been paid, contrary to the form of the bond, by reason whereof the bond had become forfeited.

7th Plea.—The defendants say that they did not, in pursuance of the said Acts of Parliament in the said declaration mentioned, or of the Westminster Improvement Act 1850, borrow of the said Thomas Pooley the said sum of 5,000*l.* or any part thereof, for enabling them to carry the purposes of the said Acts, or any or either of them into execution, nor was the same lent or advanced by the said Thomas Pooley or any other person, for those purposes; and they further say that the said writing obligatory was not made by the said defendants for securing the payment of any sum of money borrowed or taken up by the defendants for the purposes of and under the powers and provisions of the said Acts, or of the said Westminster Improvement Act 1850, or of any or either of them; and the defendants were not, by virtue of the said Acts, or any or either of them, directed, authorised, or empowered to make the said writing obligatory, nor was the same made by them under or by virtue, or in pursuance of the said Acts, or any or either of them, and the same was made contrary to the provisions of those Acts, of which said several premises the said Thos. Pooley, before and at the time of the making of the said writing obligatory had notice. And the defendants further say that the plaintiff, before and at the time of the making of the said deed, and when the said writing obligatory was transferred to him, and when he first became the transferee of the same, had notice of the premises aforesaid. Verification.

8th Plea.—And the defendants say that before the making of the said writing obligatory, to wit, on the 22nd day of May, in the year of our Lord 1851, one Catherine Morrison and one William Mackenzie were, subject to certain terms and conditions, entitled to receive from the defendants certain bonds, to be thereafter issued and made and sealed by the defendants under their common seal, and to be conditioned respectively for the payment by the defendants or their successors to the obligees to be named in such bonds at the end of three years from the dates of such bonds of divers sums of money, amounting in the whole to a large sum of money, to wit, 20,000*l.* with interest on such sums, respectively payable half-yearly. And the defendants further say that the said Thomas Pooley and one Alexander Gopsell Pooley, and divers other persons whose names are to the defendants unknown, afterwards, and before the making of the said writing obligatory in the declaration mentioned, and of the making of the said bonds which the said Catherine Morrison and William Mackenzie are so entitled to as aforesaid, or any or either of them, to wit, on the 22nd day of May, in the year of our Lord 1851, did conspire, combine, confederate, and agree together to obtain and acquire to the use of the said Thos. Pooley the said bond to which the said Catherine Morrison and Wm. Mackenzie were so entitled as aforesaid, and of the moneys to be payable thereby, and to cheat and defraud the said Catherine Morrison and Wm. Mackenzie thereof. And for that purpose they, the said Thomas Pooley and Alexander Gopsell Pooley, did, in pursuance of the said conspiracy, afterwards, and before the making of the said writing obligatory and of the said bonds, or any or either of them, to wit, on the day and year last aforesaid, by fraud and covin, then made and practised by them upon the said Catherine Morrison and Wm. Mackenzie, induce and persuade, and cause and procure, the said Catherine Morrison and Wm. Mackenzie to contract and agree with the said Thomas Pooley, amongst other things, that the said Thomas Pooley should have, and that the said Catherine Morrison and Wm. Mackenzie should cause to be delivered to the said Thomas Pooley, the said bonds of the said defendants, to which the said Catherine Morrison and Wm. Mackenzie were so entitled as aforesaid. And the defendants further say that the said T. Pooley and A. G. Pooley, in further pursuance of the said conspiracy, and by means of the said fraud and covin, and before the said Catherine Morrison and Wm. Mackenzie, and the defendants, or any or either of them, had discovered the same, or had any notice or knowledge thereof, did afterwards, to wit, on the 3rd day of June, A.D. 1851, cause and procure the said Catherine Morrison and Wm. Mackenzie to request, and direct the defendants to make and deliver, and cause and procure them to make and deliver the said bonds to which the said C. Morrison and Wm. Mackenzie were so entitled as aforesaid, and amongst others the said writing obligatory in the declaration mentioned, and to make and deliver the same to the said Thomas Pooley as the obligee thereof in the lieu and stead of the said Catherine Morrison and William Mackenzie, as the obligees thereof. And the defendants further say, that the said Thomas Pooley and Alexander G. Pooley in further pursuance of the said conspiracy, and by means of the said fraud and covin, did afterwards, to wit, on the day and year last aforesaid, cause and procure the defendants, to make and deliver, and they did make and deliver the said writing obligatory in the said declaration mentioned, as, and for, and being one of the said bonds to which the said Catherine Morrison and William Mackenzie were so entitled as aforesaid; and the defendants say, that they so made and delivered the same as and for one of the said bonds to which the said Catherine Morrison and William Mackenzie were so entitled as aforesaid; and the said Thomas Pooley took and received the same as and for one of such bonds; and they further say, that they never did at any time borrow of the said Thomas Pooley, nor did he lend to them the said sum of 5,000*l.* or any part thereof, as in the condition of the said writing obligatory is recited. And the defendants further say, that the plaintiff before, and at the time of the said transfer of the said writing obligatory had notice of the premises. And the defendants further say, that the said Catherine Morrison and William Mackenzie afterwards, and before the commencement of this suit, to wit, on the 1st day of January, A.D. 1852, gave the defendants notice, and required them not to pay, and forbade them, and still forbid them paying the said moneys by the said writing obligatory so payable as aforesaid. Verification.

To these pleas the plaintiff demurred. Joinder in demurrer.

Willes (with him Garth) in support of the demurrer.—These commissioners receive these powers under certain Acts of Parliament, viz. 8 & 9 Vict. c. 178; 10 & 11 Vict. c. 131; and 13 & 14 Vict. c. 102, and the several sections authorising the borrowing of money shew that the 7th plea is bad. The 37th sec. of the first-named Act provides, "that it shall be lawful for the commissioners from time to time to borrow at interest any sum of money which they may judge necessary for the purposes of this Act." It is not denied by this plea that the money was advanced; it only says it was not advanced for the purposes of this Act; but persons lending their money have no opportunity of inquiring into the necessity of borrowing, or if the money so borrowed is used for the purposes of the Act. Fairtitle v. Gilbert, 2 T. R. 169, will be relied on by the defendants; but there are more recent decisions than that case. He referred to Doe dem. Walton v. Penfold; Doe dem. Levy v. Horne, 3 Q. B. 757; Reg. v. White, 4 Q. B. 101; and Taylor on Evidence, remarks on those cases, p. 82. The 8th plea is in substance, that Morrison and Mackenzie were entitled to the bonds made to Pooley, and that the defendants had notice from Morrison and Mackenzie not to pay, but there was no fraud alleged as against the plaintiff. The section already referred to gave the commissioners power to grant bonds for securing money borrowed, and Pooley must be taken as the nominee of Morrison and Mackenzie. Pooley is an equitable trustee for Morrison and Mackenzie. This is a bond given in fulfilment of a duty under which the defendants were bound to give Morrison and Mackenzie bonds, and they could not now obtain from the defendants other bonds. It is the same as if in an action against a trustee the defendant was to plead that his cestui que trust had forbidden him to pay. To make fraud an answer to the action, it must have been practised on the person promising; but in an action between A. and B., B. cannot plead the fraud of C. (He cited Campbell v. Fleming, 1 A. & E. 40.) It is not competent for a third person to set up fraud. (Gorgis v. Mieville, 3 B. & C. 45.)

Bramwell (with him Honyman) in support of the pleas. First, as to the 8th plea. It is admitted that the plaintiff was acquainted with the fraud of the Pooleys before he got the bond. They are guilty of a conspiracy, and here is a direct intention of fraud on the defendants, sufficient to avoid the contract. The bond was never handed over to Morrison and Mackenzie; if it had been, trover would lie by them to recover it back. But trover will not lie in this case. If the plaintiffs were cognisant of the fraud on Morrison and Mackenzie, and partly instrumental in it, that is a sufficient answer. (Pidcock v. Bishop, 3 B. & C. 605; Jackson v. Duchane, 3 T. R. 551; "Ex dolo malo non oritur actio," Broom's Maxims, 571; Fivaz v. Nicholls, 2 C. B. 501; Holman v. Johnson, Cowp. 341; Wright v. Tallis, 1 C. B. 893; Cannan v. Bryce, 2 B. & Ald. 179; Hardman v. Wilcock, 9 Bing. 382.) It is contended, then, that by this contract entered into with Pooley, the plaintiff no more acquired a property or right to sue than he would have done in a chattel fraudulently obtained. Even if the assignment were no fraud against the defendants, still the plaintiff cannot recover. If there be fraud in the plaintiff, that is sufficient to deprive him of his right. And this plea actually alleges a fraud on the defendants by the plaintiff. Then, as to the 7th plea, the question of estoppel does not in this case arise, if by the powers of the Act under which they receive their authority, the commissioners had no power to do this act. (East Anglian Railway Company v. Eastern Counties Railway Company, 21 L.J. 23.) In the case of Gage v. The Newmarket Railway Company, which is not reported, the company agreed to pay for certain land whether they took it or not, and the Court of Q. B. held that the contract was illegal and ultra vires, and a similar case was decided yesterday in the Court of Error. These defendants were merely trustees, and not associated for the purpose of profit. (He referred to ss. 3, 45, 110, and 112, of the Act.) If railways, then, must keep within the strict letter of their authority, surely these trustees must; whenever there is a limited authority granted to persons, they cannot by their own Act extend it. (Doe dem. Chandler v. Ford, 3 A. & E. 629; Paxton v. Popham, 9 East, 408.) There never can be an estoppel to prevent a person setting up an illegal act, and one beyond the authority granted. It is then said that even if that be so, it is not properly pleaded; but I contend that it is, and that this plea is a sufficient answer. (He went through the plea.) [Martin, B.—The plea does not say that Pooley, at the time of lending the money, knew that it was not to be used for the purposes of the Act, but for other and illegal purposes.] It says that Pooley had notice of the several premises previously alleged. The Act is an authority to be strictly pursued. If I lend these commissioners 10,000*l.* and then say, "Make out a bond to A. B. not as a trustee for me, but absolutely," these commissioners have no power to do so. (Gas Light and Coke Company v. Turner, 5 Bing. N. C. 666.)

Willes, in reply.—The 8th plea does not aver fraud on the commissioners. The averment is, that the commissioners were induced to make out a bond to Pooley in consequence of a fraud practised on Morrison and Mackenzie, the order so to make out the bond was genuine; and the other side feel this difficulty, that if this plea can be maintained they have a good defence against both parties. Against Morrison and Mackenzie, because they made out the bond to Pooley by their direction; and against Pooley on the ground of the alleged fraud by the Pooleys on Morrison and Mackenzie. They never attempt to say that they could not plead payment to Pooley as against Morrison and Mackenzie. (Carey v. Kearsley, 4 Esp. 139; Taylor v. Cohen, 4 Esp. 397; Smith v. Cuff, 6 M. & S.; McKinnell v. Robinson, 3 M. & W. 434.) Pooley has become a trustee in equity for Morrison and Mackenzie, and the commissioners may file a bill of interpleader. Then as to the seventh plea, it is contended by the defendants that this bond cannot be a valid bond. In the case of Hill v. The Proprietors of the Manchester and Salford Waterworks, 2 B. & Adol. 544, it was held that an obligor who had been sued on a bond reciting a certain consideration is estopped from pleading that the consideration was different, unless he could make it appear by his plea that the real transaction was fraudulent and unlawful; and that where a company, authorised by Act of Parliament to raise money for certain purposes, had given a bond purporting to be for a sum borrowed and advanced conformably to the Act, it is not sufficient for them to plead in an action to such bond that it was executed colourably, and that the money was not in fact borrowed or lent for the purposes of the statute, as the obligee well knew; the pleas not disclosing any fraud or injury done to the shareholders of the company. (Doe dem. Jones, 5 Ex. 16.)

ALDERSON, B.—There is nothing on the face of it to shew that this transaction was illegal.

PLATT, B.—The Act says that the money that ought to be borrowed is such money as the commissioners judged to be proper. Their judgment may be erroneous and yet they may borrow; the real issue, therefore, is not raised. They might judge it necessary to borrow money not authorised by the Act.

POLLOCK, C.B.—We are all of opinion that there should be judgment for the plaintiff. Neither of the pleas demurred to presents a legal answer to the claim. The bond was properly executed and transferred. One plea says the bond was obtained by fraud, the other says we had no power to do that which we have done, and therefore we are not bound. These are two distinct defences. The commissioners may have borrowed money, thinking it necessary, and that is quite sufficient to make the transaction valid. I think the defendants cannot set up this defence, that the bond was obtained by the fraud of the Pooleys. The contract on its face is good, and the commissioners are bound by their bond to some one. It is said not to the plaintiff, because an arrangement was made by the Pooleys, by which the defendants were induced to give the bond to the wrong parties; but at all events it was by the authority of the right parties, Morrison and Mackenzie, and the remedy is in a Court of Equity.

ALDERSON, B.—I am of the same opinion. I think the defendants cannot set up the jus tertii right of Morrison and Mackenzie: that would make it an authority voidable in equity, or make Pooley a trustee for Morrison and Mackenzie for money to be received; but the defendants have nothing to do with that.

PLATT, B.—I think the 7th plea is bad on general demurrer, as being too general. It does not deny that the money was such as was authorised to be raised by the Act, and it is nowhere shewn that the money was borrowed for wrong purposes. The commissioners were to raise such money as they judged necessary: they judged it necessary to raise that for which the bond was given. As to the 8th plea, the setting up of a jus tertii cannot make the bond bad as between these parties. The bond was a good bond at the time of execution. Well, then, it is said that it was obtained by fraud from Morrison and Mackenzie; but what have the defendants to do with that? Morrison and Mackenzie have their remedy in a Court of Equity, but such a defence cannot be recognised in a Court of Law. Both pleas are bad.

MARTIN, B.—I am of the same opinion. This was a deed given by the commissioners under seal, and it is therefore to be taken as a well-considered act; and to make out a defence, they should shew clear and sufficient grounds, and they should not put their seal to documents of this nature without consideration. It has been said that the doctrine of estoppel does not apply to this case; but I do not think so. It is true there is an exception when there is illegality. The plea is substantially the same, although not precisely as in the case of Hall v. The Manchester and Salford Water-works; and I think that all that is said there is good law. As to the 8th plea, it carefully avoids, alleging that the fraud was practised on the defendants themselves, and no authority has been cited to shew that such a defence can be set up. Judgment for the plaintiff.

BANKRUPTCY.

Re TAYLOR, ex parte RICHARDS.

Written memorandum when sufficient to entitle equitable mortgagee to costs of sale, &c.

This was a petition by Thomas Richards, the executor and sole residuary legatee of William Richards, for the sale of certain leasehold premises at Kennington, Surrey, belonging to the bankrupt, the lease of which had been deposited with the petitioner's testator, as security for a loan of money in the year 1812. The petition prayed that the costs of the petition and sale, &c. should be paid out of the proceeds.

Bagley (counsel) for petitioner.—The only question is, whether the petitioner is entitled to costs, and that depends upon the question whether the mortgage is evidenced by writing. It is admitted that there was no writing at the time the lease was deposited by the bankrupt with the testator William Richards, but in March 1851, the present petitioner, who then stood in the place of William Richards, entered into an arrangement for the settlement of certain partnership disputes with the bankrupt Taylor, upon which a memorandum of agreement was drawn up and signed by the authorised agent of Taylor, and by the petitioner, which memorandum contained these words: "Mr. Richards to give up the lease of the houses at Kennington upon payment of 200*l.* and interest from this date, 25th March, 1851." From this memorandum, it was clearly to be inferred that the petitioner held the lease in question as security for 200*l.* and interest, the precise amount which the petitioner now claimed to be entitled to upon the footing of his mortgage. That the memorandum was long subsequent to the deposit of the lease did not affect the petitioner's right to costs. (Ex parte Reynolds, re Moore, 1 Deac. and Chit. 279.)

Linklater (solicitor for the assignees).—The petitioner is not entitled to costs, for the only written memorandum produced, that of the 25th March, 1851, is consistent with the petitioner not holding the lease as equitable mortgagee, but in a different character. Besides, it appears from the preceding parts of the memorandum, that it was made in contemplation of some arrangement by deed which was never executed.

Mr. Commissioner FANE.—It may be clearly inferred from the memorandum, signed by an authorised agent of the bankrupt, Taylor, before his bankruptcy, that the petitioner held the lease in question, under circumstances which induced Taylor to believe that he could not demand the lease without payment of 200*l.* and interest. The sum specified in the memorandum is precisely that now claimed by the petitioner as equitable mortgagee. It is impossible to say there is no written evidence that the lease was deposited as security for money, and I think the evidence is sufficient to entitle the petitioner to his costs. Order as prayed for.

INSOLVENCY COURT.

Re JAMES WALKER.

Trial order before judgment signed in an action on the case in which damages are obtained, a nullity. A final order is no protection from imprisonment for damages obtained in an action on the case, although a verdict has been obtained, unless the costs are taxed and judgment signed before the final order is granted.

This insolvent came up to be admitted to bail, on tendering sureties for his appearance at the hearing. He had previously petitioned the Court under the Protection Act, on the 17th December last, and obtained a final order on the 30th January. He then petitioned, mainly to be protected in respect of liability of 97*l.* 9*s.* to his opposing creditor, Mr. Bevan; the mode of incurring which is explained by the following extract from the schedule:—"This creditor's claim has arisen in consequence of a verdict which he has obtained against me in her Majesty's Court of C. P. in an action on the case, and which action was brought against me to recover the sum of 30*l.* which this creditor had paid to me in the month of May, 1851, for the good-will and fixtures of my business, which I then previously had carried on at 5, Albert-place, Marlborough-road, Chelsea, the said creditor having been, subsequently to the sale of my said business to him, turned out of the said business premises under an action of ejectment which was brought against my father-in-law, the lessee of the said premises, for a breach of the covenants contained in the lease of the said premises committed to him." "I filed a petition for protection on the 17th December last, and obtained my final order on the 30th January last, and included this debt in my then schedule, and was opposed in respect thereof. Subsequently to my discharge, this creditor taxed costs in the action, and has now taken me in execution for damages and costs. I caused an application to be made to the Court of C. P. for my discharge, but the Court, holding that the debt did not accrue till the costs were taxed, discharged my application with costs." Being thus in custody for this debt, the insolvent applied under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, and now applied to be admitted to bail, which application was granted. The insolvent was subsequently discharged.

Larceny—Fraud—Procuring prosecutor's signature to a stamped receipt—Property—Possession.

A. pretending that he was about to pay B. a sum of money which was due to him, produced a receipt stamp, and placed it before B. who wrote thereon, at A.'s request, a receipt for the amount. A. then took up the paper and carried it away, but never paid the money.

Held, that B. never had such a property in, or possession of, the stamped paper, as to render the taking by A. a larceny.

CASE.

At the Epiphany Quarter Sessions held by adjournment at Swansea, in the county of Glamorgan, on the 9th of January, 1852, the prisoner, John Smith, was indicted for having on the 3rd of December, 1851, one piece of paper, stamped with a certain stamp, denoting the payment of a duty to our Sovereign Lady the Queen, of 6*d.* of the property, &c. of Thomas Henderson, feloniously stolen, &c.

The prosecutor, Thomas Henderson, had been timekeeper and general clerk to Isaac Powell, a railway contractor, whose employment he left in November 1851. The prosecutor applied frequently and without success, to Powell, for payment of wages due to him, and on the 3rd of December, 1851, prosecutor went to a public house, where he saw Powell and the prisoner, who was a gauger (or foreman) in the employ of Powell. Prosecutor asked Powell if he was going to settle with him? Powell answered yes: and that he would send the prisoner up to his house, to his (Powell's) wife for the money. Powell then left the house and prisoner followed him. In about two minutes prisoner returned and beckoned the prosecutor to come to him into the public house. Prosecutor went there—they were alone, and made up between them the balance of wages due to prosecutor, which they fixed at 4*l.* 11*s.* 1½*d.* Prisoner then took out of his pocket a sixpenny stamp and put it on the table, prosecutor took the stamp and pulled it towards himself, and asked the prisoner whether he (prosecutor) should write a receipt for the full sum, 10*l.* 16*s.* or for the balance. Prisoner said, for the balance. Whilst prosecutor was writing, he observed prisoner pull out a fist-full of silver, and turn it over in his hand. When prosecutor had written out the receipt, prisoner took it up and went out of the room. Prosecutor followed him, and said, "Smith, you have not given me the money." Prisoner said "It is all right." Prosecutor repeatedly asked prisoner for the money, but in vain. On the evening of the same day prosecutor met Powell and the prisoner together, and asked Powell if he had given prisoner any money for him. Powell said, "No; but my wife has." Prosecutor said he had not had the money. "Well," answered Powell, "he (the prisoner) would not have the receipt if you (the prosecutor) had not had the money." The chairman told the jury, after much doubt, that if they believed the evidence, the stamped receipt was the property and was in the possession of the prosecutor at and after the time of his writing the receipt, and that if they believed the prosecutor's statement, and should be of opinion that the prisoner took the receipt out of such possession with a fraudulent intent, they might convict him of larceny. The jury returned a verdict of Guilty, and the prisoner was sentenced to imprisonment for four calendar months, with hard labour.

The counsel for the prisoner raised the following objections:—1st. That there was not such a property and possession in the prosecutor as to support the charge laid in the indictment. 2nd. That there was no evidence of a felonious taking. The chairman reserved the case for the consideration of the judges, and begged their opinion thereon.

Terry for the prosecution.—As to the second question stated in the case, it was clearly a question for the jury whether the taking was felonious, and they have found that it was. As to the first, there is more difficulty; but no doubt a stamped receipt may be the subject of larceny, and is properly described as a piece of paper stamped with a certain stamp denoting the payment of a duty to the Queen, as in this case. (Reg. v. Rodway, 9 Car. & P. 781.) In the present case it is submitted that as soon as the prosecutor had filled up the receipt and made it a valid discharge upon the face of it, the property and the possession passed to him; and the prisoner had no longer any right to it until the money was paid. The possession was transferred to him until that condition was complied with.

PARKE, B.—This is very like the case of Rex v. Hart, 6 Car. & P. 106. There, as Mr. Justice Littledale observes, "the prisoner took the stamped papers from his pocket and the prosecutor never had them except for the purpose of writing on them; they were never out of the prisoner's sight." So here, the receipt was never handed over to the prosecutor except for the purpose of his writing on it in the prisoner's presence. The prisoner bought the stamped paper, and it was to continue his property. He retained the controul of it throughout the transaction, and the prosecutor could not maintain trespass for the seizure of it.

POLLOCK, C.B.—The prisoner was guilty certainly of very fraudulent conduct; but the stamped paper was his own property at first and continued to be so throughout. It was handed to him merely that he might write his name upon it and return it; he might as the money was not paid, have struck out his name before he returned it; but he had no right to keep the stamped paper.

PARKE, B.—It is quite clear that there was no intention to give it to the prosecutor to keep even for a moment after he had written his name upon it. There is, of course, no doubt that if a man bails his goods to another, he may steal them out of the hands of the bailee.

ERLE, J.—This is res judicata, and the decision is in accordance with principle.

REG. v. MITCHELL and OTHERS.

Robbery—Assault with intent—Punishment.

Where, upon an indictment for robbery against three persons, they are convicted under Lord Campbell's Act of an assault with intent to rob, and the jury find that the assault was committed by the three prisoners together, they are liable to transportation under secs. 3 & 10 of 1 Vict. c. 87, and the punishment is not limited to imprisonment under secs. 6 & 10 of that statute.

CASE.

These prisoners were tried before Alderson, B. at the last Liverpool Assizes, on an indictment stating that they, in and upon Thomas Tatern, together feloniously did make an assault and him in bodily fear and danger of his life then and there together, feloniously did put, and certain money of the said Thomas Tatern, from his person and against his will, then and there together feloniously did steal.

At the trial, in consequence of the absence of the prosecutor, the actual robbery could not be proved, as no money could be shewn to have been taken from his person. But the three prisoners were convicted on the clearest evidence of the offence of feloniously assaulting the prosecutor with intent to rob him, and the jury expressly found also, on my asking them the question, that this felonious assault was committed by the three prisoners together. The case was one in which, in my judgment, it was right to sentence the prisoners to transportation; but as to the two men, a question arose whether it was competent for me, in point of law, to pass such a sentence. There was a previous conviction of felony proved against the woman, which removed all difficulty in her case.

By Lord Campbell's Act, 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 11, it is enacted, "that in all indictments for robbery, if it shall appear to the jury upon the evidence that the defendant did not commit the crime of robbery, but that he did commit an assault with intent to rob, the defendant shall or by reason thereof be entitled to be acquitted, but the jury shall be at liberty to return as their verdict that the defendant is guilty of an assault with intent to rob, and thereupon such defendant shall be liable to be punished in the same manner as if he had been convicted upon an indictment for feloniously assaulting with intent to rob." But there is this difficulty, that there are several clauses of the 7 Wm. 4, and 1 Vict. c. 87, imposing different punishments in cases of assault with intent to rob. By the 6th and 10th secs. of that Act the extreme punishment for the simple offence of a felonious assault with intent to rob does not exceed three years' imprisonment with hard labour. By the 3rd and 10th secs. of that Act, where the felonious assault with intent to rob is committed by any person together with one or more other person or persons, the punishment may extend as far as transportation for life, and the lowest punishment is that of imprisonment with hard labour, for three years. I wish therefore to ask the judges the following questions: 1st. Is Lord Campbell's Act to be construed literally? And if so, whether the punishment must not be under the 6th and 10th sections, confined to three years' imprisonment, with hard labour. Or, 2ndly, is the true meaning of Lord Campbell's Act, that in any indictment for robbery, if the robbery be simple, there is included also a simple felonious assault with intent to rob, and if the robbery be aggravated, felonious assault with intent to rob, and then whether, inasmuch as the jury have here found such an aggravated assault, the punishment may not be, under the 3rd and 10th sections, extended as far as transportation for life. That the inconvenience, if any, may be avoided in future, I thought it advisable to direct a return of the old form of indictment, which, as I was assured by the clerk of assize, formerly contained an exp. . averment of an assault with an intent to rob. But this had been, in consequence of the recent alteration in the law, discontinued; and so the difficulty arose. I reserved the judgment till the next assizes, and request the assistance of the judges on the case.

The case was not argued by counsel.

Lord CAMPBELL, C.J.—I think that the second meaning suggested by the learned judge is the true meaning, and that when the robbery charged is of an aggravated description, the assault with intent to rob may be punished with transportation as an aggravated assault. If the indictment was for simple robbery, it could not include such an assault as would justify that punishment.

MACPHERSON v. MACPHERSON.

Will—Construction—Investing in fund—First year's interest—Tenant for life.

A. by his will, directed his executors to set apart a portion of his personal estate to secure certain annuities, then to consolidate into one fund his whole fortune and moveables, and lay out that fund in purchasing lands, to be limited as specified in a certain deed of entail, and that the principal of the above annuities, as they respectively fell, should be applied in the same way. At A.'s death, the bulk of his personal estate was standing in Bank Annuities, and a convenient investment in land was not made till five years' afterwards.

Held, the money so directed to be invested was impressed with the character of realty from the moment of testator's death, and that the tenant for life was entitled to receive the interest of the same, from the period of testator's death, though uninvested in the land as directed.

Where a testator directs his estate to be converted and laid out in a particular investment, without any special direction, to accumulate or add interest to capital, the tenant for life is entitled to the interest actually accruing from the moment of testator's death, though the investment directed has not been made, but,

Semble, after a year has expired, and the fund still uninvested, in a question between the tenant for life and the person entitled in remainder, a Court of Equity will take into account the difference between the interest actually accruing and what would have accrued if the proposed investment had been actually made.

Stott v. Hollingworth, 3 Madd. 161, is overruled. Sitwell v. Bernard, 6 Ves. 520, is exceptional: La Terrière v. Bulmer, 2 Sim. 18, did not go far enough; and Dimes v. Scott, 1 Russ. 207, is doubtful.

This was an appeal from the Court of Session in Scotland. The plaintiff, Miss Anne Macpherson, filed her bill for an account in the Court of Session against the executors of Sir John Macpherson, who was one of the executors of the testator, James Macpherson, senior, who died in 1796. The testator, who was a Scotchman domiciled in England, left property to a large amount both in England and Scotland; and his will, dated 7th June, 1793, was to the following effect:—"I, James Macpherson, of Fludyer-street, Westminster, &c. do hereby make my latter will and testament, revoking all former wills and testaments whatsoever that I may have made, having settled my lands in Scotland upon a series of heirs by a bond or deed of entail, I dispose of all the property I may die possessed of, as follows: I leave an annuity of 100*l*. &c. (then follow bequests of several annuities). I desire, that out of the first and readiest of my money and effects the above annuities be secured in the public funds, and that, as they respectively fall, the principal shall be added to the residue of my fortune, and be disposed of as I[ereaf]ter directed by the executors of this my will, for the benefit of the heirs appointed by the above-mentioned bond or deed of entail. I leave to my following friends the sums specified after their respective names, as a mark of my esteem (then follow bequests to several friends). I request and direct the executors of my will, hereafter mentioned, to consolidate into one fund the whole of my fortune and moveables, which fund they are to lay out in purchasing lands in Scotland, to be entailed upon the series of heirs specified in the bond and deed of entail already mentioned, according to the strict forms of the laws of Scotland. The principal of the annuities specified on the first page of this will, as they respectively fall, shall be applied to the purchase of lands in Scotland, to be entailed as already directed. I hereby nominate and appoint the executors of this my latter will and testament, to wit, Sir John Macpherson, baronet (and others)." In a Scotch deed of entail, previously executed, the testator had appointed James Macpherson, junior, his son to be the first tenant in tail. After the testator's death in 1796, the executors, who duly proved the will, found a sum exceeding 30,000*l*. of personal estate, which was standing invested in bank annuities. Out of this fund they afterwards in 1801 purchased an estate in Scotland, to be limited to the persons specified in the Scotch deed. As the will, however, did not provide any specific term, from which the right of James Macpherson, jun. the first tenant in tail, to the interest or proceeds of the money to be laid out on land, was to commence, the executors paid over to him the whole interest of the stock accruing during the first year after the testator's death. It was for this sum, amounting to 1,055*l*. 18s. 1d. that the plaintiff, Miss Anne Macpherson, who at the death of James M. jun. without issue in 1833, became the second tenant in tail of the Scotch estates, now called for an account from the representatives of Sir John Macpherson, one of the executors of the testator. The defendants, in their answer, alleged that the deceased, Sir J. M. had paid over the sum in question, being the proceeds of the first year's interest, to James M. jun. as by law the executors were bound to do. The Court of Session, considering that the domicil of the testator was English, before ordering the account, directed the opinion of English counsel to be taken, as to whether, according to the law of England, the tenant for life was entitled to receive the sum in dispute. Counsel accordingly (Pemberton Leigh, esq.), in 1812, stated that the law of England was somewhat unsettled, the last authority being then Taylor v. Clark, 1 Hare, 161, but that he was inclined to the opinion "that the interest of the first beneficiary would be held not to commence till the end of one year from the death of the testator." The Court of Session ultimately decreed accordingly, that the executors were not entitled to pay to James M. jun. the first year's free annual proceeds of the personal estate, and declared the defendants liable to pay that amount. From this decree the defendants now appealed to the House of Lords.

Stuart, Q.C. and Anderson, Q.C. for appellant.

It was assumed in the argument that the law of England was the same as that of Scotland on the point in dispute, though the law of Scotland was more settled, owing to circumstances similar to the present having already occurred there. The English authorities are so fully referred to in the judgment, that we merely cite them here: Sitwell v. Bernard, 6 Ves. 520; Amphlett v. Parke, 1 Sim. 275; Angerstein v. Martin, 1 T. & Russ. 232; Hewitt v. Morris, ibid. 241; Douglas v. Congreve, 1 Keen, 410; Dimes v. Scott, 1 Russ. 207; Taylor v. Clark, 1 Hare, 161; Wrey v. Smith, 14 Sim. 202; Sparling v. Parker, 9 Beav. 524; Stott v. Hollingworth, 3 Madd. 161; La Terrière v. Bulmer, 2 Sim. 18; Caldecott v. Caldecott, 1 Y. & Coll. 312; Gibson v. Bott, 7 Ves. 89. JUDGMENT.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—My lords, this is a very important point of law, and I must say for myself, I have for a good many years thought it a concluded point; but it seems not to be so; and therefore it will be necessary now to consider what the construction of the authorities is, and what the law is in this respect. The point turns on the will of Mr. Macpherson, and on a very few words of that will. He first of all had executed a disentailing deed of his Scotch estates, under which James Macpherson was the first taker, and he then goes on in these words. "I request and direct the executors of my will hereafter mentioned to consolidate into one fund the whole of my fortune and moveables, which fund they are to lay out in purchasing lands in Scotland, to be entailed upon the series of heirs specified in the bond and deed of entail already mentioned, according to the strict forms of the law of Scotland:" and immediately after that, this passage follo[ws]: "The principal of the annuities specified on the first page of this will, as they respectively fall, shall be applied to the purchase of lands in Scotland, to be entailed as already directed." Then, my lords, if you refer to the passage to which the testator is referring, you find this provision: "That out of the first and readiest of my money and effects the above annuities be secured in the public funds; and that as they respectively fall, the principal shall be added to the residue of my fortune, and be disposed of as after directed by the executors of this, my will, for the benefit of the heirs appointed by the above-mentioned bond or deed of entail." Now, my lords, independently of authority, let us look at what ought to guide courts. They are not bound by authority in the construction of a will of this sort; and, indeed, in the construction of any will the great object of courts of justice must be within settled rules of law, to give effect to the intention of the testator. Now, what was the intention of the testator? Clearly, as far as it could be effected by law, to place his personal property upon the same ground as the real estate. Did he mean the measure of enjoyment of the one to be equal to the measure of enjoyment of the other? Did he intend them to go together, or did he intend them at any time to be separate? Had he in his contemplation any rule or any intention, which, although he has not directed it, would compel his executors to take the interest for any given portion of time of the whole of his large personal property and turn that into capital, and make that and that only capital to be added to the capital he already possessed? He has not said so, it is not attempted to be contended that this gift directs the investment of interest, the accumulation of interest for the purposes of investment, on the contrary, after the first year it has been held, that the institute, the person entitled, had all the profits of both the personalty to be invested and the real estate as it stood, and taking it in that view, there cannot be, I think, the possibility of a doubt, that that meets the intention of the testator, who tells you, as plainly as language can describe it, his meaning,—"I mean my personal property at my death to be considered as real property, and to go with my Scotch estates, and with the additions and accumulations of my Scotch estates to the heir of entail according to the deeds I have executed." Suppose the heir has left at interest the whole of his property, could there be any doubt that he would take the new additional property in the same way as he disposed of the whole. Is it disputed, that if the executor had the next hour met with a convenient and proper estate and bought it, the heir would not have been entitled? Clearly he would, and therefore when we come to consider, independently of intention, the rule of law, it will be seen whether there is something which will prevent that which I apprehend is the real and clear intention of the testator. Now this may be spelling of words, but the truth is, when one is about to affect an intention which is said to be so obscure that the Court is said to imply something, you are entitled to spell words; but there is something to be gathered from the words which follow: "The principal of the annuities specified on the first page shall be applied to the purchase of lands." An annuitant would thus clearly be entitled at the death of the testator. Suppose that annuitant had died in three months, are you to accumulate that annuity for the remaining nine months? You could not do it; the words exclude it. It says, "the principal," therefore you would not take that which is not principal; if you look at the direction as to the payment of annuitants generally, you will find the samething—it is the principal that is to be applied, and it is not necessary to press this, because it is admitted that the true construction of the clause is to give capital only to be invested. Look, my lords, at what would be the consequence: here we are now at this very moment arguing in respect of a fund which has never, except by imagination or intendment of law, changed its character. What remains is still personal estate, and yet we are asked, contrary to all the rules of equity guiding us on this subject, we are asked to consider that at this moment, as if nothing was accomplished. Now, the rule on which the Court proceeds is, that this property was impressed by the will itself with a character of real estate, and being impressed with that character, it became real estate at the moment of his death, in my apprehension, and must be treated as such. The question remains, my lords, are you bound by the authorities to decide against this view, and in favour of the decision of the Court below? I apprehend you are bound to do no such thing. The cases admit of a very easy regulation. Sitwell v. Barnard was exactly, in effect, like Lord Stair's case in Scotland: in each case there was a direction for investing the interest; if, therefore, there be a direction to invest the interest, the direction must be obeyed; but, see what Lord Eldon did in Sitwell v. Barnard. He doubted himself, at a later time, whether he had not taken a greater liberty with that will, in putting on it the construction he did, than he ought; but what did he do? There was a direction in Sitwell v. Barnard that the interest and dividends of the fund should be accumulated, and that the accumulated fund should be laid out; when, therefore, Lord Eldon took this view of the accumulation which he could not strike out of the will, for he had no power to do so, when he decided that that accumulation should by construction terminate at the end of the first year, what did he do? He arrived at one of the most violent conclusions at which it is possible for a judicial mind to arrive; but for what object? To let property and enjoyment go hand in hand; he saw an intention not to exclude, although the words did exclude the persons to take successively, from each having in his own lifetime the full measure of enjoyment which every other owner has, and therefore he did put a violent construction on that will, not from any fanciful rule to give a twelvemonth, but because he must give some effect to the words; and then, looking to the analogy of the common case of administration, he saw that to be a reasonable time within which that trust should be executed. Now your lordships are asked on that foundation to decide here that there must be a twelvemonth given, within which there is to be no enjoyment of the tenant for life, that is, because, in a case where there was a direction for accumulation generally, and the Court restrained that in favour of enjoyment, in favour of the gift taking effect as early as might be, so that the tenants for life should be put on an equal footing, you are asked to apply that to this case in order to introduce what you do not find on the face of the will, a direction to accumulate for a whole year from the death of the testator—why not three months? There is no strict or proper analogy between getting in an estate to pay legacies and debts and the case before you of investing a large sum of money in the purchase of real estate in Scotland. He was forced to allow that accumulation to go on at the expense of the tenant for life, and he strained the law to meet the justice of the case; but your lordships are asked to strain the rule of law in order to do injustice, to do precisely the opposite of that which Lord Eldon strained the rules of law to effect. It is perfectly manifest that if this case had come before Lord Eldon, he would without hesitation have decided that the tenant for life was entitled as from the death of the testator. Now Sitwell v. Bernard, as I well know, was for a long time misunderstood. Lord Eldon himself complained of it, that it had been misunderstood—somehow or other it was generally supposed that Lord Eldon had laid down some general rule. No other case ever came before him in which he did not take very great pains to explain to the Bar that what he had decided was what I have stated, and he always took care to disclaim any intention of laying down a general rule applicable to the case before your lordships. Then came that case before Sir J. Leach, Stott v. Hollingsworth. It is not possible to say, with all the respect one feels for that learned judge, but that he miscarried in that case. Having been counsel there, I have reason to know there was an appeal against it, and it was compromised. Lord Eldon himself said as to that case, in the later case of Angerstein v. Martin, that if that case had been brought before him, he should have required elaborate argument before he came to that conclusion. The whole of the suit was nothing about the gift of a residue to persons for life, with gifts over, and the whole of the estate was actually converted, a great part of the property was actually in a state in which they were capable of receiving the income, and the other part had been converted long before the year. Sir J. Leach thought fit to deny the tenant for life that to which he was entitled. Your lordships may safely be advised that that is not the law. Then came Angerstein v. Martin and Hewitt v. Morris. Now as far as they go, they are not exactly this case; but as far as they go, they are both clearly authorities in this case. In each case Lord Eldon gave the tenant for life the fund as from the death, whereas if the rule is to prevail which has been contended for at your lordships' bar, they would not have been entitled, but there ought to have been a time allowed; there should have been a period. Clearly they do not adopt the rule which is contended for at your lordships' bar, and it is not worth while again to read to you the passages; but Lord Eldon does shew the clearest opinion, that the true view in these cases is to give the interest or the rents to the tenant for life, as from the death. He observes in Hewitt v. Morris, speaking of Angerstein v. Martin, what could I have done, if there had been a purchase in February—the testator having died in January, meaning to say, if there had been a purchase in February, the tenant for life must have taken the receipts. He was arguing evidently in his own mind, "how can I refuse to this tenant for life from the death of the testator the interest of the fund, if being converted three or four weeks after the death he would have been entitled to the property?" And he observes, what is very important, in Hewitt v. Morris, and Angerstein v. Martin. He says, "I understand observations have been made that this (Sitwell v. Bernard) is an exceptional case. My answer to that is, that it has nothing to do with the general law." That is the real truth of the case; it is a case that stands by itself, and is not governed by the general law under which it has been attempted to bring the case. Then, my lords, how stand subsequent authorities? I agree as to the case before Sir Antony Hart (La Terrière v. Bulmer), but without going into any examination of that, he went two-thirds on the way, and then stopped a little short on his road; but he certainly did not give the unconverted part, and there is no reported case that follows that. In the case of Douglas v. Congreve, before Lord Langdale, his lordship went through all the authorities, and he clearly followed what I have stated to be the opinion of Lord Eldon, in Angerstein v. Martin, and Hewitt v. Morris; and it is singular enough, that Sir A. Hart, in the case before him, professed to follow Hewitt v. Morris. So that, although he did not go to the extent to which he ought to have gone, in my opinion, according to Hewitt v. Morris, yet he approved of the authority. So that it is not a decision in opposition to what has been decided, but it is a decision by a judge not following out a rule laid down by a former judge, but miscarrying in carrying it to the extent to which he ought to have gone. Now, as to the case before Lord Langdale, it was said in argument at the bar about that case, that Lord Langdale introduced the difficulty, that there was no contest or controversy until he introduced it. Now, my lords, it is not just to say so, because, in consequence of the decision in Sitwell v. Bernard, and Stott v. Hollingsworth, there was a considerable misunderstanding, and Lord Langdale makes this observation: "It is embarrassing to find the rule in cases of this nature so little settled. Lord Eldon seems to have considered the tenant for life entitled to the whole interest for the first year; Sir J. Leach thought him entitled to no part of such interest; Lord Lyndhurst thought him entitled to such a sum by way of interest, as would have accrued as dividends upon so much Three per Cents. as the residue would have purchased at the end of the year; and Sir A. Hart thought him entitled to the interest from the death of that part of the residue which, at the testator's death, was invested in the securities pointed out by his will. But that the interest on such part of the residue as was not so invested was to be added to the capital." Then he makes this observation, which applies to the case before your lordships: "In a case where there is no direction to accumulate, and, therefore, no direction to add interest to capital, it appears to me more likely to have been the intention of the testator, that until the lapse of such convenient time as may be allowed to the executor to make the conversion directed by the will, the tenant for life should enjoy the interest actually accrued; and if it should be held, as in Dimes v. Scott, that the conversion ought to be made in a year, I think that no inconvenience can follow from allowing the tenant for life the interest of the residue making interest, as it stood at the time of the testator's death, until the end of one year, or so much of that year as shall elapse before the conversion of the residue according to the direction of the will." That is clearly a dictum in favour of the rule as I am submitting it to your lordships. Lord Lyndhurst, in Dimes v. Scott, came to the same conclusion. I readily admit he came to that conclusion at the end of an argument on another point, and therefore I do not give to it all the weight to which his decisions are so justly entitled; but he must have considered this to be the rule, and he acted on it. In the case before Vice-Chancellor Wigram, his Honour went into a considerable comment on the cases; he was a little embarrassed with it, but he admitted the rule. Therefore, my lords, I have no difficulty on the rule of law upon the authorities, as I think it is now settled. The difficulty which has arisen in the late cases is of a different nature: it is not a difficulty whether the tenant for life is entitled at the death of the testator or not: that is not the difficulty, and I have long considered that a perfectly settled question; but the difficulty is this, in what manner he is to have the benefit of that rule as between himself and the person entitled in remainder. In a case like this before your lordships it is a case of Three per Cents., and therefore he would clearly take the interest without making any call on the capital, according to the rules of equity; but where, as in the case of Angerstein v. Martin, it was Russia stock bearing a large interest, there a difficulty may arise, and there are other cases of the same sort. Lord Eldon gave to the tenant for life even that. Judges have since supposed that his attention was not drawn to it. I do not think his attention was called to it, that is, the difficulty was not then suggested, if you do give to the tenant for life the first year's income, yet give it him in that way which will be consistent with the rules of the Court in dealing with a tenant for life in remainder. I think Lord Eldon's attention was not called to that, but subsequent decisions have taken a fair course in that respect, and there will be no difficulty in dealing with a case of that sort when it arises. In this case we are relieved from all such difficulty, and therefore, without going further into a point which I have myself for many years considered to be decided, viz. the rule in question, I submit to your lordships that, so far as this point was decided against the appellants in the Court below, that interlocutor must be reversed, and it must be declared that that sum, the first year's dividends, was properly paid in the way it was; therefore the representatives of Sir J. Macpherson are not liable in respect of that.

Lord Brougham.—My lords, I quite agree. I have had no doubt from the beginning that the Court below had miscarried; and without going into the argument upon which my noble and learned friend has already addressed your lordships at great, though by no means unnecessary length, without going into that argument, I wish to profess my opinion to be entirely the same with his on that subject. With respect to his comments on the different cases, of course it is unnecessary that I should follow him in those comments. I agree with my noble and learned friend in the conclusion at which he has arrived, and in his comments also on the cases. With respect to Stott v. Hollingsworth, before Sir J. Leach, I take it to be quite clear that that can no longer be law. As to La Terrière v. Bulmer, before Sir A. Hart, so far as that goes, I also am inclined to differ from that. I think that Douglas v. Congreve, before Lord Langdale, and Taylor v. Clarke, before Vice-Chancellor Wigram, take a right view of the law. Dimes v. Scott, before Lord Lyndhurst, may be subject to some doubts, I mean with respect to the manner in which that case was decided, which really was not argued before my noble and learned friend who decided it; therefore I say nothing on that case, leaving the subject for that and other reasons. On the whole, my lords, I am quite satisfied that we do well in reversing the judgment of the Court below on this point of the construction, and in declaring our opinion that that is the law, both here and in Scotland.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S COURT.

(Before Lord St. Leonards, L.C.)

May 31 and June 1.

Re St. George's Steam-packet Company, ex parte Hamers' Devisees.

Joint-Stock Company—Winding-up Act—Contributory—3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 101.

H. the holder of shares in a joint-stock company, by his will devised his real estate to A. and appointed B. his executor, who for many years received dividends on the shares. At the death of H. there were no debts existing on the part of the company. Debts subsequently accrued, and on the winding up of the company, B.'s name was put on the list of contributories; but, on his representing that the personal estate of his testator had been duly administered, the Master put A.'s name, as the devisee of H. on the list:

Held, affirming the decision of the Master, but overruling that of the Vice-Chancellor, that, under stat. 3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 104, A. as devisee, was liable.

By the statute 3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 104, debts of every description are charged on the real estate of a testator: consequently, a future debt, arising out of a previous obligation, is a debt within its provisions.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce, reported 17 Law T. Rep. 24.

Bacon, Rolt, and J. V. Prior, appeared for the official manager (the appellant), and cited Birmingham v. Burke, 2 I. & Lat. 699; Morse v. Tucker, 3 Hare, 79; St. George's Steam-packet Company, ex parte Doyle, 2 Hal. & Tw. 229.

Bethell, Malins, and Hamilton Humphreys, for the respondents, cited Wilson v. Knubley, 7 East, 128; Farley v. Bryant, 3 Ad. & El. 839; The South Staffordshire Railway Company v. Burnside, 20 L. J. 120, Ex.

Bacon replied.

The Lord Chancellor.—This is a case in which, after several years, an attempt is made to charge the real estate of a shareholder in this company (the estate having been devised by him) with the liability which the company has incurred long after his death. The shareholder entered into a deed of covenant (which I shall more particularly refer to hereafter) for carrying on, in common with others, this joint-stock company for ninety-nine years, and at the time of his death it seems that there were no debts existing, and that a debt afterwards accrued. Therefore, at the time when the devise of the real estate, which was not charged by the will, took effect, there was, in point of fact, no debt actually incurred. The question is, whether the real estate is now chargeable, some twelve years after the death of the testator. If it be so, the court must submit to it, no doubt; but it is a very inconvenient disposition of property by the Legislature, to render real estate liable, at a considerable distance of time, for transactions over which the devisee himself had no control. The shares, by the deed of partnership, belong to the executors, as representatives of the testator. It has been very forcibly argued,—very well argued,—that under the deed the proprietorship vests in the executor in a case like this; but, the contrary has been decided, and I have no intention to interfere with that decision; I think it is right, although it is a case of considerable nicety. Therefore, it having been decided that the executors, continuing to receive the dividend in the quality of representatives,—which was this case,—do not become proprietors: I may put that out of the question. Then, the deed itself must be looked at, to see what obligations it created. It is a deed by which the parties covenant, and, being under seal, it is a specialty, that they will carry on this trade without benefit of survivorship for ninety-nine years. That covenant I have already said is a specialty, but it does not bind the heir, because the heir is not mentioned; but, being a contract, it does bind the personal estate beyond all question, and goes to the whole extent of the personal estate; and the devisees who took the estates not charged by the will with debts, and who had no control, properly speaking, over the personal estate, might probably have compelled the executor to come to some account, which would have put an end to the liability of the real estate. I give no opinion how that is to be effected,—it is a matter of difficulty; but the devisee made no attempt of that sort in any way, and he remained, I have no doubt, perfectly secure in the belief that no attack would have been made on this property; and a very hard case it is, no doubt, if that liability should be established. Now, the deed not creating anything but a specialty debt, not binding the heir, it is quite clear in the first place, that unless the Act of Parliament provides for this case, no relief can be granted against the holder of the real estate. The Act of William and Mary has been referred to; but that does not bear upon this case, because, although the word "debts" was used, it was used in a limited sense; it was used with reference to an action of debt. In Wilson v. Knubley it was, by a somewhat strict construction, held, that where a debt would not lie, properly speaking, the Act did not operate to bind the devisee; and in the case of Farley v. Bryant, which has been here referred to, that doctrine was carried a little further no doubt; but still both those decisions depended upon that particular Act of Parliament, which contained those words of restriction, —a very limited Act, but it was an Act brought in to remedy the defect; no doubt it did not extend to this case, because it only extended to cases still where heirs were bound, and did not intend to go beyond that: it was intended to remedy the particular mischief which it did remedy effectually. Then at last we come to the 3 & 4 Wm. 4, 101, and the question is, whether this case falls within that? I am not surprised at the difficulty which occurs, because I think that the Act is ambiguously framed, and it is not easy to come to a very satisfactory conclusion upon its operation; but it recites, "that it is expedient that the payment of the debts of all persons should be secured more effectually." Then it enacts, "that when any person shall die, seised of or entitled to any estate or interest, &c. which he shall not by his last will have charged with or devised subject to the payment of his debts, the same shall be assets to be administered in Courts of Equity, for the payment of the just debts of such persons, as well debts due on simple contract as on specialty; and that the heir or heirs-at-law, customary heir or heirs, devisee or devisees, of such debtor, shall be liable to all the same suits in equity at the suit of any of the creditors of such debtor, whether creditors by simple contract or by specialty, as the heir or heirs-at-law, devisee or devisees, of any person or persons who died seised of freehold estates, was or were, before the passing of this Act, liable to in respect of such freehold estates, at the suit of creditors by specialty, in which the heirs were bound." Stopping there, undoubtedly there is a difficulty; because, although first the enactment is, "that where a man shall not by his last will have charged or devised his estates, subject to the payment of his debts, the same shall be assets, to be administered in Courts of Equity for the payment of the just debts of such persons, as well debts due on simple contract as on specialty;" yet it afterwards refers to the remedy, as it would be "against the heir or heirs, or devisee or devisees, if they had been bound." I think the true construction of the Act, taken altogether, is to charge debts of every description on the real estates of the testator; and the difficulty which was raised in the argument in regard to this, was the case in which it was a specialty, and not a simple contract debt, and the heirs were not bound, and, therefore, did not fall within this provision. I think this is clearly answered by the proviso in the Act, which has not been stated: "Provided always, that in the administration of assets by Courts of Equity, under and by virtue of this Act, all creditors by specialty in which the heirs are bound, shall be paid the full amount of the debts due to them before any of the creditors, by simple contract or by specialty, in which the heirs are not bound, shall be paid any part of their demands." The Act of Parliament, therefore, provides expressly for the payment of money by way of a certain priority of specialty debts, where the heirs are not bound. Now this is a case in which it is a specialty debt, and the heirs are not bound; yet under the colour of the provisions of this Act of Parliament it is plain, taking the whole Act together, by its provisions, though no doubt singularly framed, yet on the true construction I apprehend it includes all debts, and such a debt as the present. Now there is another way of construing the Act, which is to me very satisfactory. The Act is not to extend to any case in which there is a special devise subject to the payment of debts. What did the Act of Parliament therefore mean? What was the intention of the Act of Parliament? What was the want which it meant to supply? It meant to supply the want of the charge by the will of debts upon the real estate,—debts generally, not in the confined and restricted sense in which we find it in the Act of Parliament of William and Mary, or in the later Acts, but generally, "any debts, as well by simple contract as by specialty." It appears to me, therefore, that it is settled (not considering my own authority, but another authority not appealed from), that where there is a general charge of debts, that includes not only present debts but future debts arising out of a similar obligation. Then if this Act of Parliament meant to do what I am clearly of opinion it did mean in effect to do, and if it was sufficient to carry that intention into execution, that is, to make a charge here where the testator had neglected himself to make the charge by his will, then this case falls within the authorities to which I have referred; consequently, a future debt, arising out of the previous obligation, is a debt within the provisions of this Act of Parliament. It appears to me, I must say, with great deference to the other learned authorities, that this is a charge which would be a debt provided for under the provisions of this Act of Parliament. Well, if that be so, then, primâ facie, the estate will be liable, and the only point arises on the subsequent conduct and the provisions of the deed. Now, the deed has provided that the party shall become a proprietor, although he shall not have the benefit until he has done some act, such as receiving dividends. Here he was permitted to receive dividends; but the same thing occurred in the case already decided, which I have referred to, and from which I do not intend to depart, in which the executor did not become a proprietor or entitled in his own right, but continued to be entitled as representative. In the books, which I have looked through carefully, the executor never receives a payment, except in the character of representative. I think that is clear from the books; therefore there is no personal liability. Now, I do not see how, therefore, I can restrain the company as between themselves, from enforcing the liability of the real estate as against the devisee. I do not see how it is possible. They have not done any act which would prevent their coming against any property which was liable to the engagement of the company as between themselves. I am not speaking of creditors; I am speaking as between themselves. They have performed the obligation with the assistance of the Act of Parliament. The obligation of the deed binds the man's real and personal estate, which would have ceased if the executor had sold, and a new purchaser had been introduced. No such transaction took place, therefore the estate remained; in point of fact, the share remained the share and property of the testator, and his real and personal property, by the Act of Parliament, and by the force of the deed, jointly, did become and so remain liable to the obligation. Then, what are the acts which are to discharge this? If what was argued could have been made out, that the acts which have taken place have substituted the executors proprietors, that would have been something which would have carried the point to the proper extent, and then the executor, becoming himself a proprietor in his own right, the estate might have been discharged; but that operation has not taken place. Then the property still remains the property and estate of the testator, and all his property is liable. I see nothing, therefore, in the consequence, I may say, of the company not having made any motion against the real estate, which it was necessary for them to do were the personal estate insufficient to answer the obligation, which can in any manner affect their right to go against the real estate. I dismiss the cases of the bankruptcy, because I think they have no bearing upon the case. Then it is said you cannot attack the real estate. First, you cannot attack the devisee ... is not the contention. Beyond all doubt, ... in this respect as a representative. The executor could not be charged personally, the devisee could not be charged personally; but he must be charged ... the character of a devisee. Then, it ... that being in the place of a suit for administration, you cannot come against this party, except in the course of administration; therefore you must shew that the personal estate has been exhausted, before you can come against the real estate. Those are questions which I have not to decide. This gentleman is put, in respect of the real estate, as a contributory to the losses of this company. As between himself and his copartners, he will have a right to say the personal estate shall go first. That will not prevent his liability, if the personal estate should be exhausted. He will have a right to say that the personal estate shall go first—he will have a right to say, if that personal estate is exhausted, the real estate in his hand is not to be liable; consequently he is put, and must be put and remain on, as a contributory in respect of the real estate. Those are points which will arise hereafter as to the extent of the obligation. It is with very sincere regret that I differ from the learned judge of the Court below, and I cannot differ from him without great doubts whether I am deciding rightly or wrongly. I am of opinion that the liability does remain, and therefore I must declare that this gentleman must be put upon the list as a contributory.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

(Before the LORDS JUSTICES.)

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. THE GOVERNORS OF HARROW SCHOOL.

Exhibition from public school to universities—Proper duration of when not mentioned by donor.

A testator left stock, producing 100l. a year, for an exhibition, towards the maintenance and support of a scholar going from a public school to the universities, but did not mention for what period he was to hold it.

Held, reversing the decision of the Court below, affirming the Master's report, that four and not six years was a proper period.

The testator in this cause, Mr. Richard Gregory, made his will, dated the 22nd of October, 1838, and also a codicil, dated on the same day. The codicil was partly as follows:—"Whereas, out of regard to the memory of my first wife, Isabella Gregory, and to the said free grammar-school of John Lyon, in the said town of Harrow-on-the-Hill, and for the promotion of science and literature, I am further desirous, with the concurrence of the governors of the possessions, revenues, and goods of the said school, to found a Harrow exhibition, to be call 'The Isabella Gregory Exhibition,' for the benefit of the members of the said school who shall become students at either of the universities of Cambridge or Oxford." The testator then directed for this purpose that his executors should transfer sufficient Three per Cent. Consols into the names of the governors of the school to produce from dividends 100l. a year, and to apply the same in or towards the maintenance and support of such one of the scholars of Harrow School who should from time to time be selected under the regulations contained in the second schedule to the codicil, during such period as such scholar should be a member of either of the universities of Cambridge or Oxford, under the regulations and restrictions contained in such second schedule. That schedule contained, among others, the sixth regulation, in the following words, but having a blank for the number of years.—"6th. That the first and each successive exhibitioner shall be entitled to the said annual dividends so long as he shall be and continue a resident member of either of the universities of Cambridge or Oxford, either as an undergraduate or bachelor, for the term of — — complete years, to be computed from the date at which the first half-yearly dividend payable to such exhibitioner after his appointment shall become due at the Bank of England," &c.

On the 13th of April, 1840, Mr. H. M. Wilkins was elected Isabella Gregory Exhibitioner, and received 300l. in the whole in three successive years. In June 1843 Mr. F. W. Smythe was elected to the exhibition, but Mr. H. M. Wilkins claiming to be entitled to it for a longer period than three years, an information was filed by the Attorney-General at the relation of Mr. H. M. Wilkins, praying a declaration as to what was the period for which the exhibition was to be held. On a reference being made to the Master, Sir Giffin Wilson, on the 25th of November, 1845, reported that six years was a proper period, and on the 9th of March, 1847, Vice-Chancellor Sir James Wigram overruled exceptions taken to the Master's report.

The governors now appealed from his Honour's decision, praying that the period of four years might be fixed for the duration of the exhibition.

Bethell and Toller appeared in support of the appeal, and read a letter from Dr. Butler, Dean of Peterborough, formerly head master of Harrow School, whose son, H. M. Butler, was the present exhibitioner, addressed to the solicitor of the governors of the school, in which he expressed his approbation of the steps the governors were about to take to restrict the tenure of the scholarship to from six to four years, giving his consent as far as he legally could, that his son, who was then a minor, should give immediate effect to the decision of the Court in case the term for the tenure of the scholarship should be restricted in the manner proposed. It was also submitted to the Court that four years would be preferable to three years, as the latter would not cover the period of residence at the university, and to six years, as the exhibition would be more frequently an object of competition, so as to benefit the school by stimulating the exertions of the scholars, and would be co-extensive with their necessary residence at the university.

James, for the Attorney-General, offered no opposition.

Lord Justice Lord CRANWORTH was of opinion that the term, as fixed by the Master for filling up the blank in the schedule to the codicil was too long. He agreed with the opinion intimated by Sir James Wigram that a shorter period would be the most beneficial arrangement for the school and the scholars; that it was by no means desirable to hold out inducements to men to reside at the university after the completion of their education. In the court below, it seemed to be considered that the shorter term of three years could not be adopted, because Mr. Gregory himself contemplated the exhibition being held by a bachelor. There was, however, nothing stringent in that objection, and if it appeared to his lordship that it would be more for the advantage of the school itself, as of the scholars, that a term of four years should be adopted, and the Court, so far as he ... concerned, would sanction that course.

SIMS v. HITTING.

Claim—Appeal from the whole decree—Right to begin.

The right to open on an appeal from a decree made on a claim, is to be governed by the same rules as when the appeal is from a decree where the suit is commenced by a bill. A plaintiff, therefore, on an appeal from the whole decree by the defendant, has a right to open the appeal.

In this case a decree having been made on a claim in favour of the plaintiff, in the court below, and the defendant having appealed from the whole decree, the question arose which side had a right to open the appeal.

Roundell Palmer and Sandys, for the plaintiff, insisted on their right to begin.

Bethell and Tripp, for the defendants, contended that by the 29th of the orders of April, 1850, it is said, "that any order made in pursuance of these orders may be discharged, altered, varied, or set aside on motion," and that, therefore, the appellant ought to begin, as if he were moving to discharge the order of the Court below.

Lord Justice Lord CRANWORTH. I think the better rule will be to abide by the analogy to a decree pronounced in a suit by bill, and to treat this appeal, and all appeals on claims in that manner. The appeal being against the whole decree, the plaintiff will begin. I do not think that by the word "motion" in the orders, there was any intention to give any collateral advantage as to opening and reply in the case of an appeal.

IN LUNACY.

Friday, May 28.

Re ANNE HEWSON.

Lunatic—Husband and wife—Allowance to husband out of wife's separate income, according to arrangement acted upon—Allowance to a relative of lunatic.

A husband having entered into an arrangement with his wife, who had a separate income of her own, that she was to pay for the expenses of their household establishment out of her separate income:

Held, that the husband's representatives, in accounting for the wife's separate income, which was received by the husband after his wife had become of unsound mind, ought to be allowed to deduct a sum for the expenses of the household establishment, according to the arrangement; allowance also was made for a sum advanced by husband to a nephew of his wife, whom she had brought up, according to the promise of the wife before she became of unsound mind.

The lunatic in this case, who was the widow of Mr. T. A. Hewson, a medical man, was entitled to a very considerable income arising from property settled to her separate use. There had been an arrangement between Mr. and Mrs. Hewson (not reduced to writing), that all the expenses of their establishment in London, except the expenses attending the carriages and horses, should be paid out of the income of the separate property of Mrs. Hewson. This arrangement was acted upon from the year 1823 until the 3rd of April, 1845, when Mrs. Hewson became of unsound mind. From that time until the time of his death, Mr. Hewson received the income of his wife's separate property. A suit having been instituted to administer Mr. Hewson's estate, upon Mrs. Hewson's committee claiming the income of her separate property received by her husband, his representatives insisted upon their right to set off against that demand, the money expended by Mr. Hewson in keeping up their establishment, pursuant to the arrangement before mentioned. The representatives of Mr. Hewson also claimed to be allowed a sum of 250l. under the following circumstances. Mrs. Hewson, being the aunt of Mr. W. Parkins, with whom she had been in constant habits of intimacy since his boyhood, and prior to her lunacy had been at the expense of placing and keeping him at school; had paid for his apprenticeship and maintenance; had given him to understand that she would provide for his advancement in life; and at her request he had (previously to the month of April 1845) left a situation in a wholesale house of business upon the faith of a promise made to him by Mrs. Hewson, to give him the sum of 500l. to enable him to start in business, but she was prevented by her lunacy intervening from completely fulfilling her said promise, although she had given to him 50l. in part performance of it. Mr. Parkins having communicated his aunt's intention to Mr. Hewson, he thereupon presented him with a cheque for 250l. which was entered in the banking book of Mrs. Hewson (who had a separate account with a banker) on the 6th of December, 1846.

Stuart, Malins, Bacon, Shapter, F. Wood, Bolton, and Young, appeared for the several parties.

Their LORDSHIPS considered the evidence adduced sufficient to prove the existence of the arrangement, and that the expenses of the establishment came to about 550l. a year. They thought, therefore, that would be the proper sum to allow the representatives of the husband for every year from the lunacy of the wife until his death.

As to the second claim their lordships thought that having regard to the moral obligation of Mrs. Hewson to fulfil her promise to her nephew, and the reasonable probability that she would have done so had she remained of sound mind, allowed the representatives of the husband the 250l. The result therefore would be that after deducting from the separate income of the wife received by the husband, the above-mentioned sums allowed to them, the husband's estate will have to pay the balance to the credit of the lunacy. In order, however, to save the parties unnecessary expense, their lordships requested that the matter of the present petition should be mentioned to them on a subsequent day, when an order could be drawn up in the lunacy and in the cause.

Ex parte YELLAND, re THE PORT OF LONDON SHIP OWNERS' LOAN AND ASSURANCE COMPANY, and re THE JOINT-STOCK COMPANIES WINDING-UP ACTS.

Joint-Stock Companies Winding-up Acts—Contributory.

A. B. applied for shares in a completely registered company, two shares were allotted to him, on which he paid the deposit, and his name was returned to the Registry Office as a shareholder; but he never executed the deed of settlement. The deed of settlement provided, that immediately upon the execution of the deed of settlement, the person executing the same, being a person duly entitled by original subscription, or by transfer, should be forthwith entered on the register of shareholders, and duly returned to the Joint-Stock Registry Office, under the provisions of the Registration Act, should thenceforth, but not before, assume the liabilities and privileges of a shareholder. On the company being wound up:

Held, that the allottee was properly placed on the list of contributories.

This was a motion on behalf of Robert Easton Yelland, by way of appeal from the decision of Vice-Chancellor Parker, who refused to strike the name of the said Robert Easton Yelland out of the list of contributories of the second class, where it had been placed by the decision of Master Tinney.

The material facts of the case are stated, 19 Law T. Rep. 30.

Willcock and Terrell, in support of the appeal, cited Ex parte Hall, 1 Mac. & G. 307.

Roxburgh and Morris, for the official manager, were not called upon.

Lord Justice Lord CRANWORTH.—I entertain no doubt upon the question, whether Mr. Yelland's name has been properly placed upon the list of contributories. The Act of Parliament said that the word "contributory" should include every member of a company, and also every other person liable to contribute to the payment of any of the debts, liabilities, or losses thereof, whether as heir, devisee, executor or administrator of a former member of the same, deceased or otherwise howsoever. Although the Court is always reluctant, in these cases of contributories, to hold a man liable to a debt to which he is not liable at law, yet this is always with the qualification that such person had not, by having contracted to become a member of the company, incurred all the liabilities of an actual member. Now, in the case before the Court, Mr. Yelland has applied for shares, and having received an allotment accordingly, has paid a deposit on such allotment, and has afterwards assented to a communication acknowledging the receipt of such deposit by the company. Under these circumstances, Mr. Yelland must be held to have contracted, and to be clearly bound to become a member of the company. He is therefore liable, in that character, to contribute to the debts and liabilities of the company, and consequently his name has been properly placed on the list.

VICE-CHANCELLOR TURNER'S COURT.

Reported by J. HENRY COOKE, Esq. Barrister-at-Law.

March 25 and 26, and April 1.

THE DUKE OF NORFOLK v. TENNANT.

Special Act of Parliament, Lands Clauses Consolidation Act—Compensation—Injunction.

A. was empowered by a special Act of Parliament to erect a new market. In this Act the Lands Clauses Act was incorporated. B. the owner of premises, claimed compensation against A. for narrowing the streets, for obstructing the thoroughfare, and for interfering with the light and air. He gave notice of his claim, and then gave notice of proceeding to arbitration. A. filed his bill for an injunction, which set forth, as was the fact, that there had been a treaty for compensation for narrowing the street, and for obstructing the thoroughfares, but not as to the light and air, and the Court being of opinion that the nature of the compensation treated for was clear, granted an injunction, restraining proceedings under the notice, but left B. at liberty to give any other notice respecting the 3rd branch of his complaint.

The Bill in this case was filed by the Duke of Norfolk against the defendant, Tennant and others, the owners of a brewery, called the Exchange Brewery, at Sheffield, to restrain them from proceeding, under certain notices he had given, under the compensation clauses of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. The Duke was empowered by a special Act (10 & 11 Vict. c. 45), in which the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act was incorporated, to remove the old market at Sheffield, and to erect a new market; and the Act contained the usual powers of stopping up thoroughfares during the progress of the works, diverting the ways, &c. The brewery entrance opened into a street called Castlefolds, which street was of the proper width for carts and other vehicles, and separated the brewery from the market-place. During the works the Castlefolds was blocked up, and ultimately the same was permanently narrowed by the formation of the new market-place. Upon this Messrs. Tennant and Co. gave to the Duke two notices of their intention to proceed by arbitration for the recovery of compensation under the 68th and other sections of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act,—firstly, for a more than necessary obstruction of the thoroughfare through Castlefolds; secondly, for the permanent contraction of the road; and, thirdly, for the obstruction of the light and air, by reason of the new market buildings being raised much higher than the former buildings. The first notice was dated 29th January, 1852, which set forth the title of Messrs. Tennant and Co. and that their premises were injuriously affected by the height of the new buildings, and by their being brought nearer to the brewery, and the narrowing the Castlefolds, and impeding the circulation of the air from south to west, and also by the temporary and unwarranted obstruction of the Castlefolds. For these three particular items a claim was made respectively for 800*l.* 14,000*l.* and 200*l.* This notice was served on the Duke of Norfolk and his agents. The second notice, dated 27th of February following, was served in the same way, and it stated that Mr. John Monk had been appointed the arbitrator on behalf of Messrs. Tennant and Co. and that under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act that gentleman would assess the damage, if the Duke did not within sixteen days nominate an arbitrator on his behalf. Before the expiration of the fourteen days, the Duke filed his bill against Messrs. Tennant and Co. praying an injunction to restrain all proceedings under these notices, which set forth, and the same was supported by affidavit, that the brewery in question had been granted by demise from the Earl of Bridgewater, dated 1826, for ninety-nine years; that in 1843 an underlease had been granted for fourteen years, at a rent of 200*l.* per annum. The defendants were now possessed of this underlease. The reversion in the lease of ninety-nine years, after the determination of the underlease, was now in the Duke of Norfolk, to whom the 200*l.* rent was payable. Shortly after the commencement of the works, on the 21st August, 1850, the defendants objected to the progress of the new buildings; and on the 17th September an interview took place between the architect of the plaintiff and the defendant's solicitor, which was followed by others, in the course of which it was proposed that a certain sum should be paid for compensation, and that a receipt should be given in the following form:—"20th Oct. 1850. Received the sum of £ as compensation for the damage, &c. by the erection, execution, or formation of the works now in progress, or other the works to be done in execution of the Sheffield Market Act." The defendant refused to confirm this agreement, but an agreement was ultimately entered into that the defendant was to retain a half year's rent, and also to have a small portion of an adjoining court-yard, which were expressed to be received by the defendant "in full compensation for any damage to the brewery premises, or to me, as the tenant under the indenture of 1843, by reason of the proceedings under the Act, 10 & 11 Vict. c. 45, rendering it necessary to stop up Exchange-street, running along the side of the brewery, and also by reason of the said new market, when built, projecting so far as to contract the street to 12 feet 1 inch." It was stated the name "Exchange-street" was used by mistake for "Castlefolds;" that this receipt was on the 12th of November, 1850, left for engrossment with the solicitor of the plaintiff, who engrossed it, and sent it to the defendant's solicitor for the signature of the defendant; and at the same time a stamped receipt for two quarter's rent, less income-tax, was sent, and that the defendant took possession of the piece of land mentioned as being included in the compensation.

Sir W. P. Wood and Ellison moved for the injunction, stating that although the case arose under the same clauses of the Lands Clauses Act as the cases of the London and North-Western Railway v. Smith, 1 Mac. & Gor. 217, The East and West India Docks Railway Company v. Gattke, 3 Mac & Gor. 155; and The Sutton Harbour Improvement Company v. Hitchins, 16 Jur. 70, still the circumstances materially differed, as the party here seeking damages had already received his stipulated compensation. This stipulated compensation they contended reached to all the damage which the defendant might suffer; but if not, it clearly reached to some of the matters mentioned in the notices under which he was attempting to proceed; and if it were unjust that the defendant should proceed for part of the matters in these notices, he could not proceed under these notices at all.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—Can I interfere to a limited extent only on this motion?

Rolt and Speed, for the defendants, in the first place, contended that the Court had no jurisdiction at all in this matter; that a jury or an arbitrator could find a partial satisfaction or a limited damage, just as well as they could find a complete satisfaction, or no damage at all; and this was the ground for refusing the injunction in Gattke's case, and the case of the Sutton Harbour Company. Secondly, that there was no conclusive agreement for compensation ever entered into; the whole thing was no more than a treaty; and, thirdly, that if there were a conclusive agreement, it only extended to two heads, and that on the third (viz.), the obstruction of light and air, which was much the most important, the defendants had compensation to receive, which they wished to have assessed in the way pointed out by the statute. At any rate, all the Court could do was to restrain from proceeding on two of the matters mentioned in the notices.

Sir W. P. Wood in reply.—The other side seek to confine the case to the single point that the defendant has a legal remedy given him by the statute. But even this we deny; for this proceeding, which he calls a legal remedy, is to assess damages for matters in respect of which he has already agreed to receive, and received, compensation: therefore nothing remains to be assessed or compensated.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—Your difficulty is this, that your case on the face of your bill is, that compensation has been made. You admit, therefore, that damage has been done: that these lands have been injuriously affected. Therefore, you do not come within the ground of Smith's case, which is, that it was doubtful whether any damage had occurred: but say that it has been compensated. They say only partially compensated, assuming that a conclusive agreement has been made at all. The question is, whether a jury can entertain the question of partial satisfaction, and find that so much damage has not been satisfied. Is there any jurisdiction in the jury to entertain the question of satisfaction? [You can plead it in an action in the award.] The result of that would be, that whatever a portion of the damage has been satisfied, the parties must come into equity.

Sir W. P. Wood.—There is no reported case of partial satisfaction. If we appoint an arbitrator we admit the jurisdiction, and therefore could not plead the complete satisfaction which we allege to have been made. After the terms of sec. 25, how could we ever allege there was no jurisdiction in the arbitrator? The frame of the Bill is perfectly correct. The case made out is, that the defendant having entered into an agreement to accept satisfaction, keeps back from the full performance of his side, and does not put us in such a position as that we can safely go before a jury.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—Have you any allegation in the bill that the agreement was that the receipts should be exchanged?

Sir W. P. Wood.—Not expressly; but the defendant, having received his part, is bound not to agitate those claims which he agreed to waive.

Thursday, April 1.—The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The question for my decision in this case is, whether, under the circumstances, the injunction ought to be granted, or whether the Court is bound to refuse its aid. The case stated by the bill is in substance this: that the defendant agreed to accept a plot of ground and two quarters' rent due from him to the plaintiff, in satisfaction of the injury which he has sustained by the street having been obstructed and narrowed, and as to the obstruction of the light and air; and that the defendant has stood by and permitted the building to be erected to its present height without raising any objection. After carefully considering the affidavits on both sides, I am of opinion that, subject to questions which were raised on the argument on the part of the defendant as to the jurisdiction of the Court on the frame of the pleadings, there is a sufficient case for the injunction. The questions which were raised by the defendant as to the frame of the pleadings, and the jurisdiction of the Court were, that the bill alleged that the defendant had received compensation for the injury occasioned by the street having been obstructed and narrowed, and that this allegation brought the case directly within the principle of Gattke's case. But although this bill is not in this respect so aptly framed as it might have been, I think upon the whole the fair meaning of it is, not that the agreement has been completed and carried out, and the satisfaction perfected, but that the defendant has received consideration for an agreement which he refuses to perfect; thus opening the case for specific performance. And although the bill does not pray that relief, I think the facts are sufficiently stated for a decree to be founded upon them; and the case being thus opened upon the pleadings, I am of opinion that Gattke's case does not affect the present question. That case has overruled The London and North-Western Railway v. Smith, and has settled, on most satisfactory grounds, that this Court ought not to interfere by injunction to restrain parties who insist that their property has been injuriously affected within the meaning of the 68th clause of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, from prosecuting their claims according to the provisions of the Act, upon the mere ground that the Act has not provided the means of determining the preliminary question, whether the property has been injuriously affected or not; but it has settled no more. Whether the same rule would apply to a case in which there are several grounds of claim, some of which have been satisfied, remains yet to be determined; and not having had the benefit of a full argument upon that point, I shall not determine it. At all events, the case does not touch the question of the interference of this Court where there is an original equity affecting the claim. The case decides that where there is no original equity affecting the claim, the statute does not create such an equity; but where there is such an original equity affecting the claim, the statute does not, in my opinion, take it away. Being of opinion that the plaintiff in this case has sufficient grounds for contending that some at least of the claims of the defendant are affected by contract entered into before the claims were advanced, I think that this injunction must be granted. It was urged by the defendant that it ought to be so limited as to extend only to the claim for obstructing and narrowing the street, but having regard to the provisions of the Act as to costs, I think it cannot be so limited. The defendant, if he thinks it right to prosecute the claim as to obstruction of light and air before the equity of the present bill is determined, must give a fresh notice for the purpose. But in the meantime I must grant the injunction; although by granting it I do not mean that it will prevent the defendants from giving such other notices of claims for compensation as they think proper or may be advised. The injunction is expressly limited to restrain the defendants from taking up any proceeding under "the said notices," that is, under the notices of the 29th of January and the 27th of February, 1852.

VICE-CHANCELLOR PARKER'S COURT.

Reported by GEO. S. ALLNUTT, Esq. of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law.

April 16, 20, and 21.

THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY v. THE OXFORD, WORCESTER, AND WOLVERHAMPTON RAILWAY COMPANY and OTHERS.

Construction of railways—Broad and narrow gauge.

By their Act of Parliament, a railway company were to make a broad-gauge railway from Wolvercot (Great Western, a broad-gauge line) to Wolverhampton (North-Western, a narrow-gauge line), with additional narrow-gauge rails from Abbotswood, an intermediate place, to Wolverhampton. The company commenced at Wolverhampton, and constructed a single narrow-gauge line from that place to a place some distance south of Abbotswood, but, by the addition of a rail, this line could be readily converted into a mixed gauge. Upon a motion by the Great Western Railway Company for an injunction, it was Held, that the company were entitled to proceed with the construction of their railway in this manner, and also to make a mixed gauge line from Abbotswood to Wolvercot.

Semble, that the line from Wolvercot to Wolverhampton could not be opened until the broad-gauge line through the whole distance was completed; though parts of the line might be opened in the narrow-gauge only.

This was a motion by the Great Western Railway Company, that the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Railway Company, George Rushout, and others, and the servants and agents of the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Railway Company might be restrained from taking, or causing to be taken, any step, or doing, or causing to be done, any act, matter, or thing, and, in particular, from expending, or causing, or permitting to be expended, the moneys or funds of the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Railway Company, or any part thereof, or any moneys borrowed, or to be borrowed by, or on the credit of, the said last-mentioned company, or in any way pledging, or using the credit of the said last-mentioned company, in or towards, or for the purpose of constructing their said line of railway, in the first instance, otherwise than on the broad-gauge throughout its entire length, and so as to enable the same to be worked continuously with the said Great Western Railway, together with additional rails to the north of Abbotswood and side lines, pursuant to the provisions of the Acts of Parliament in the bill in this suit mentioned, and, in particular, that the said company and persons, and the servants and agents of the said last-mentioned company might be, in like manner, restrained under any circumstances from laying rails on the narrow gauge on the line between Abbotswood and Evesham, in the said bill also mentioned, or any part thereof, or any part of the line to the south of Abbotswood aforesaid, and that the said last-mentioned company and persons, and the servants and agents of the said last-mentioned company, might also be restrained as to that part of the line of the said Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Railway Company which lay to the north of Abbotswood aforesaid, from laying rails on the narrow gauge unless and until they should have laid rails throughout the entire length of the said railway on the broad gauge, and that the said last-mentioned company and persons, and the servants and agents of the said last-mentioned company, might also in like manner be restrained from opening or using any part of the said Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Railway, except the loop line in the said bill also mentioned, unless and until they should, as aforesaid, have laid and opened the said Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Railway throughout its entire length on the broad gauge, and also that the said last-mentioned company and persons, and the servants and agents of the said last-mentioned company, might in like manner be restrained from constructing or using any of the works of the said Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Railway or laying down or using the rails thereof, or any of them, otherwise than in conformity with the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Railway Act, 1845, and the several other Acts under which the said Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Railway was constituted, and, the true spirit thereof.

By sec. 28 of the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Railway Act, 1845, after reciting that plans and sections of the intended railway and branch railway, shewing the line and levels thereof, &c. had been deposited with the clerks of the peace of certain counties, it is enacted that, subject to the provisions therein and in the "Company's Clauses Consolidation Act," 1845; the "Lands Clauses Consolidation Act," 1845; and the "Railways Clauses Consolidation Act," 1845, it should be lawful for the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Company to make and maintain the said railway and branch railways in the line and upon the lands delineated upon the said plans, and described in the said books of reference.

By sec. 38, it is enacted, that the said railway, branch railways, and works, should be constructed and completed in all respects to the satisfaction of the engineer for the time being to the Great Western Railway Company, and that the said railway should be formed of such gauge, and according to such mode of construction, as would admit of the same being worked continuously with the Great Western Railway. By sec. 44, after reciting that the railway, by that Act, authorised to be made, was intended to be connected with the Birmingham and Gloucester Railway at Abbotswood, and with the Grand Junction Railway near Wolverhampton; and that the branch railway to Stoke Prior, thereby authorised, was also intended to be connected with the said Birmingham and Gloucester Railway, and that it was expedient that on the line of the said branch railway, and on the line to King's Wynford, thereby also authorised, as well as on the main line between the said Birmingham and Gloucester and Grand Junction Railways, additional rails should be laid down so as to adapt the said lines as well to the gauge of the said Birmingham and Gloucester and Grand Junction Railways as to the gauge of the Great Western Railway, for the purpose of admitting the free and uninterrupted passage of carriages, waggons, and trucks passing from or to the said Birmingham and Gloucester and Grand Junction Railway, it is enacted, that the said company thereby incorporated should, and they were thereby required, to lay down and maintain upon the whole extent of the railway thereby authorised between the point of junction thereof with the said Birmingham and Gloucester at Abbotswood, and the point of junction thereof with the said Grand Junction Railway, near Wolverhampton, as well as on the said branch railways thereby authorised, to King's Wynford and Stoke Prior aforesaid, such additional rails adapted to the gauge of the said Birmingham and Gloucester and Grand Junction Railways respectively, as might be requisite for allowing the free and uninterrupted passage as aforesaid of carriages, waggons, and trucks passing to or from the said Birmingham and Gloucester and the said Grand Junction Railways respectively, or from the last mentioned railway to the said Birmingham and Gloucester Railway, or passing from one portion of the said Birmingham and Gloucester Railway to another portion thereof, or to or from any intermediate place between the said two railways to the one or the other of them, and such additional rails should be laid down, maintained, and used to the satisfaction and approval of the Board of Trade, and all necessary facilities and accommodations should be afforded by the company thereby incorporated, or their lessees, for the convenient use thereof; and it should be lawful for the said Board, at any time, on complaint made by any company or person interested in the question, that such additional rails had not been laid, or that such facilities or accommodations were not afforded, to order and direct the said company thereby incorporated, or their lessees aforesaid, to adopt such regulations as they might see fit to require with reference to the laying down of such additional rails, or to the use of the said additional rails and other conveniences aforesaid, and for the purpose of securing such free and uninterrupted passage thereon as aforesaid. By sec. 45 it is enacted, that wherever the railway thereby authorised, or any of the branches thereof, should join or communicate with any existing railway or railways already authorised by Parliament, and which should have been constructed of a different gauge from the said first mentioned railway, the company thereby incorporated, or their lessees, should find and provide, at all times, at their own expense, and free of charge for the use thereof to all persons or companies using the said first-mentioned railway or branch railways respectively, such machinery and apparatus as might be necessary for readily transferring the goods, coal, or merchandise brought from, or intended to pass on, such other railway to or from the said railway thereby authorised, or any of the branches thereof, and such machinery and apparatus should be of such description, and so constructed as to admit in the most convenient and readiest manner of the transfer of such goods or merchandise, or of the carriages in which the same were conveyed from or to the railway thereby authorised, or the branches thereof to or from such other railway as aforesaid, and on complaint made by any company or person of the insufficiency of any such machinery or apparatus for the purpose aforesaid, the Board of Trade might appoint an engineer to inspect the same, and order the adoption of other apparatus for the purpose. By sec. 128 a lease for years, and by sec. 129 a sale and transfer of the said railway and works to the Great Western Company were authorized. Sec. 130 empowered the two companies to enter into contracts for effecting the aforesaid purposes, or for otherwise working or using the said railways, or any part thereof, and provided that any contract made before the passing of the Act for all or any of the purposes aforesaid by the provisional committee of the company thereby incorporated, and the directors of the said Great Western Company with the sanction of any general meeting of the last-mentioned company, should be as valid and binding in every respect, as if made subsequently to the passing of the Act, and in conformity with the provisions thereof. By the sec. 131, after reciting that the Great Western Company were willing to undertake, in case of need, the due completion of the said railway and branches, it is enacted, that in the event of the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Company failing to complete the same within the time thereby limited, it should be lawful for the Great Western Company, after giving a month's notice, to enter upon and construct the railway, and to exercise all or any of the powers of the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Company with relation thereto, and if at any time the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Company should, in the opinion of the Board of Trade, fail to proceed with the construction of the railway therein mentioned, the Great Western Company should, on being required so to do by the said board, enter upon the said railway, and should complete the same as aforesaid, and in such event it should not be lawful for the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Company, or the directors thereof, at any time after such entry, unless with the special consent of the said board of trade, to declare, make, or pay any interest or dividend. By sec. 132 the Great Western Railway Company were, from the passing of the Act, subjected as to revision of rates to the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85. By sec. 133 the Birmingham and Gloucester Railway Company were authorized to use that portion of the line lying between Abbotswood and Stoke Prior at the rent and upon the terms contained in the 134th and 135th sections. From the evidence it appeared that the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Company had laid down a single line of narrow-gauge rails on the northern portion of their railway, not only from Wolverhampton to Abbotswood, but also further south from Abbotswood to Evesham—that the earth and timber works, however, were of such construction, as would admit of the broad-gauge rails being added, so as to make the railway a mixed gauge line throughout with double rails on the part north of Abbotswood, and a single line south of that point, and that it was the intention of the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Company, if their funds should be sufficient, to make a double line of mixed guage throughout. A difficult tunnel south of Evesham delayed the completion of the works then. From the evidence on the part of the Great Western Company it was shewn that they did not know the state of the works until the 24th of February last, when (see Great Western Railway v. Rushout, infra) the Great Western Company were again admitted to the councils of the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Company, and the proceedings of the general purposes committee; but on the other hand it was proved that Brunel had been the engineer of both companies up to March 1851. In that month he wrote to the directors of the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Company, requesting, that if he were retained in their service as engineer, his position might be carefully restricted to the duties of that office, and might not be in any degree confidential.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that he did not think that the plaintiffs had made out a case for the injunction they sought. The question seemed to him to turn entirely upon the construction and effect of the original Act of Parliament incorporating this company and directing the line to be made. Now that Act of Parliament authorised the railway to be made from Wolvercot, which was near Oxford, to Wolverhampton, crossing the line of the Birmingham and Bristol Railway at a place called Abbotswood, and proceeding to Wolverhampton. When completed, it would leave the broad-gauge line, which it joined at Wolvercot, to cross a narrow-gauge line at Abbotswood, and to fall into the narrow gauge—the line of the Grand Junction—at Wolverhampton. The question was, what were the principles of the construction of this railway as regarded the question of the gauge of it? Now that depended upon the effect of two clauses of this Act of Parliament. The 38th clause provided that the railway should be formed of such gauge and according to such mode of construction as would admit of being worked continuously with the Great Western Railway; and the 44th clause required the railway, which had been directed to be made, so as to be capable of being worked continuously with the Great Western, to have laid down such additional rails between Abbotswood and the station at Wolverhampton as would enable it to be worked in conjunction with the narrow-gauge railway. Now the company admitted, and it appeared to his Honour that they could not do otherwise, their obligation to lay down the broad-gauge line throughout from Wolvercot to Wolverhampton, and in addition to that, to lay down a narrow-gauge line from Abbotswood to Wolverhampton; and several questions had arisen as to their obligations and powers with respect to any thing beyond that. The first question was, they being bound to lay down the broad gauge, were they at liberty also to lay down the narrow-gauge line throughout? And it appeared to him that they were. The Act of Parliament which prescribed that the railway should be formed of such gauge and according to such mode of construction as would admit of being worked continuously with the Great Western, did not seem to him to prohibit its being laid down so as to be adapted to another mode of working as well, if it suited the interest of the railway company to do so. That view of the case appeared to his Honour to be entirely in accordance with Lord Cranworth's judgment in the case of Beman v. Rufford. Then the next question was, were they bound to lay down a double line throughout? and his Honour did not think that they were. Engineering questions might arise as to whether it was advisable to lay down a double line; but there was nothing in the Act of Parliament to restrain them from laying down a single line if they thought fit. Then were they at liberty to lay it down upon a mixed gauge if they thought fit? His Honour considered that they were. He saw nothing to prevent their line being a line capable of being worked continuously with the broad-gauge line, adapted so as to be able to be traversed by carriages to be run upon a narrow-gauge line; so that it appeared to him that if, when the railway was completed, there was a single line of railway the whole distance from Wolverhampton to Wolvercot, admitting of being worked continuously with the Great Western, and with additional rails between Abbotswood and the Grand Junction, capable of being worked by a broad-gauge line with those additional rails, the company were not bound to do more. They had power to construct it upon a narrow-gauge between Abbotswood and Wolvercot, and it appeared to his Honour that that would be a railway made in accordance with the provisions of this Act of Parliament. Now it was the intention of the company, as sworn by Mr. Parsons, to make the railway in that way, with this additional single line of rails south of Abbotswood, and a double line of rails between Abbotswood and Wolverhampton. What was it that they were doing? They were beginning at the north end and working to the south. They had purchased land, and their works were in a more or less forward state of advancement, all with a view to make a mixed-gauge line in the way his Honour pointed out, and therefore it appeared to him, all with a view to make the railway in a manner in accordance with the Act of Parliament. No rails had been laid down yet south of Evesham. Several points had been raised. It had been said there was no good faith in this intention, and also that there was an intention to abandon making the line south of Evesham. He saw no evidence whatever of that; on the contrary, so far as he could judge from the affidavits, and from what had been done, he thought there was an intention to complete the railway south of Evesham in the way pointed out. Something had been urged, not very material, as to expense, they being obliged by the Act to do one thing, if they were going to do something beyond that; and if it could be shewn they had not the means for doing both, it might be a very strong reason for saying they should be restrained from doing anything except what the Act enjoined. As to expense, the evidence stood thus:—Mr. Barlow, on his information and belief, stated that the funds would be insufficient to make the line according to what he considered to be the obligation to make it by the Act of Parliament; that was, as his Honour understood it, a double-gauge line with a variety of branches, some of which had been abandoned; on the other hand, Mr. Thomas and Mr. Parsons, who swore, in the only way they could swear, to their information and belief, stated that the funds would be sufficient to do what was intended. The only thing that was brought in to throw additional light upon that was a paper which appeared to have been communicated by Mr. Parsons to the company, or to the solicitor of the company, at the time of the negotiation; the object of which was, that the Great Western Railway Company should support or assist this company in carrying out the line. That paper shewed, according to Mr. Brunel's estimate (which, it was to be observed, was for making a double-broad-gauge line throughout, taking a margin of 50,000*l.* to cover its contingencies), a sum of 3,250,000*l.* would be required. It appeared from the statement that had been agreed to, that the company had already got the means of raising 3,133,000*l.* and it was stated they had the means of raising more, making 3,200,000*l.* It was to be observed, that it was to be expended, not in making a double broad-gauge line, but in making a single mixed-gauge line; and therefore it was impossible, upon this evidence, to come to any conclusion that Mr. Parsons and Mr. Thomas were incorrect when they made the statement they did in respect of their information and belief as to the mode of making the railway, or means of making it. No doubt, so far as the works had gone, the narrow-gauge works were more advanced than the broad-gauge works; but there was no harm in that. The object of the broad gauge was, that the railway, when completed, should be of such a gauge and such mode of construction as should admit of its being worked continuously with the Great Western. If it was bonâ fide made down to Wolvercot, and when it was completed and open at Wolvercot, there was a line then capable of being worked continuously with the Great Western, his Honour considered that the obligation imposed upon them by the Act of Parliament would have been performed; but it was not so if when it was open at Wolvercot it was open as a narrow-gauge line made in compliance with the 38th clause, it would not be in accordance with the Act of Parliament, and the law would furnish ample means to the Great Western Railway Company in that case of getting redress. Now a railway of course could not be completed and opened all at once, part must be completed before the rest, and the company must judge what part they would complete before they did the rest. If they had done part of the whole which was not illegal, his Honour saw no reason whatever for interfering upon the grounds he was asked to interfere by granting any part of this injunction in respect to this part. The line was adapted obviously to the narrow gauge at the place where it was made, because the broad-gauge line would be useless there until there was some communication between this line and the broad gauge line. With respect to the injunction that he was asked to grant, the first of several objects was to restrain the company from making their railway in the first instance otherwise than upon the broad-gauge throughout its entire length, with additional rails between Abbotswood and Wolverhampton. There was no ground for that. For the reasons his Honour had stated it appeared to him that the company had a perfect right to go on as they were doing, making the railway also in a lawful way pari passu. Then the motion sought an injunction forbidding their laying down the narrow gauge south of Abbotswood. For the reason stated he thought that part of the application must fail. Then as to that part of the line north of Abbotswood, his Honour was asked to restrain them from laying the rails upon a narrow gauge till they had laid rails throughout upon the broad gauge. That must follow what he had just said, because, à fortiori, they had power to lay down the narrow-gauge concurrently with the broad gauge between Abbotswood and Wolverhampton. Then it was asked to restrain the opening of the railway, and if that was to be done it could only be done upon the ground that it was illegal, and as to that his Honour did not think it so for the reasons he had stated. With respect to the costs of the application it would be better to say nothing about them. The course of the Court provided for the costs of these motions in a way that was most just. Where nothing was said about costs, if the suit failed, the party moving must pay the costs; and if the suit succeeded then the order for taxation of the costs provided a better way than any special order would do.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

Reported by ADAM BITTLESTON and JOHN THOMPSON, Esqrs. Barristers-at-Law.

LOWNDES v. THE EARL OF STAMFORD.

Salary—Apportionment—Pleading—Condition.

Where the defendant covenanted with the plaintiff to pay him 1,800l. per year by half yearly payments, so long as the plaintiff should hold the offices of auditor and superintending manager of defendant's estates; and, in case the defendant should revoke the appointment without just cause, to pay the plaintiff from and after such revocation, 1,000l. yearly, by half-yearly payments; and the defendant revoked the appointment without just cause, in the middle of one of the half-years:

Held, that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover upon the covenant, a proportionate part of the half-year's payment under the 4 & 5 Wm. 4, c. 22, s. 2.

The indenture contained a clause, that in case the defendant should revoke the appointment without adequate and just cause, the adequacy and justice of such cause to be ascertained as thereinafter mentioned, the said defendant should, during the joint lives of the defendant and plaintiff, pay to plaintiff 1,000l. annually. The defendant having revoked the appointment of plaintiff without adequate or just cause, as averred in the declaration:

Held, that it was not necessary, in a count for non-payment of a half-year's annuity, for the plaintiff to shew that he had obtained, or that there was any determination in the mode described as to the adequacy or justice of the cause of revocation.

Covenant.—The first count of the declaration stated, that by an indenture of the 2nd of January, 1849, the defendant appointed the plaintiff to be auditor and superintending manager of all his estates, &c.; such appointment being considered as taking effect from the 7th of January, 1848. That the defendant would, so long as the plaintiff should hold the said offices, pay him the annual salary of 1,800*l.* by equal half-yearly payments, on the 7th of July and the 7th of January in every year; and in case the defendant should revoke the said appointment without adequate and just cause, then, from and after such revocation, would, during the remainder of the joint lives of himself and the plaintiff, pay to the plaintiff a clear annual sum of 1,000*l.* by equal half-yearly payments. General averments of performance by plaintiff, and of his continuing to hold the office; that 900*l.* for the period between the 7th of January, 1850, and the 7th of July, 1850, during which the said plaintiff held the said offices, became due.

Breach.—Non-payment thereof.

Second count.—That the said indenture, in the first count, was so made as in the said first count mentioned. That although the plaintiff from the time of the making thereof, continued to hold the said offices of auditor, &c. until, to wit, &c. which elapsed between the 7th of January and the 7th of July, 1850, on which day the defendant, without adequate and just cause, revoked the said appointment of the plaintiff; and although, after such revocation, to wit, on the 7th of July, 1850 (the same day being such one of the said half-yearly days of payment as first happened after such last-mentioned revocation), a large sum of money, to wit, 500*l.* being the first payment of the said clear annual sum of 1,000*l.* became due from the defendant to the plaintiff by virtue of the said covenant, and although the defendant has hitherto ceased to pay, and has not paid to the plaintiff the said salary of 1,000*l.* or any part thereof; and although the defendant has not hitherto obtained, nor has there been any determination by the said Lieutenant Colonel W. or any other referee or umpire that the said defendant had, or that there was adequate and just cause of or for such revocation. Breach non-payment of the said last-mentioned sum.

Plea to first count.—After setting ou tthe deed on oyer, that before the 7th July, 1850, to wit, on the 27th May, 1850, the defendant revoked the appointment of the plaintiff, and the plaintiff ceased to hold the said offices; without this, that the plaintiff held the said offices during the whole period of time between the 7th January and 7th July, 1850, modo et formâ.

In the deed as set out upon oyer, there was the following condition:—"That, in case said W. L. Lowndes shall cease to perform the duties of the offices, to which he is hereby appointed by reason of his becoming incapable of performing such duties from permanent illness or infirmity, or in case the said earl shall revoke the appointment hereby made without adequate and just cause, the adequacy and justice of such cause to be determined as hereinafter mentioned, or in case said W. L. Lowndes shall resign the offices, to which he is hereby appointed, upon adequate and just cause, the adequacy and justice of such cause to be ascertained, as hereinafter mentioned, then and in any such case, from and after such becoming incapable, revocation, or resignation, as the case may be, the said earl shall, during the remainder of the joint lives of the said earl and W. L. Lowndes, pay to said W. L. Lowndes and his assignees a clear annual sum of 1,000*l.* by equal half-yearly payments, on the half-yearly days hereinbefore mentioned, the first of such half-yearly payments to be made on such of the half-yearly days, as shall first happen after such becoming incapable, revocation, or resignation, that the adequacy and justice of the cause of any revocation by the earl, of the appointment hereby made by him, and the justice and adequacy of the cause for the resignation by said W. L. Lowndes of the offices to which he is hereby appointed shall be determined by John Wildman of Brook-street, Grosvenor-square, esq. a lieut. colonel in her Majesty's army, if living, and able and willing to determine the matter in question, and in case he shall be dead, or unable or unwilling to determine the matter in question, same shall be determined by two referees, one to be named by said Earl, and the other by said W. L. Lowndes, or if such two referees differ, by an umpire to be named by such two referees, before they proceed upon the business referred to them; and in case either party refuse or omit to appoint a referee, or shall appoint a referee who refuses or omits to join in appointing an umpire, the referee named by the other party shall be entitled to make an award which shall be binding."

To the second count, the defendant demurred specially.

JUDGMENT.

Thursday, May 6.—Lord CAMPBELL, C.J.—We think that on the demurrer to the plea to the first count, there ought to be judgment for the defendant. The plea averring that the defendant revoked the appointment of the plaintiff before the 7th day of July, 1850, when the half year's salary sued for is alleged to have become due, concludes with a special traverse of the allegation that the plaintiff held the office of auditor during the whole half-year down to the said 7th day of July. The plaintiff's counsel admitting that he could only seek to recover a portion of this half-year's salary, and that at common law it could not be apportioned, rests this claim entirely on the statute 4 & 5 W. c. 22, s. 2. The language employed by the Legislature is very general, but we do not think that it was meant to apply to a payment like this under a contract between employer and employed for services performed, where the payment entirely ceases upon the determination of the claimant's right to receive it. The statute contains an enumeration of "the estates, funds, offices, or benefices, for or in respect of which the rents or other payment shall be issued or derived." The deed contains the expression, "the office of auditor and superintendent manager" to which the plaintiff was appointed. But looking to the context, it appears to us that these are not offices within the meaning of the enactment, not being of a public nature, and no rent or payment issuing or being derived from or in respect of them. The dismissal from an employment, created by contract, can hardly be called a determination of the interest of the person employed. The time fixed by the statute when the apportionment is made recoverable, is when the entire of which such apportionment shall form part, shall become due and payable. This contemplates a case where the party who has to pay will have to pay for the whole period to some one, and not a case where the payment entirely ceases with the determination of the interest of the person receiving the apportionment, and where the entire portion, of which this forms a part, never does become due and payable. We are, therefore, of opinion, that the half-yearly payment in question remains unapportionable as at common law. On the demurrer to the second count of the declaration, our judgment will be for the plaintiff. The allegations in this count appear to us sufficient to shew, that after the revocation he was entitled to the sum of 1,000*l.* a-year payable half-yearly. We think that the deed makes no attempt to oust the court of jurisdiction, and that the numerous cases cited upon this subject are wholly inapplicable. We have to peruse the deed executed by these parties and to see what was the real contract between them. If the defendant had power to dismiss the plaintiff on the statement that he had adequate and just cause, throwing upon the plaintiff, by the dismissal, the burthen of appealing to Col. Wildman, the second count of the declaration will be bad, but we think the defendant had no power of dismissal without giving the right to the allowance of 1,000*l.* a year until he had previously ascertained by the judgment of Col. Wildman, or of two referees, one named by each party, or one referee named by himself, that he had adequate and just cause to revoke the appointment. The obtaining of this judgment was a condition precedent to the reserved power of revocation, and the payment of 1,000*l.* a-year was to become due if there was a revocation without adequate and just cause so previously shewn. It appears by the deed that the plaintiff was a practising barrister, and in consideration of this lucrative appointment he covenanted to give up his practice so far as was inconsistent with the duties he undertook as auditor, and to give up practice altogether at the request of the defendant. It was of great importance to him that he should not be capriciously dismissed from his auditorship. Again, the defendant placed the plaintiff in a situation of great confidence, and very inconvenient consequences might follow to the defendant if the plaintiff, from caprice, or wishing to enter into some still more profitable employment, should, without adequate and just cause, resign the auditorship. Both parties had entire confidence in Col. Wildman; the agreement between them was, until his judgment had been obtained, that there was adequate and just cause for removal or resignation; that one party should not be at liberty to remove nor the other to resign; the defendant covenanting, if he removed him without such judgment, he should pay the plaintiff 1,000*l.* a-year during their joint lives. If such was the agreement, the demurrer to the second count cannot hold, for the plaintiff was not bound to shew that he had obtained, or that there was any determination in the mode described as to the adequacy or justice of the cause of revocation, or that it had been determined that the revocation was without adequate or just cause. Nor was it necessary to aver that a reasonable time had elapsed for the defendant or for the plaintiff to have obtained such judgment, or to allege any grounds for the plaintiff not having obtained it. The revocation having taken place without previous determination in the prescribed form of the existence of adequate and just cause the annuity of 1,000*l.* became payable, and the arrears claimed are recoverable. Now as to the cases referred to. The decision of the Court of Ex. in Thurnell v. Balbirnie, was on a contract of a totally different nature, the defendant having agreed to purchase goods from the plaintiff, the price of which was to be fixed by two individuals named; and it was very properly held that the defendant would not be liable for the price of the goods until they had been valued by both valuers pursuant to the agreement, at least without an averment that the defendant prevented the valuing. Worsley v. Wood, proves if there be a condition precedent to be performed by the plaintiff before he has a right of action the declaration must aver the performance of the condition. The very same doctrine is likewise to be found in Clayton v. Kynaston, respecting a proviso which goes by way of defeasance of a covenant, but it has no tendency to shew upon the construction of this deed that if the defendant revoked the appointment without adequate and just cause previously determined in the manner described, he would not be liable for the payment sought to be recovered on the second count. Therefore our judgment is for the plaintiff.

PALK v. SHINNER.

Prescription Act—Right of way—User for twenty years—Computation of time—Exclusion of period during which servient tenement out on lease.

Upon a traverse of the right of way in an action for obstruction, the plaintiff proved enjoyment for twenty years, but during certain portions of the twenty years the servient tenement was held under leases for years exceeding three years. The user, however, commenced antecedently to the granting of any of the leases, and no proceedings were taken by the reversioner within three years after the determination of such terms, to resist the plaintiff's claim.

Held, that there was evidence for the jury of the right claimed; that section 8 of stat. 2 & 3 Wm. 4, c. 71, applies only to cases where an enjoyment for forty years is relied upon as giving an absolute and indefeasible right, and not to cases where twenty years' user only is set up, and that if section 8 could be applied to the latter case at all, the condition imposed by that section, of resistance within three years after the determination of the term, would be applicable also, and consequently, that there was no ground for excluding from the computation of twenty years the periods during which the servient tenement was out on lease.

This was an action on the case, for disturbance of a right of way claimed for the occupiers of a particular farm over the defendant's close.

Plea, traversing the right of way.

Upon the trial before Erle, J. at the last assizes for Exeter, user of the way for more than twenty years was proved and found by the jury; but during that period the land of the defendant, over which the right of way was claimed, had been leased to tenants for terms exceeding three years. Two leases were proved; the first for seven or fourteen years, from Michaelmas 1831; the second, a lease for eight years, from Lady-day 1838. The enjoyment of the way commenced at a period anterior to 1831; and after the determination of the second lease no steps were taken by the defendant to resist the claim, until shortly before the present action was commenced, viz. Sept. 1851.

The learned judge asked the jury whether there had been an enjoyment as of right for twenty years; and upon their finding a verdict was entered for the plaintiff; but leave was reserved to the defendant to move to enter it for him, if the period during which the land was leased ought to be excluded from the computation of the twenty years. A rule was accordingly obtained last Term, and now

Crowder and Collier shewed cause.—This case turns upon the Prescription Act, 2 & 3 Wm. 4, c. 71. By sec. 2 it is provided that no claim to any way, which shall have been actually enjoyed without interruption for the full period of twenty years, shall be defeated by shewing only that such way was first enjoyed at any time prior to such period of twenty years; and by the same section, where the way has been enjoyed for the full period of forty years, the right thereto shall be deemed absolute and indefeasible. Now the plaintiff has brought himself within the earlier part of that section by proving twenty years' uninterrupted enjoyment; but the defendant relies on ss. 7 and 8 of the statute. Sec. 7 provides that the period during which any person otherwise capable of resisting the claim shall be under disability or "tenant for life," &c. "shall be excluded in the computation of the periods hereinbefore mentioned, except only in cases where the right is hereby declared to be absolute and indefeasible." Under that section Bright v. Walker, 1 Cr. M. & R. 211, was decided; but in that section no mention is made of a lease for years only. Sec. 8, however, does enact, that when the land over which the way is enjoyed, is held under any term of life, or any term of years exceeding three years from the granting thereof, the time of the enjoyment of the way during the continuance of such term shall be "excluded in the computation of the said period of forty years, in case the claim shall, within three years next after the end or sooner determination of such term, be resisted by any person entitled to any reversion expectant on the determination thereof." There are two answers, therefore, in this case to the point made by the defendant. First, sec. 8, which alone speaks of a term of years, applies only to the computation of the period of forty years,—that is, to those cases only in which an absolute and indefeasible right is claimed. Secondly, even if it did apply at all to the computation of the period of twenty years, there is a condition attached to it which has not been performed in this case—that the reversioner should, within three years from the determination of the lease, resist the claim. (Gale on Easements, 114.)

Kinglake, Serjt. and Montagu Smith, contrà.—Bright v. Walker substantially decides that sec. 8 applies to the computation of the period of twenty years as well as to the computation of the period of forty years. [Lord CAMPBELL, C.J.—Sec. 7 clearly applied to that case, because the enjoyment was for twenty years only, and the period excluded was a term of life.] The judgment proceeded upon sec. 8; for Baron Parke says, in delivering the written judgment of the Court, "it is quite clear that no right is gained against the bishop; whatever construction is put upon the 7th section, it admits of no doubt under the 8th;" and then, after reading the 8th section, the learned judge added: "It is quite certain that an enjoyment of forty years instead of twenty, under the circumstances of this case, would have given no title against the bishop, as he might dispute the right at any time within three years after the expiration of the lease; and if the lease for life be excluded from the longer period, as against the bishop, it certainly must from the shorter." [CROMPTON, J.—I do not myself perceive exactly the force of that reason.] If it be not so, this extraordinary consequence will follow, that a user of twenty years may confer a right when a forty years' user would not. Assuming, then, that the period of enjoyment during the continuance of a lease for years is to be excluded at all in the computation of the twenty years, then, according to Wright v. Williams, 1 M. & W. 77, 100, it is to be excluded absolutely from that period, though it would be excluded conditionally only from the period of forty years. Secondly, assuming that the defendant does not bring the case so strictly within sec. 8 of the statute, that he could plead it in reply to a plea setting up the enjoyment for twenty years, according to Pye v. Mumford, 11 Q.B. Rep. 666; Clayton v. Corby, 2 Q.B. 813; Beasley v. Clarke, 2 Bing. N.C. 705; Tickle v. Brown, 4 Ad. & Ell. 369; still he is entitled to exclude the period during the continuance of the leases; because, even before the statute, the jury would not have been directed to find a right of way against the owner of the fee, upon evidence shewing a succession of leases during which the acquiescence of the owner would not be voluntary.

Lord CAMPBELL, C. J.—I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to the judgment of the Court. I think that there was evidence to go to the jury of the right claimed by the plaintiff under sec. 2 of the statute. I do not say that such evidence necessarily proves that right; but that it will justify the jury in finding the right; and as they have so found, the plaintiff is entitled to the verdict, unless this case can be brought within sec. 8 of the statute; and I think it cannot. If an absolute right was claimed, under an enjoyment of forty years, then sec. 8 would apply; and the period during which the servient tenement was held under a term of years exceeding three, would be necessarily excluded in the computation of that period of forty years; but in this case, twenty years' enjoyment only is set up, and therefore I think that period is not to be excluded. Sec. 7 excludes the period of a tenancy for life, from the periods thereinbefore mentioned, except in the cases where the right is thereby declared to be absolute. The period of forty years, therefore, is excepted from the operation of sec. 7; and then in sec. 8 it is "the said period of forty years," in the computation of which the lease for years is to be excluded. The express mention of the period of forty years in sec. 8, and of the shorter periods in sec. 7, excludes the notion that sec. 8 can apply to the computation of those shorter periods. Great reliance is placed upon the judgment in Bright v. Walker; but that case fell precisely within the terms of sec. 7; and that appears to have been the ratio decidendi. But in this case, even if sec. 8. did apply to the computation of twenty years, there is another answer to the defendant's objection; because the lease for years is only to be excluded in case the claim shall within three years next after the determination of the term be resisted by the reversioner; and that condition has not been complied with. The last lease expired in 1846; and after that there was entire acquiescence by the defendant until just before the action was brought in September 1851.

COLERIDGE, J. concurred.

ERLE, J.—I see no ground for the argument of the defendant, except the passage cited from Bright v. Walker; but that was the case of a tenant for life. The grand principle there laid down is, that the user must be a user against the owner of the fee; and the learned Judge seems to argue in this way:—He says, it is clear that the user for forty years under sec. 8, would not have bound the bishop, because he could have come in during the three years after the expiration of the term; and as forty years would have given no title, neither will twenty: if the lease for life be excluded from the longer, it certainly must from the shorter period also. But all that is quite consistent with the Court holding that the period was expressly excluded under sec. 7. Sec. 7 being perfectly clear by itself, I am at a loss to know why it was made clearer by reference to sec. 8. But it is certain that the learned Judge had it not in his mind to declare that sec. 8 applied to the computation of the period of twenty years as well as to the computation of the period of forty years.(a)

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Reported by FREDERICK BAILEY and C. J. B. HERTSLET, Esqrs. Barristers-at-Law.

April 27 and June 2.

DE ROTHSCHILD v. THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM-PACKET COMPANY.

Bills of lading—Robbers—Dangers of the road.

The defendants undertook to convey from Chagres to London, and to deliver to the plaintiff certain boxes of gold dust, loss occasioned by the "Queen's enemies, &c. ROBBERS, &c. DANGERS OF THE SEA, ROADS, AND RIVERS, OF WHATEVER NATURE OR KIND SOEVER, EXCEPTED." One of the boxes was stolen from a railway-truck between Southampton and London:

Held, that where, as in this case, the property was pilfered, or taken by stealth, the defendants were liable for the loss, although they would not have been so liable had it been taken by a VIS MAJOR, *which they could not resist: the word "ROBBERS" meaning persons thieving with violence; and that the exception, "DANGERS OF THE ROADS," meant marine roads, in which vessels lie at anchor, or dangers caused by the overturning of carriages in ruts or precipitous places.*

The declaration contained two counts. The first count alleged that the plaintiff, on the 1st of April, 1851, caused to be delivered to the defendants for shipment on board one of their ships in parts beyond the seas, to wit off Chagres, in South America, eleven boxes of gold dust, of the value of 40,000*l.* to be carried and conveyed by the defendants, with liberty to tranship on board any of their ships to be delivered within a reasonable time in that behalf at the Bank of England, in the city of London (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, pirates, robbers, fire, accidents from machinery, boilers, and steam, dangers of the sea, roads, and rivers, of whatever nature or kind soever, excepted), unto the plaintiff or his assigns, he or they paying freight for the same at the rate of 1¾ per cent.; and the defendants then accepted and received the same accordingly, for the purpose and upon the terms aforesaid. Then followed an allegation of the acceptance of the goods and promise to pay the freight, and that a reasonable time for the carriage and delivery of the goods had elapsed, and they, the defendants, were not prevented by the act of God, the Queen's enemies, pirates, robbers, fire, accidents from machinery, boilers, and steam, dangers of the sea, roads, and rivers, or by any or either of the risks so excepted as aforesaid; and though the defendants have carried, conveyed, and delivered ten boxes, yet they have not carried, conveyed, and delivered the residue, to wit, one box of gold dust, of the value of 3,000*l.* The second count was in trover.

The defendants pleaded, first, not guilty; second, that they were prevented from delivering the said box of gold dust by robbers; third, that they were prevented from delivering it by dangers of the roads.

The cause was tried at Guildhall on the 20th of December, 1851, before Pollock, C.B. and a special jury, when the jury found that the defendants had been guilty of negligence in conveying this gold dust; but a verdict was entered for the defendants on the second and third pleas, subject to certain points reserved, viz.:—First, Was there a loss by robbery within the meaning of the terms used in the bill of lading? and, secondly, Was there a loss by the perils of the roads within such meaning?

The then Attorney-General (Sir A. Cockburn) having moved to enter a verdict for the plaintiff accordingly,

Sir F. Thesiger (Crowder and Needham with him) shewed cause.—This case clearly comes within the exceptions contained in the bill of lading, and the defendants are therefore excused from delivering. The word "robbers" is sufficient to cover this loss. It has been used to denote thieves in the English statutes 7 Geo. 2, c. 15; 1 Vict. c. 87, s. 2; Sutton v. Mitchell, 1 T. R. 18; Smith's Mercantile Law, 275. Then as to the exception "dangers of the road," the expression is not to be found in usual bills of lading; and the reasons for introducing it here was, that the carriage was partly by land and partly by water; and the dangers by sea and rivers being provided for, this was intended to apply expressly to land roads. (Doctor and Student, 2 Dia, c. 38; Pickering v. Baillay, 2 Rolle's Abridg. 248; 2 Style's Rep. 132; Barton v. Walliford, Comber. 56.) If the word "robbers" is confined to robbers with violence, then the expression "dangers of the roads" applies. (Thomlinson v. Brittlebank, 4 B. & Adol. 630; Rex v. Moore, 1 Leach, CC. 335; Rex v. Mason, Russ. & R. 119, were also cited.)

Sir A. Cockburn, in support, cited Com. Dig. tit. "Merchant," E. 9; Arnold on Insurance, 817; Abbott on Shipping, c. 5, p. 315; Jones on Bailments, 43, to shew the legal meaning attached to the word "robbery" as distinguished from "theft." [He was stopped by the Court.]

Cur. adv. vult.

JUDGMENT.

POLLOCK, C.B.—In this case the plaintiff sought to recover from the defendants the value of a box of gold dust, part of eleven received by them from Panama, to be carried to the Bank of England. The defendants carried the goods from Panama across the Isthmus by land, shipped at Chagres, and brought them by steam-vessels to Southampton, and thence carried them by the London and South-Western Railway to London. The bill of lading was given for them at Panama, acknowledging the receipt of eleven packages, said to contain 7,000 and odd ounces of gold dust, to be carried to the Bank of England, "the act of God, the Queen's enemies, robbers, fire, accidents from machinery, boilers, steam, dangers of the sea, roads, and rivers, of whatsoever nature or kind, excepted." All the packages arrived safely at Southampton, and were placed on the railroad to be carried to London; but one of them was stolen secretly from the railroad truck before their arrival here, and the jury found that the defendants were guilty of negligence in the conveyance of them to London, which caused the loss. The defendants pleaded the exceptions in the bill of lading in two different pleas; one stating that the loss was occasioned by robbers, the other by dangers of the road. At the trial, both pleas were found for the defendants, but with a reservation of liberty to enter a verdict on both for the plaintiffs. A rule nisi having been granted, the case on behalf of the defendants was elaborately and fully argued during the last Term. Sir Alexander Cockburn was heard in part for the plaintiff. Being satisfied that the plaintiff is entitled to recover, we do not think it necessary to hear any further arguments upon the subjects. The question is, whether the theft committed on the South-Western railroad was, first, an "act of robbers;" secondly, was it a "danger of the roads," within the true meaning of the bill of lading? And we are of opinion that it was neither one nor the other. It was argued for the plaintiff, that the word "robbers" ought not to be construed in the technical sense given to the word "rob" by the English law writers, and by some of the English statutes—the 1 Vict. c. 87, s. 2, for instance, where it means a felonious taking from the person, or in the presence of another, of money or goods against his will, by force, and putting him in fear; for it was not likely that a robbery in that sense would occur, as the packages were not in the personal presence of the defendants or their servants, and still less were they upon their persons. Other statutes were cited where the meaning is much more comprehensive and includes the taking without force. And, besides, in construing such instruments it is contended that the ordinary meaning of the words used must be followed. We think that position is correct, but we must also look at the circumstances under which the contract is made, and the peculiar subject to which it applies; and taking these into consideration, we cannot doubt that the meaning of the contract was, that the defendants were not to be liable for the loss of the gold dust in instances where it was taken by force by the vis major, which they, the defendants, could not resist; but that they were to be liable for it where it was pilfered from them or taken by stealth. It is very unreasonable to suppose that the shippers of a very precious article, of which a large value is comprised in a very small space, which is capable of being easily abstracted by any person employed in carrying it, meant to exempt the persons to whom they gave the custody and care of it from all responsibility by theft committed by their crew or others against whom, presumably, they could guard by the exercise of reasonable care; but it is likely that they should agree to exempt them where the goods were taken by a force which they could not resist. The nature of the transaction shews clearly, therefore, that the word "robbers" means not "thieves," but robbers by force, to whom the term is more usually applied, although in common parlance it is often applied to every description of theft. It is explained also by the word with which it is associated—"pirates," who certainly take by force, and not by stealth. We have no doubt, therefore, in this bill of lading, that this is the proper meaning of the word "robbers;" and this being so, the loss in this case was not by robbers; and the issue raised by the plea, in which the loss was so stated, ought to be found for the plaintiffs. We do not feel any difficulty as to the meaning of the term "dangers of the roads." We think the word "roads" may be explained by the context to mean marine roads, in which vessels lie at anchor; or supposing it to be roads on land, the dangers of the roads are those which are immediately caused by the roads; as the overturning of carriages in ruts and precipitous places. The losses by robbers are already provided for under the general term "robbers." The same reason which induces us to believe the parties did not mean the defendants should be exempted by pilfering by thieves where loss by robbers is excepted, leads us to the conclusion that they did not intend they should be protected from loss by thieves in passing along the roads. Our judgment will therefore be for the plaintiff.

Rule absolute.

MICHESON v. NICOLL.

Charter-party—Freight on goods stowed in cabin.

The charterer of a vessel is entitled to stow as many goods as the vessel can reasonably carry in her hold and other parts usually appropriated to cargo; and if a larger quantity is shipped, so as to occupy the cabin, the shipowner is entitled to charge freight for the excess at the current freight of the day at the place of shipment.

Debt, for 336*l.* 17s. 1d. freight of cotton from Bombay to London. Pleas, except as to 156*l.* 18s. numquam indebitatus; as to 156*l.* 18s. payment into court.

This cause was tried before Martin, B. at the sittings at Guildhall after Michaelmas Term last, when the verdict was found for the plaintiff. A rule for a new trial was subsequently obtained, on the ground of alleged misdirection. There were two objections insisted upon; first, that the defendant was not liable to the demand at all; secondly, that the action was brought too soon. The circumstances were these:—The defendant chartered a ship from the plaintiff to bring home a cargo of merchandise from Bombay, at the rate of 3*l.* 10s. per ton. The charter was made by the defendant, not for the purpose of bringing home any cargo of his own, but on the speculation of making a profit by the charter, by reason of his obtaining an increased rate of freight, and was a perfectly lawful and legitimate mercantile speculation. The ship was at Bombay, the cargo was put on board by the agents of the defendants, sufficient as the jury found to fill the carrying part of the vessel. The captain of the ship then proposed to fill the cabin, and to bring cargo to England in it. There was contradictory evidence between the captain and one of the defendant's agents as to what took place on this subject; the captain deposed, that the agents agreed with him to pay freight after the rate of 7*l.* per ton for their goods; the agent deposed that this was not so, and that the rate of freight was to be arranged in England. The cabin was filled with goods; they were the property of the defendant's agents, and were consigned to him for sale as their factor; the bill of lading was annexed to the bill of exchange drawn by the agents upon the defendant, which bill of exchange was sold to the East-India Company, with the bill of lading annexed, as security for its due payment, which is a well-known mode of dealing with such bills; the ship arrived safely in England on the 3rd of October, 1847, and the goods were put in a warehouse under stop for freight. After arrival, the plaintiff demanded payment after the rate of 7*l.* per ton, which the defendant refused to pay, insisting he was entitled to fill the cabin as well as any other part of the ship, at the rate of 3*l.* 10*s.* per ton, he himself having charged his agents in his account with the freight after the rate of 7*l.* for these goods, and allowed them commission for procuring the freight for him at the rate of 7*l.* per ton. The dispute continuing, this action was brought, and the defendant paid money into court, paying for the cabin goods at the rate of 3*l.* 10*s.* per ton. At the trial there was a question whether the goods could not have been brought home in the cargo part of the ship. The jury found this against the defendant, and no complaint was now made of this finding. At the trial it was also contended, the agent had no authority to make a contract for the defendant to bring home their goods under the only authority which they possessed, namely, a letter from the defendant. Martin, B. was of this opinion, and he told the jury that if the agents at Bombay, although they had no authority from the defendant, nevertheless, acting as if they had put the goods into the cabin, and the defendant, on the arrival of the ship in England, took to these goods so brought home in the ship and received the freight which he was entitled to; that he was bound to pay the plaintiff the rate of freight current at that time from Bombay to England, and therefore the plaintiff was not confined to the charter freight of 3*l.* 10*s.* per ton.

Crowder shewed cause against the rule for a new trial.

Bramwell and Willes, in support.

Cur. adv. vult.

JUDGMENT.

POLLOCK, C.B. after fully going through the facts of the case.—In this case we are of opinion that the direction of my brother Martin was perfectly right. The defendant was not entitled, under the charter, to fill up the cabin at all; but he insisted on taking, and did take, the benefit of it, and actually got paid 7*l.* per ton in respect of the freight of goods carried home in it. It is true he insisted that he had a right to have the benefit of the cabin at 3*l.* 10*s.* per ton; but in that he was in the wrong. He had no such right. The plaintiff insisted he was entitled to have freight 7*l.* per ton, which, he alleged, the authorised agent for the defendant at Bombay contracted to pay; but he also was in error in this; because we think the agents at Bombay were not authorised to make the contract, even if they did make it, as to which there was contradictory evidence. What is then the legal consequence? Why, that the defendant must pay, in respect of the benefit obtained by him, the fair value of such benefit; or, in other words, the current rate of freight at the time of the lading on board at Bombay. It is what the jury have found him to be liable to under the direction of the judge. The second objection was, that the action was brought too soon. This arose upon a piece of evidence given by the plaintiff as follows:—The bill of lading was pledged to the East-India Company, and after the action was brought, the bill of exchange having been paid, the defendant obtained possession of the bill of lading from the East-India Company, and the goods were transferred to him, namely, at the dock warehouse; and it was insisted, until he got possession of the goods he was not liable, and that at all events there was misdirection to the jury as to this point, that the possession of the goods which the defendant then obtained was actual possession for the purposes of sale, as factor for his Bombay agent; but the possession or taking to the goods, which rendered him liable to the freight, was the taking to the goods, as the cargo brought home for him in the cabin of the ship for the purpose of obtaining the freight, it was wholly irrespective of the actual possession obtained after the action brought. This was the taking to the goods relied upon by the learned judge, and we think the jury acted under no misapprehension on the subject, but understood perfectly the question presented to them. The rule, therefore, will be discharged, and judgment will be for the plaintiff.

Rule discharged.

ALLCARD v. WESSON.

Bankruptcy—Arrangement with creditors—Certificate of conformity—Discharge—12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 221.

It is a condition precedent to the power of a commissioner in bankruptcy to grant a certificate of conformity under the arrangement clauses of the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, that the resolution and agreement should have been carried into effect, and that the creditors of the petitioning trader should have been satisfied.

Declaration on a bill of exchange by the indorsee of one John Plews, the drawer, against the acceptor. The defendant pleaded puis darrein continuance; that the defendant had obtained a certificate of conformity from a commissioner in bankruptcy. The plea alleged that the defendant was a trader; that after the accruing of the said debt, and before the commencement of the action, he presented a petition to the Court of Bankruptcy; that a day was appointed for the private sitting; that prior to that day fourteen days' notice was given in writing to every one whom the defendant knew to be a creditor, and, amongst others, to John Plews, he being the drawer of the said bill; and that the defendant did not know, nor did the Court of Bankruptcy know, nor did the assignee know, that the said John Plews had indorsed the bill, or that any other than he was entitled in respect thereof. It then alleged a proposal made at such sitting for payment of a composition on the defendant's debts of 7*s.* 6*d.* in the pound, and the appointment of a day for confirming such proposal; and that between the first and second sitting, the defendant received an intimation from the plaintiff's attorney that the bill had been indorsed to the plaintiff, and that a demand of payment was then made. The plea then averred that after the first, and before the second sitting, a notice was served at the plaintiff's residence of such second sitting; that at the second sitting, six-sevenths in number and value of the creditors whose debts amounted to 10*l.* and upwards, agreed to the proposal, and that a certificate of conformity was granted to the defendant, in accordance with the Act (12 & 13 Vict. c. 106). To this plea the plaintiff demurred specially.

Hawkins, in support of the demurrer.—The plea is bad. The question is, what is the effect of the certificate pleaded, and what the 221st section of the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, requires the debtor to do. First, it requires that notice should be given to every creditor; but this plea only alleges that notice was given to those whom he knew to be creditors (Reeves v. Lambert, 4 B. & C. 211); and notice after the first sitting is not enough. Secondly, the certificate is only to be granted when the petition has been carried into effect, and the creditors have been satisfied. These form conditions precedent to the power of the commissioners, and there is no allegation that they were done. He also cited Levy v. Horne, 5 Ex. 257. The plea alleges that fourteen days' notice was given to Plews; but no notice to the holder of the bill, pursuant to the 213th section is alleged. No excuse will avoid the necessity; but even if it would, no sufficient excuse is here stated. This plea is evasive; it does not appear that the resolution alleged has been carried into effect, or that the creditors have been satisfied, according to the 221st section, and until the preliminaries have been complied with, the commissioner has no power to grant his certificate. (Wagner v. Imbrie, 20 L. J. 116, Ex.; 2 L. M. & P. 510.)

[ALDERSON, B. referred to the 225th section, which enacts that no deed of arrangement shall be effectual upon a creditor who has not signed, until after the expiration of three months from the notice of suspension and of the proposed deed.]

Watson and Pearson, contra, referred to sections 12, 198, 199, 202, 203, 204, 205, 207, 211, and 216 of the Act, for the purpose of showing that the certificate was conclusive and binding on all creditors, with the exception of the cases specifically mentioned, and was evidence that all the preliminary steps had been taken. They contended that this was an adjudication by a competent tribunal, and could not be impeached; and cited Thomas v. Hudson, 14 M. & W. 353; 16 M. & W. 885.

Cur. adv. vult.

JUDGMENT.

POLLOCK, C.B.—This was a plea puis darrein continuance, to which plea there was a demurrer. We are of opinion that the plea is bad. The declaration was on a bill of exchange; the plea puis darrein continuance was of the defendant's discharge under the 226th section of the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. It was objected that the discharge was not available. It was contended that it ought to have shewn that the terms of the Act of Parliament were complied with, and we are all of that opinion. It was pointed out by Mr. Hawkins that a creditor was certainly not satisfied. The 221st section is this, "that so soon as the said resolution or agreement shall have been carried into effect, and all the creditors of such petitioning trader shall have been satisfied according to the tenor thereof, the Court shall give to such petitioner a certificate under the hand and seal of the commissioner, setting forth the filing of the petition," and so on; and then it says that the "certificate shall thenceforth operate to all intents and purposes as fully as if the same were a certificate of conformity under a bankruptcy." We are of opinion that the plea should have averred that the resolution and agreement had been carried fully into effect, and that the creditors had been satisfied; and in the absence of those averments we think the plea is bad. I own personally, I must say, I think there is a great deal in what was pointed out by my brother Alderson in the course of the argument, that this was an arrangement between the parties themselves, although under the control of the Court, and hardly can be considered to extend to cases of creditors to whom no notice at all was given, for I observe in the case of an arrangement by deed, it is expressly provided that the effect of the arrangement should only prevail in respect to those persons who had had notice. But the principal point on which the decision of the Court goes, is that the plea itself is bad for want of those averments which I have pointed out. There will, therefore, be judgment for the plaintiff on the demurrer to the plea.

ALDERSON, B.—I own I think it does not extend at all events beyond those creditors who had notice. It is very arguable whether it applies at all, even to those who had notice, unless all had notice.

PLATT, B.—It seems very clear from the 216th section, that it can affect no creditor who has not had notice, because, where a resolution has been entered into according to the former section, the 216th section, which is, "such resolution and agreement shall thenceforth be binding and of full force as against all persons who are creditors at the date of his petition, and who had notice of the several meetings," it is quite clear no other persons are bound by that agreement.

MARTIN, B.—I am also very clearly of opinion that the plea is bad on general demurrer. I think it is defective in not containing an averment that the resolution or agreement had been carried into effect, and the creditors satisfied according to the tenor of the agreement. The 221st section expressly enacts that, until that shall be done, the commissioners shall not grant a certificate. I apprehend that it is impossible the commissioners can, by any act of theirs, supersede the plain enactment of the Act of Parliament, where the object of the certificate being to bar a man's debt in a matter in which he has taken no part, and over which he has no control of any sort or kind. It seems that the case cited by Mr. Watson, which was an action against a public officer, who acted in strict obedience to the direction of a Court of Record, may be upheld on that ground; but I apprehend it is no authority that a man is to be deprived of his debt by the act of a commissioner of bankruptcy, which is not in conformity with the power given to him by the Act of Parliament, and no general doctrine arising from the authority of a Court of Record can confer on the certificate of a commissioner of bankruptcy any such effect. My opinion is, the plea is bad in substance for want of the averment. With respect to the other point of notice, I own I am not so clear. I am rather inclined to be of opinion, that in the event of a bill of exchange being in the hands of a person whom the applicant was unable to discover, the certificate would rather tend to bar him; and it seems to me that, looking at all the sections of the Act of Parliament relating to the subject, and beginning at the 211th, it was supposed that some time would be occupied in carrying out this matter, and some time would occur before the creditors were satisfied according to the tenor and effect of the agreement, so that, in all probability, all the creditors of a man would learn such a proceeding was going on; and then, in the event of the debtor having omitted any person improperly from his petition, the 223rd section rendered him liable to be at once made a bankrupt. I would rather be inclined to be of opinion that, down to the period when all the creditors whose names were mentioned in the petition were satisfied, those creditors who had not notice had a right to come in and get the benefit of it, and they had a right to arrest the debtor in pursuance of a case which was decided in this court; but after the certificate was once granted, it would operate as an ordinary certificate. It is not necessary to give any positive opinion upon that. I am very clearly of opinion that, by reason of the want of an averment of satisfaction according to the tenor of the agreement, this plea is bad in substance.

ERROR FROM THE COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

(Before ALDERSON, B. PATTESON, J. COLERIDGE, J. WIGHTMAN, J. ERLE, J. PLATT, B. and MARTIN, B.)

ROBINSON and WIFE v. THE MARQUIS OF BRISTOL.

Quare impedit—Advowson—Union of churches—Conveyance.

A declaration in quare impedit alleged that H. was seised of a moiety of the advowson of the church of B. with D. and A. as in gross by itself, as of fee and right, and was entitled to present to the same every alternate turn, the other moiety of the said advowson then belonging to the Earl of B. as in gross by itself as of fee and of right.

It appeared that anciently B. with D. was a parish and rectory, and A. a separate parish and vicarage; that Lord Hervey was seised as of fee of the advowson of the rectory of B. with D. and that G. was seised as of fee in gross of the advowson of the vicarage of A. and that in 1718 the bishop, with the consent of the respective patrons of B. with D. and of A. made an act of union by which the vicarage and church of A. was united and annexed to the rectory of B. with D. and therein decreed that the said united churches should be held and reputed as one benefice only, and that one fit person, at the alternate presentation of the said patrons, should at all times thereafter possess the same.

In 1760 a descendant of G. conveyed to H. in fee all that the perpetual advowson or alternate right of presentation of and to the vicarage of the parish church of A. and all other the advowsons, tenements, and hereditaments, and parts and shares of advowsons, &c. of him the said G. situate and being in A.

Held, that by the Act of Union a new presentative benefice was created, separate and distinct from the former benefices of the rectory of B. with D. and of the vicarage of A.; and that the patronage of the new presentative benefice was given according as provided in the Act of Union itself to the owners of the former advowsons in turn, which advowsons for that purpose remained unchanged, and with their conveyance carried the patronage of the alternate right to present to the whole newly created benefice. And therefore that G. being the owner in fee in gross of the advowson to the vicarage of A. was seised of a moiety of the church of B. with D. and A. (the united churches), as in gross by itself as of fee and of right.

Held, also, that the deed of 1760 conveying the vicarage of A. to H. was equivalent to a conveyance of a moiety of the advowson of the new presentative benefice as in gross by itself as of fee, and that therefore the title of H. was well described in the declaration.

Quare impedit.—The declaration stated that Samuel Hazlewood was seised of a moiety of the advowson of the church of Brauncewell, with Dunsby and Anwick, as in gross, and by itself, as of fee and right, and was entitled to present to the same every alternate turn, namely, one turn in every two turns; the other moiety of the said advowson, and the other of the said two turns belonging to Frederick William Earl of Bristol, as in gross by itself, as fee and right. It then stated that Samuel Hazlewood being so seised thereof presented to the said church, then vacant, Robert Denny Spooner, as clerk, who on such presentation was admitted and inducted into the same in the time of Peace, tempore George 3, and things so standing, the church afterwards became vacant by the resignation of Robert Denny Spooner, whereby it belonged to the Earl of Bristol, in his proper turn, to present, whereupon he presented the said Samuel Hazlewood as his clerk, who on this last-mentioned presentation was admitted and inducted in time of Peace, tempore George 4. The declaration then averred that Samuel Hazlewood being so seised of the moiety of the said advowson, as above mentioned, afterwards died so seised; and that after his death the said moiety of the said advowson descended to Jane Mary, the wife of Harrison Robinson, as his only sister and heiress; whereby the said Harrison Robinson and Jane Mary, his wife, became seised of the moiety of the said advowson. It then stated that on this vacancy by Samuel Hazlewood's death it belonged to Harrison Robinson, and Jane Mary his wife, in right of the said Jane Mary to present, and then concluded by averring disturbance of their right by the defendants, the Marquis of Bristol, Lord Charles Hervey, and the Bishop of Lincoln.

Plea of the Bishop.—That he only claimed his right as ordinary.

Plea of Lord Charles Hervey.—Denial that he hindered the plaintiffs from presenting.

Plea of the Marquis of Bristol.—That Samuel Hazlewood was not seised of a moiety of the said advowson of the church of Brauncewell with Dunsby and Anwick, in manner and form as plaintiffs have alleged.

Special verdict.—The special verdict finds that before and at the time of the making of a certain act of union, Brauncewell with Dunsby, was a parish and rectory, and that Anwick was a parish and vicarage (the rectory thereof having been before appropriated, and the vicarage endowed according to law.) Then it finds that before and at the time of sealing and delivering the deed hereinafter mentioned, Robert Gardiner was seised as of fee in gross of the advowson of the vicarage of Anwick, and John Lord Hervey, afterwards the Earl of Bristol) was seised of fee of the rectory of Brauncewell with Dunsby. It then finds a deed reciting as above, and that Robert Gardiner and Lord Hervey desired that the cure of both might be supplied by one clerk in future, and providing that Robert Gardiner should grant every alternate turn the presentation to Anwick to Lord Hervey, and should receive from Lord Hervey every alternate presentation of Brauncewell with Dunsby, so that each party might alternately have the right in future of the presentation to both at one time.

The special verdict then finds that from the time of the execution of this deed (20th March, 2 Anne), until the making the act of union, both parties continued seised as before, and the deed was acted on, and that Henry Craske (clerk) the presentee of Lord Bristol, was at the time of the act of union the incumbent of both livings.

It then set out the act of union, dated the 26th of April, 1718, by which the Bishop of Lincoln, the ordinary, on the petition of the Earl of Bristol, and Robert Gardiner, and Henry Craske, the incumbent, united the two churches for the future. That act of union was as follows, namely:—

"Edmund, by Divine permission, Bishop of Lincoln, to our beloved in Christ, Henry Craske (clerk), Master of Arts, rector of the parish church of Brauncewell, and also vicar of the parish church of Anwick, respectively, in the county of Lincoln, and of our diocese and jurisdiction of the alternate patronage, as, it is said, of the Right Honourable John, Earl of Bristol, and Robert Gardiner, gentleman, and to all others whomsoever, in any manner, having, or who shall have an interest in this behalf,—health and grace. Whereas (as we are informed) the profits, rents, revenues, tithes, and emoluments of the rectory of the said parish church of Brauncewell (which parish hath only three families), not amounting to the annual value of 28*l.* of lawful money of Great Britain, are so small and slender, that they are not sufficient for the proper maintenance of the minister, according to the decency of the clerical order; whereas, also, the perpetual vicarage of the parish church of Anwick, aforesaid (which parish hath about twenty families), is only two or three miles distant from the said rectory of Brauncewell (no river or stream lying between), the fruits of which vicarage also not amounting to the annual value of 25*l.* are not sufficient for the proper maintenance of the vicar there; whereas, moreover, the said benefices have been accustomed for many years past to be served by one minister, for which reason, and because the parish of Brauncewell consists of so small a number of inhabitants, the church of Anwick aforesaid may be conveniently served by the rector aforesaid, and for the causes aforesaid, and the better support of one minister, the union and consolidation of the said benefices is thought convenient and necessary; and reciting, further, the petition and assent of the Earl of Bristol and Robert Gardner, the alternate patrons, and of the incumbent: and that the bishop had found that the suggestions evidently contained the truth, and that the petition was agreeable to reason and the causes for making the union were just, lawful, and sufficient, all and singular the matters which are required by law in this behalf concerning."

The act of union then provides:—"We desiring to consult and look to the interest and advantage, as well of the minister as of the church (as is meet), and considering the poorness of the said benefices, and moved by your entreaties in this behalf, do, by and with the consent of all who are interested in this matter, as far as lies in our power, and the law and statutes of the kingdom allow for us and our successors, Bishops of Lincoln, by these presents consolidate, unite, and annex the said vicarage and parish church of Anwick, with its members and appurtenances to the aforesaid rectory and parish church of Brauncewell, and we do by these presents commit the cure of the souls of the parishioners of the church of Anwick to the new rector of the said parish and church of Brauncewell. And we will and decree by these presents that the said united church shall, from this time, be hereafter held and reputed as one benefice only; and that one fit person, at the alternate presentation of the said Right Honourable John Earl of Bristol and Robert Gardiner, their heirs and assigns, to be canonically instituted in the same by the diocesan of the place for the time being, shall at all times hereafter possess the same, so that it shall be lawful for you, the aforesaid Henry Craske and your successors whomsoever, under the name of rector of Brauncewell-with-Anwick, to take and obtain possession of both parish churches, and so obtained and united together, as aforesaid, to continue and retain as one church and one benefice, and the fruits, rents, and revenues of the same, so united, with their appurtenances, you may and can freely and lawfully convert, dispose of, and apply to your own use and advantage, and so may your successors."

After this act of union no separate presentments were made; and on the cession of Henry Craske, Robert Gardiner (clerk), on the presentation of the widow of the said Robert Gardiner, named in the act of union, and claiming under him, was presented to the united benefice the 27th June, 1730. On the next vacancy, the 3rd of September, 1760, William Tonge, clerk, was instituted to the united benefice on the presentation of the Earl of Bristol.

The special verdict then finds, that after this last presentment, by lease and release, dated 23rd December, 1760, Robert Gardiner and Susannah, his wife—the said Robert Gardiner being heir to the said Robert Gardiner, party to the act of union—conveyed to Samuel Hazlewood, in fee inter alia, the manor and moiety of the rectory of Anwick, and perpetual advowson, nomination, donation, or alternate right of presentation and disposition of and to the vicarage of Anwick, and the glebe lands belonging thereto. And this deed also included all other advowsons or parts of advowsons in Anwick.

The special verdict then finds that the title of Samuel Hazlewood to the moiety of the advowson of the church of Brauncewell with Dunsby and Anwick, was derived through this conveyance only, if at all. The special verdict then states that on the 23rd of March, 1769, John Andrews, clerk, was instituted on the presentment of Jane Hazlewood and Richard Moore, patrons, deriving title under Robert Gardiner, mentioned in the act of union. That on the next vacancy the Bishop of Lincoln collated George Matthews, on the lapse of the Earl of Bristol to present. And that on the next vacancy Robert Henry O. Spooner, clerk, was, on the 4th of June, instituted on the presentation of Samuel Hazlewood in the declaration mentioned, claiming title under the said Robert Gardiner; and that on the next vacancy, the 16th of June, 1826, Samuel Hazlewood was presented on Spooner's resignation, by the Marquis of Bristol, the present defendant, and that on the 18th of March, 1846, Samuel Hazlewood died.

These are all the material facts contained in the special verdict.

The case was argued in the Court below in Trinity Term, 1851, when the Court of C. P. pronounced judgment for the defendants. (20 L.J. 208, C.P.)

Upon this judgment the plaintiffs brought a writ of error, which now came on for argument.

Peacock (Hayes with him) for the plaintiffs in error. 1. What is the effect of the act of union? Its effect was to unite the two churches, and to give the parties the alternate right of presentation to the advowson of the united church. [PATTESON, J.—The act of union made no change in the advowson. The presentation is not in right of the advowson of the united churches, but in right of the rectory of Brauncewell, or of the vicarage of Anwick. The only authority I can find to support any change in the nature of the churches united is the dictum of Treby, C.J. in Harman v. Renew, 1 Salk. 165.] By the act of union a new church was created, for although the parishes remain the same, the parson is now the rector of Brauncewell-cum-Anwick, and not rector of Brauncewell and vicar of Anwick. The vicarage of Anwick is merged in the rectory of Brauncewell. [ALDERSON, B.—You contend that each living remains the same as before, but that the right to present to the two is united. PATTESON, J.—If one person was the patron of both livings then by the act of union the two by possibility might coalesce, but when they are in different persons I cannot understand how they can be united.] In Coppledick v. Tansey, Hutton, 31, which was quare impedit for interrupting the plaintiff in presenting to the church of Ulceby, there was a plea that there was no such church called Ulceby, which was traversed and found for the defendant, "for there was an union of the church of Fordington to Ulceby, and it was called Ulceby-cum-Fordington; and it was said that institution and presentments were to Ulceby, and Ulceby was the greater, and Fordington was the lesser church and united, and therein had lost its name. It was agreed that it being known by the one or by the other name had been sufficient to have found for the plaintiff." In this case the bishop would not present to the vicarage of Anwick or the rectory of Brauncewell, but to the united churches of Brauncewell-cum-Anwick. The question resolves itself into this, since the act of union could the owners of the two advowsons still appoint different persons to the two livings? It is submitted that they could not, and that by the act of union the two livings became one church and one benefice, and consequently but one advowson. As is said in Reynoldson v. Blake, 1 Ld. Ray. 196, the writ of right ought to be de medietate advocationis. [ALDERSON, B.—It is singular to call that a moiety which each patron exercises in virtue of a distinct right.] And in Hartley v. Cooke, 9 Bing. 736, Tindal, C.J. quotes the judgment of Powell, J. in Reynoldson v. Blake,—"The advowson is but the right of presenting an incumbent to the church or benefice. If there is after the union but one church and one benefice (as is proved before) there can be but one advowson; and that is of the church to which the union is made;" and this, he says, "agrees with the canon law, from which the doctrine of unions was borrowed." In the case of co-parceners each presents to the whole, but each has a right only to a moiety of the advowson. Upon this point the following authorities were also cited — 4 Burn's Eccl. L. tit. Union; Anon. 3 Dyer, 259 a.; Austyn v. Twyne, Cro. Eliz. 500, Reg. v. Page, Cro. Eliz. 719; Com Dig Advowson, C. 1; Gibson's Codex, 962. Secondly. Even supposing the effect of the act of union to be not to create a new advowson, still it is admitted upon the pleadings that there was such an advowson and such a church, and that Hazlewood and the Earl of Bristol were each seised of a moiety thereof, and that the defendants interrupted the plaintiffs in the presentation. The plea only traverses the seisin of Hazlewood in a moiety of the advowson, and admits that the Marquis of Bristol as averred in the declaration presented Hazlewood to the said church, who was admitted, instituted, and inducted. Then can the Marquis now be allowed to contend that there was no such advowson, and no such church? Upon these pleadings the parties have agreed that there was such a church, and the only question is whether the plaintiffs have a right to present to it. If there was no such church how could the defendants impede the plaintiffs? Thirdly, As to the effect of the deed of 1760; was it sufficient to convey to Hazlewood the interest of Gardiner in the right to the alternate presentation to the united church? It is admitted that the advowson of the vicarage of Anwick did not then exist. What was the intention of the parties to the deed? The words are, "all that the perpetual advowson, nomination, donation, or alternate right of presentation to the vicarage of the parish church of Anwick aforesaid;" "and all other the manors or lordships, advowsons, impropriations, tenements, hereditaments, and parts and shares of manors or lordships, advowsons, impropriations, tenements, hereditaments, whatsoever of them the said R. Gardiner and S. his wife, situate, and being in Anwick aforesaid." [PATTESON, J.—If the advowson to the vicarage is not gone, the deed is sufficient to convey that.] It is said, by the Court below, that this new church is not in Anwick, and that the conveyance is limited to advowsons situate in Anwick. An advowson, however, is an incorporeal hereditament, and not situate in a parish, 3 Dyer, 323 a. There was nothing upon which the deed of 1760 could operate, except the alternate right to present to the united church of Braunceweell-cum-Anwick. And it is submitted that the words of the deed are sufficiently comprehensive to convey that. (The other points argued are omitted as the judgment of the Court did not turn upon them.)

Cowling (Scotland with him), for the defendants in error.—First, was the effect of the act of union to destroy the ancient church or rectory, and, in the language of Treby, C.J. to produce "a new creature, a new church, a new patronage, a novum aliquod tertium?" It is submitted that it was not, and that the old advowson remained as before the act of union. The two parishes were not united for all ecclesiastical purposes, but the two churches remained distinct. There is no mention of any new advowson in any deed between the parties. The deed of 1703 was not intended to create a plurality of livings in the same incumbent; if it had been, it would have been illegal by the common law, for no man could hold two livings without being liable to ecclesiastical punishment, unless under a dispensation. (3 Burn's Eccles. L. 118, "Pluralities." Alston v. Atlay, 7 A. & E. 289.) The object of that deed was, that instead of each patron presenting to the vacancy of his respective living, there should be the alternate of right of each to present to both livings conjointly, at the same time no doubt the deed was executed with the ulterior view of obtaining a dispensation from the bishop. The act of union provides for the consolidation of the said benefices, and speaks of the united churches (in the plural), and is silent as to any alteration in the advowsons. If this was the most complete union, still the two advowsons would remain in their respective patrons, and the tertium quid never could arise. There is nothing to divest each patron of his seisin. (The following authorities were next referred to: Lynwood's Provincialis, lib. 3, tit. 3, p. 189; Godolphin's Repertorium, 170, 7th edit.) Then, again, the mere verbal assent of the patrons to the Act of Union by the bishop is sufficient to authorise it, as was decided in Austyn v. Twyne. But an advowson can only pass by deed (Com Dig. "Advowson," C. 1), being a temporal, and not a spiritual inheritance. Now, can the nature of the two distinct advowsons be changed by the act of union? Secondly, as to the pleadings. The plea has traversed the material averment; viz. that Hazlewood was seised of a moiety of the advowson of the church, and that involves all the main facts that depend upon the seisin of Hazlewood. The defendants could not have traversed all the averments collectively, and it is not to be taken that all the averments not traversed are admitted. Thirdly, as to the effect of the deed of 1760. Assuming that a new advowson was created by the act of union, it was not conveyed by the deed of 1760. Parke, B. so ruled at the trial, and that ruling was upheld by the Court below. This was a special verdict, and there is no finding of any intention of the parties to the deed of 1760 to pass the alternate right of preservation to both livings. The question is, what is the effect of the deed taken per se? Braunceweell is the representative church, and the proper name appears to be the advowson of the church of Braunceweell with Dunsby and Anwick. Then what apt words are there in the deed of 1760, to convey the alternative right to the presentation to this church? The deed of 1760 speaks of the vicarage of the parish church of Anwick; but after the act of union there could be no presentation to the vicarage of such church. There is a necessary strictness requisite in a conveyance in the description of the parcels. In Anon. Cro. Eliz. 163, it was held that the advowson shall not pass by a grant of the vicarage. (Shep Touch. Grant, 247. 248, cap. 12; Stukeley v. Butler, Hob. 168, 171; Dowtie's case, 3 Co. R. 25.) If, then, the deed of 1760 was not sufficient to convey the right to present alternately to the new advowson, the declaration is bad.

Cur. adv. vult.

JUDGMENT.

Tuesday, May 11.—ALDERSON, B. now delivered the judgment of the Court; and after stating the pleadings and facts as above, proceeded. The question is, whether on these facts the issue raised as to the seisin of Samuel Hazlewood of the moiety of the advowson of the united churches of Braunceweell with Dunsby and Anwick is made out. The Court of C. P. in their judgment, have held that this is not made out by the plaintiffs on the ground that if the effect of the union be to create a new advowson in moieties between the patrons of the two churches, there is no conveyance of this moiety of the advowson of the united church to Samuel Hazlewood by the deed of 1760; but we think that this view of the case cannot be supported. The nature of an union of two churches at common law is thus stated in Gibson's Codex, 920.—"By the union of two churches no change is made in the advowsons; that is, not only all rights are reserved to the patron or patrons as before, but the nature of the advowsons continues the same, as if one be appendant and the other in gross, and that which is appendant is made the presentative church, and the patron of the church in gross hath the first turn, yet shall not the whole advowson be in gross, but it shall remain appendant for his turn, who was patron of the advowson appendant, and in gross for his turn, who was patron of the advowson in gross." This, we think, clearly means, not that the advowson of the presentative church has two distinct characters, but that the right of presentation shall go as to one turn with the conveyance of the advowson in gross, and as to the other turn with the conveyance of that property to which the advowson appendant was appendant. But according to the dicta of the judges in Reynoldson v. Blake, it seems to be established that the advowson of the presentative church is quiddam tertium, and belongs in moities to the patrons of the two blended churches. For Powell, J. so lays it down; and Treby, C.J. (without any apparent dissent from Neville, J. though in some points they both differed from Powell, J.) agreed with him in his opinion as to the rights of patrons of united churches. These rights Powell, J. says are several, and therefore the writ of right of advowson ought to be de medietate advocationis, and their possessions also are several, so that one may usurp upon the other and drive him to his quare impedit, and each of them, if he be disturbed, may have his quare impedit against a stranger, and that though there is but one right of advowson. And he says afterwards each patron has the whole advowson in his turn, but the writ of right must be according to the right, or, as he says before, for a moiety of the advowson. And Treby, C.J. says,—"The church united is a new thing, a novum aliquid tertium, composed of both the ancient churches." All this we think can well stand together by our holding that the law is in truth, that by virtue of the act of union a new presentative benefice is created, wholly separate and distinct from the former benefices, and that the patronage of the new presentative benefice is given according as it is provided in the act of union itself, to the owners of the former advowsons in turn, which advowsons, however, for this purpose remain unchanged in all their qualities and are to be conveyed as before, and with their conveyance carry the patronage of the respective turns to the whole newly created presentative benefice. Now, this being, as we think it is, the law on this subject, we have to apply it to the facts here found by the special verdict. Here the two old advowsons are those of the rectory of Braunceweell with Dunsby, and the vicarage of Anwick. The two churches are united by an act of union of the 26th of April, 1718. And the vicarage of Anwick, the advowson of which belonged in fee in gross to Robert Gardiner, was consolidated, united, and annexed to the rectory of Braunceweell, and both were in future to be made one church and one benefice only, at the alternate presentation of Lord Hervey and Robert Gardiner, by the name of Braunceweell and Anwick. Now, in the first place, it appears, from the special verdict, that this church of Braunceweell with Anwick is the same as that called in this declaration, the church of Braunceweell with Dunsby and Anwick, and, according to what we have before seen to be the true effect of an union like this, the advowson of this newly-created church is given to the two patrons in moities. The advowson of the vicarage of Anwick belonged, in fee, to Robert Gardiner, in gross, at the time of the act of union. Therefore, according to the authority of Powell, J. and Treby, C.J. the whole advowson at the time of the vacancy (the turn being that of Robert Gardiner) would be in gross also, and Robert Gardiner would have, according to the same authority, a moiety only. Consequently, in describing his title on such an occasion, it would be right in a declaration in quare impedit brought by him, to say that Robert Gardiner was seised of a moiety of the advowson of the church of Braunceweell with Dunsby and Anwick, as in gross by itself, as of fee and right. This is the description of it in the declaration. But, instead of Robert Gardiner, we have here Samuel Hazlewood's name introduced. We must then see whether we can shew that this property thus properly described has been conveyed from Robert Gardiner to Samuel Hazlewood. Now, this brings us to the other branch of the law previously, as we think established, that the right to this alternate presentation is inseparably annexed to the advowson of the old vicarage, which for this purpose remains, and is transmissible as before. Now, we think this is clearly made out by the conveyance of the 23rd of December, 1760, by which Robert Gardiner's representatives, who had the advowson of the vicarage of Anwick, in gross by itself as of fee and right, have expressly conveyed that vicarage to Samuel Hazlewood in like manner. And we think this is exactly equivalent to a conveyance expressly of a moiety of the advowson of the new presentative benefice as in in gross by itself as of fee to Samuel Hazlewood. After this conveyance, the title was in Samuel Hazlewood, as it is described in this part of the declaration, on which alone the Marquis of Bristol has thought fit to take an issue. We think, therefore, that the plaintiffs have proved the issue on which this question turns, and that the Court of C. P. was wrong in deciding that they had not done so. And this makes it unnecessary for us to consider and determine the various other nice questions discussed in the able arguments of Mr. Peacock and Mr. Cowling before us.

Promissory note payable on demand—Stamp—Mistake in almanacs

All promissory notes and bills drawn payable on demand are subject to a 5s stamp, and not to one for 3s. 6d. as erroneously stated in some pocket-books.

Assumpsit on a promissory note for 50l. payable on demand, and a count for 50l. lent and advanced.

Pleas—1. Non-assumpsit. 2. A denial of the note.

O'Malley, Q.C. (Sewell with him), for the plaintiff, stated the facts of the case, which are not material for the present purpose, and then, alluding to the supposed defence, said, that it was possible, when he should tender the note in evidence, that the learned counsel for the defendant might object to it for want of a sufficient stamp. If that course should be taken, he was free to confess that he should be unable to use the note, for it was improperly stamped; the stamp affixed being one for 3s. 6d. whereas the stamp required by law on bills and notes "payable on demand" was one for 5s. It would appear that the parties drawing this note had fallen into this error from referring to some pocket-book or almanac, containing, as those works usually did, a "list of bill and receipt stamps," and where it would be found to be stated that 3s. 6d. was the proper stamp for bills or notes at a longer date than two months. Now a note or bill payable on demand might or might not have more than two months to run; but it had been assumed, no doubt, that it fell within the class of notes having more than sixty days to run, and so it was made on a 3s. 6d. stamp. But the Stamp Act expressly imposed a 5s. stamp on all bills or notes payable on demand; and he would therefore beg to caution the jury and the public from falling into similar mistakes. The plaintiff was then called to prove the consideration for the note, and at the close of the evidence the note in question was tendered.

Bramwell, Q.C. (with him Sykes), for the defendant, objected to it, as improperly stamped.

PLATT, B. having referred to the Stamp Act, said, that it was quite clear the stamp was insufficient for the reason stated, and the note could not be read.

Evidence rejected.

Eventually the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff on the count for money lent for 54*l*. 17s. 6d.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Monday, Feb 2.

(Before Sir F. POLLOCK, C.B.)

Commission of rebellion—Habeas Corpus Act—Penalties.

A commission of rebellion is a civil proceeding, and the penalties under the Habeas Corpus Act, 31 Car. 2, c. 2, s. 9, do not attach on the removal of a prisoner in custody under such commission, without fresh warrant.

Debt for 300*l*. The first count of the declaration alleged that on 8th June, 1840, the plaintiff was in custody of defendant as an officer under a commission of rebellion, at a certain prison, to wit, a lock-up house in Cursitor-street, for a certain criminal matter, to wit a contempt of the Court of Ex. and defendant, while plaintiff was so in his custody, at the place aforesaid, wrongfully and contrary to the statute, removed the plaintiff from the said prison into the custody of a certain other officer, to wit, Samuel Burrett, the keeper of the debtors' prison for London and Middlesex, without a writ of Habeas Corpus or any other legal writ, nor was plaintiff delivered to a constable, or any other inferior, officer to be carried to a common gaol, nor was he sent by order of any judge or justice to a common workhouse or house of correction, nor was he then removed from one prison to another within the same county, in order to his trial or discharge in due course of law; nor was there any sudden fire, or infection, or any other necessity for the said removal, contrary to the statute in such case made and provided; whereby and by force of the statute the defendant forfeited and became liable to pay the defendant 100*l*.; the said removal being the defendant's first offence in that behalf. The second count was for another penalty of 200*l*. for a second offence alleged to have been committed by the defendant in the removal of of the plaintiff from the debtors' prison on the 11th of June, 1840, to Westminster Hall, under the like circumstances as in the first count mentioned.

Pleas.—1. The general issue by statute. 2. That the supposed causes of action in the said declaration mentioned did not accrue within two years next before the commencement.

Replication, to the first plea similiters; to the second, plaintiff was in prison when cause of action accrued, and hath been in prison from thence until the commencement of this suit. To this there was a demurrer and judgment for the defendant, on the ground of the insufficiency of the declaration.

The plaintiff in person proved that a writ of a rebellion having issued out of the Court of Ex. in 1840, for a contempt of Court of Chancery in not paying certain costs in a cause of Oldfield v. Cobbett, in which writ the defendant and one Doncaster were named as commissioners. He was taken into custody by Doncaster on the 8th June, 1840, and carried to the lock-up house of the defendant Sloman, in Cursitor-street. Thence he was taken, without further warrant, to the Coldbath-fields prison, and afterwards again removed, on the 11th June, to Westminster Hall. These, he contended, were two acts of removal without due authority, which subjected the defendant to a penalty of 100*l*. for the first offence and 200*l*. for the second, under stat. 31 Car. 2, c. 2, s. 9, as in his view a writ of rebellion was a criminal proceeding, and no prisoner could be removed from one place of confinement to another without due warrant.

O'Malley, Q.C. for the defendant, was stopped by POLLOCK, C.B.—There is no necessity to waste any further time in this case, which is now ripe for my decision. This is an action for penalties under the Habeas Corpus Act, and it is grounded on the fallacy that because the proceeding under which the plaintiff was taken is called a writ or commission of rebellion, he was therefore a "person committed to prison, or in any custody whatever, for any criminal or supposed criminal matters," which is the language of the 9th section of the Act in question. Now, it was quite a mistake to suppose that a commission of rebellion was a criminal proceeding. It was a civil proceeding altogether, being merely a commitment for contempt,—that contempt consisting of the refusal of the said defendant to pay certain costs under a decree in Chancery. This had been so decided by the Court of Ex. after a solemn argument, and under those circumstances the duty of the jury in point of law would be to find a verdict for the defendant, and in thus directing the jury he (Pollock, C.B.) knew that it was open to the plaintiff to question that ruling by tendering a bill of exceptions under which he might take the opinion of a Court of Error.

The jury found for the defendant, whereupon Mr. Cobbett tendered a bill of exceptions.

Verdict for the defendant.

CURSON v. BELWORTHY.

Setting aside contract—Undervalue.

Inadequacy of price alone is not sufficient to set aside a contract or deed.

Where, therefore, in a suit instituted to set aside a contract for the purchase of an estate, although great inadequacy of price was proved, yet, as the allegations of misrepresentation and fraud were not sufficiently established, the House refused to disturb the judgment of the Court of Chancery dismissing the complainant's bill in that Court, and dismissed the appeal.

The appellant sued in formâ pauperis. The suit was originally instituted before the late Vice-Chancellor of England, for the purpose of setting aside a contract, bearing date the 24th of September, 1840, for the purchase by the respondent from the appellant of an estate called "Ham," near South Tawnton, in Devonshire, and the subsequent conveyance of that estate to the respondent on the 10th of October following, on the ground that the purchase of the estate had been obtained from the appellant by the respondent by misrepresentation, and at an under-value, at a period when the former was in considerable pecuniary distress, as well as being ignorant of his rights.

John Curson, the paternal grandfather of the appellant, died in the latter part of the year 1817, and by his will, dated the 13th June, in that year, devised the estate of Ham, consisting of a farm of about nine acres of land, with an unlimited right of common over a place called Itton-moor, consisting of upwards of 360 acres. The estate was subject to a mortgage for 120*l*. advanced upon it, bearing interest at 5*l*. per cent. per annum, to his son John Curson, the appellant's father, in tail male. John Curson, the father, died on the 19th of September, 1840, and left the appellant his eldest son and heir in tail. The appellant was represented as being an uneducated person of weak capacity, and unable to read, and ha. been for many years dependent for the subsistence of himself, his wife, and several children, on his wages as a labourer, at the rate of about 16d. a-day. The respondent had, from a period anterior to the year 1838, occupied a good farm in the neighbourhood. Ham is adjacent and peculiarly valuable as an addition to the respondent's farm, and to other farms having rights of common over Itton-moor. In the years 1838 and 1840 the property called Ham was of the value of upwards of 530*l*. after due allowance for its deficient state of repair. On this point the appellant examined five witnesses—William Wreford, who estimated its value at twenty-eight years' purchase as 520*l*.; John Heard, who had rented the right of common of that estate at 5*l*. a-year, and estimated the value of the property at thirty-two years' purchase, as 660*l*.; Thomas Prickman, who estimated its value at twenty-five years' purchase, as 500*l*.; Philip Cann, who, in 1836, offered to purchase the property at the price of 600*l*. which offer was refused by the appellant's father, and who, in 1840 (the appellant's father then proposing to sell it), again offered 500*l*. for it; John Dennis Vanstone, who had, after the year 1830, rented the said right of common for three years, at 5*l*. a-year, and had, in the year 1840, offered to rent the property at 18*l*. a-year, and estimated its value at 500*l*. giving an average of about 526*l*. as its clear value. The respondent examined four witnesses as to the value of the property; namely, John Hooper, who, on the assumption that the right of common was limited to pasture for so much cattle as were levant and couchant on the estate, estimated its value at twenty-eight years' purchase as 222*l*.; William Brock, who said that the right of common was not so limited, and estimated its value at twenty-eight years' purchase as 241*l*. 14s.; Andrew Snell, who did not know what were such rights of common, and estimated its value at twenty-five years' purchase as 236*l*. 5s.; Thomas Powlesland, who estimated its value at 230*l*. giving an average of about 232*l*. 10s. as its clear value. It was upon this state of things contended for the appellants, that the value of the estate must be taken to have been 348*l*. 5s. at least, and deducting therefrom 120*l*. the amount of the mortgage, the equity of redemption was, in the years 1838 and 1840, after making full allowance for want of repair, of the value of 264*l*. 5s. at the least; or that if the witnesses for the appellant were entitled to the greater amount of credit, then that the value of the equity of redemption was 410*l*. The question which now therefore arose was, whether this sale of that equity of redemption in the year 1840 for the sum of 40*l*. procured by the respondent could be sustained. In the year 1838 the appellant and others were under the conviction that he had a saleable interest in the property expectant on his father's death, and in that month, being in pecuniary distress, he entered into a negotiation for the sale of his interest to the respondent for 40*l*. and pending that negotiation the latter advanced several small sums amounting to 14*l*. On the 5th of May following the parties went to the office of the respondent's solicitors, where he executed a document purporting to be a contract for the sale of his interest in the property in question, upon which he received a further 3*l*. from the respondent, out of which sum he paid the solicitors 1*l*. 7s. for preparing the instrument. The appellant had no assistance from any friend or legal adviser in the transaction. The respondent subsequently made further advances, making with those already made, 21*l*. On the 19th of September, 1840, the father of the appellant died, whereupon the latter became tenant in tail male in possession of the estate, and the morning following that upon which the funeral had taken place he went to complete the contract for the sale of the property to the respondent, and after some conversation on the subject of the mother of the appellant having a right of dower, on the 24th of September the latter executed a contract of sale for 160*l*. and on the 10th of October he executed a conveyance of the property to the respondent. The appellant was then informed that the respondent had paid 126*l*. to the mortgagee for principal and interest. Eventually the appellant filed his bill in the Court of Chancery to have the conveyance set aside, upon the ground that that instrument had been obtained from him by fraudulent representations. The matter came on for hearing before the late Vice-Chancellor of England, by whom the bill was dismissed, with costs, on the 14th of March, 1844. The appellant then presented a petition for rehearing against this decree to the late Lord Chancellor Cottenham. The petition was heard on the 11th and 15th of July, 1846, and on the 8th of November, 1847, his lordship affirmed the decree of the Vice Chancellor.

The present was an appeal from that decision, praying that it might be reversed for the following reasons:—"For that the appellant was induced to proceed with the sale of the estate in September and October, 1840, by the impression existing in his mind that he was bound to sell it to the respondent by an agreement made with him in the year 1838. For that the respondent, by his representations and acts, deterred the friends of the appellant from interferring to prevent the sale. That the said contract and conveyance were obtained at a price grossly inadequate to the value of the estate. That the appellant was, at the time of such contract, under the influence of the respondent. That the appellant was, at the time of such contract, insufficiently acquainted with his rights and the value of the estate. That the appellant was in pecuniary distress, and not of sufficient capacity of mind to deal on equal terms with the respondent in such a transaction; and lastly, that in preparing and conducting the said contract and conveyance, the solicitors were, in truth, the solicitors only of the respondent, and the appellant had not the due protection of any friend or independent legal adviser."

Bethell, Q.C. and Willcock, Q.C. were heard at considerable length for the appellant.

Shapter, for the respondent.

JUDGMENT.

Friday, June 18.—The LORD CHANCELLOR (St. Leonard's) moved the judgment of the House in the following words:—This case of Curson v. Belworthy comes before your lordships on an appeal from the decision of my Lord Cottenham, confirming the decision of the Vice-Chancellor of England. The plaintiff in the cause endeavoured to impeach a conveyance which he had made of a small cottage and about two acres of land, to which he was entitled, upon the ground of fraud and misconduct on the part of the purchaser. By the Vice-Chancellor of England the bill was dismissed with costs; and on that decision being appealed from, the decree of the Vice-Chancellor was affirmed. The case now comes before your lordships, of course, upon the merits, but principally upon two allegations, one of which is, that the Lord Chancellor misapprehended the allegations and statements in the case; and the other (which springs out of it), that he misapprehended the nature of the allegation in regard to the manner in which the plaintiff (the seller) was misled; that the Lord Chancellor supposed the plaintiff to have alleged, that in point of fact he had executed a contract, when he had only executed a bond; whereas (his ground of argument) the true view of the case, and that which was alleged by the appellant, was, not that he had executed a contract, but that he had executed a security, which he thought bound him to sell the estate to the defendant. I believe that is a correct representation of the way in which it was put at your lordships' bar. Now there was a great deal, no doubt, in this case to invite the appellant to attempt to set aside the sale. The estate, a very small property belonging to a very poor family, was originally entailed upon the father of the appellant. That property had been mortgaged by the father for 100*l.* and at the time when the conveyance was ultimately executed by the son, 25*l.* had been added to the 100*l.* for arrears of interest. The son, in his father's lifetime, in 1838, had taken advice, it seems, upon his own rights, and he believed that he himself had a right to dispose of the estate, that as his father had not barred the entail he thought his father was tenant for life only of the estate, and that he therefore could dispose of the estate in his father's lifetime. The case is differently stated in the bill, but according to the statement in the answer, and according to the probabilities arising from the evidence of the attorneys, and of the documents in the case, he offered his interest in the estate, in his father's lifetime, to Belworthy, the ultimate purchaser, for 40*l.* Belworthy seems to have gone to an attorney, a gentleman of the name of Medland, and to have asked him whether this man, the appellant, could not dispose of the property: and Curson, the appellant, went with him. A conversation ensued upon the subject, and Belworthy was told by Mr. Medland that the appellant had not any interest in the property. He happened to have a copy of the will by him; and he saw that the father was tenant in tail, and that, although the son might succeed to the estate, yet that the property was in the disposition of the father, who could dispose of it against the son, and against all his issue. He told him, therefore, that he had not a saleable interest. That resulted, according to the representation of the defendant, the purchaser, and according to the documents which were executed, in a loan from Belworthy, who ultimately became the purchaser, to Curson the son, living the father, which loan was to amount altogether to 20*l.* forthwith, and they went then together to the attorney, when a common printed money bond was filled up to secure 20*l.* with interest at a short date. There the transaction rested. It is perfectly clear from the evidence that no communication took place, either between the man who advanced the money and his own attorney, or between the man to whom the money was advanced (that is, Curson, the appellant) and Belworthy, until the death of the father in 1840. I think he died on the 19th of September in that year. He was buried very shortly afterwards—on the 22nd, I think—and then transactions took place which I must presently go into more circumstantially. Now, on the 22nd of September, the funeral of the father took place, and Belworthy, the purchaser, was one of the bearers, as he describes himself at the funeral. It is alleged that a conversation arose after the funeral in regard to this property. It is very differently stated in the bill and in the answer, but the consequence was, that on the next day, the 23rd of September, the purchaser and the seller resorted again to Mr. Medland, and there a contract was drawn up by Mr. Medland and his partner—a clear and explicit contract—without any reference to the previous contract whatever, and that contract was executed for the sale of the property, for the sum of 160*l.* which of course was to be clear of the mortgage, which was to be paid off, and the purchaser was to pay all expenses of every sort, as well those which fell upon the purchaser, as those which ought ordinarily, without any stipulation to the contrary, to fall on the vendor. Now, it is sworn distinctly that, both upon the first occasion and upon this occasion, the contract was read over to Curson, and the attorney swears that he was perfectly competent to understand it. He is represented by his own witnesses as a man of weak mind I think that that is not borne out by the evidence, and by the circumstances of the case, and it is certainly contradicted, as far as the testimony of the attorney goes; and it is contradicted also by the testimony of the other persons, who speak to his general conduct, and to his capacity in matters of business. There the matter rested till the 24th of September, when the contract was executed. The conveyance was to have been executed on the 3rd of October, but it was put off until the 10th; and then Curson and his wife go, and Belworthy himself also goes again, to the attorney. The conveyance is then read over in the presence of Curson, and in the presence of Belworthy. A discussion arose with reference to a claim of dower, and there being a claim on the part of Belworthy for interest of the money which he had advanced by way of loan, Curson's wife said that, as there was no claim of dower existing, Belworthy had made a better bargain than he expected; and, therefore, she appealed to him not to charge interest. Belworthy at first declined, but at length agreed to accede to the request, and, accordingly, interest was not charged, and the contract was completed by the execution of the conveyance. Now, looking at it in that way, it is as simple a transaction as ever took place; and now the question for your lordships to consider is, what weight is to be attached to the evidence which is brought forward to support the charge which is made by the appellant in his bill, that the transaction was a fraudulent one? There were a great many circumstances here naturally calculated, as I have already said, to induce the appellant to challenge this conveyance. The appellant himself was a labourer, receiving some eight or nine shillings a week. He was an uneducated man; he could neither read nor write, and he had a wife and family to support out of his small earnings. He is represented as a man of ordinary natural capacity, and although that capacity had not been improved by education, he seems, according to the evidence for the respondent, to have understood what he was about. Then it is also represented that he had no attorney. One of the attorneys says he conceived that he was acting for both parties in the transaction. That, I think, has been made out. I think the attorney for the purchaser acted for both parties, without being directly and immediately consulted and confided in by the seller. Then in addition to that there is a very singular circumstance, which no man who reads this evidence can, I think, fail to observe,—that the estate was sold considerably under its value; not at such an under-value as shocks the conscience, as has been said in times long past, so that the moment you hear it stated you start, and say "This cannot have been a fair transaction," but at such an under-value as would, with other circumstances, be sufficient to induce the Court to set aside the contract if there was actual fraud proved. Now, I should have thought that the true way of bringing this case forward ordinarily would have been this: that the contract was entered into improvidently, according to the doctrine laid down by Lord Kenyon in Evans v. Blood, in 2 Brown's P. Cas. 632. In that case the property was sold at a price greatly below its real value, and under circumstances in which the seller seemed to be in great haste to get rid of the burthen of the inheritance which had been suddenly cast upon him; and looking at all the circumstances of the case, I am not prepared to say that it might not have borne that construction. But the case has been put differently. It has been brought forward as a case of absolute fraud on the part of the purchaser; and that fraud is alleged in the clearest terms in the bill, which prays that the conveyance may be set aside for fraud; and the evidence in support of that case consists of statements which are made with a view to shew that there was a fraudulent intention. Now, my lords, the whole of the case, as I understand it, is this; that with reference to the selling transaction, it was represented to Curson, and he was induced to believe that he had bound himself by a contract. I have told your lordships that that was not the true construction of it, and that he was induced to believe that the instrument of security which he had executed, bound him, when he became possessed of the estate, to sell it to Mr. Belworthy. Now, in order to make out this case, the allegation in the bill, as I read it, appears to me to result in this,—that what turns out to be a bond was alleged to be a contract under seal. There is no proof whatever of that allegation. Belworthy denies it in his answer, and it is discredited by all that appears in the evidence. There cannot be any question that the loan was made upon the supposition that the property would probably come to this man, because nobody can suppose that Belworthy would have advanced 20*l.* to a labourer receiving from eight to ten shillings a week, if he had not looked to the probability of his succeeding at his father's death to this property. Morally speaking, I cannot doubt that in advancing that money he had in view the probability of the appellant ultimately becoming possessed of this property, and that the connection which it formed between him and Curson might lead to that result which he desired. But, as I have already observed, Curson was left alone by Belworthy, from the very day that the bond was executed in 1838, until the death of the father, in the autumn of 1840. There was no attempt to keep up an influence over him, but he was left alone with his friends to deal as he pleased with the property. Now, the bill having laid this foundation, and turned the bond into a contract, everything is referred to a contract in the bill; and it being then pressed as a case in which Curson believed himself bound by a contract, and Belworthy being represented throughout the bill as urging on Curson to sell, he goes to the attorney, and the contract is executed, which he believes to be simply in furtherance of his obligation to sell the estate. Every word of it was read over to him. The contract is perfectly plain and intelligible; it is exceedingly well drawn, it is thoroughly explicit, there is no ambiguity in it, whoever runs may read, it was read over to him, and he heard every syllable of it. Then the bill goes on to allege that the conveyance was executed in pursuance of that contract, that contract being alleged to have sprung from, and to have been founded upon, the original contract, which was supposed to exist, but which never did exist in fact. Then there is an allegation in the bill of certain admissions made on the part of Belworthy. It is not very likely that he should have made such admissions, but the admissions are so alleged, and, in point of fact, are so proved by the three brothers of the appellant, as to lead to the conclusion that they did not follow, but that they preceded any agreement. I am not talking of the contract signed, but it appears that the supposed admissions preceded, and did not follow, any agreement after the death of the father to sell the estate. Now the fact was really this, according to the statement in the answer, and certainly according to every probability of the case, that Curson, having gone over to Belworthy on the 23rd of September, a conversation then took place between them. It is sworn in the answer, though I do not take that as evidence, that Curson began the conversation about Ham, and the result was, that there was a verbal agreement entered into at that very meeting, on the 23rd, to sell the estate to Belworthy, which agreement was carried into effect on the 24th, by all the parties meeting the attorneys and entering into a regular contract. Now, nobody would suppose that they would have gone to Crediton to an attorney to execute a contract on the 24th, unless there had been some previous treaty. That previous treaty must have taken place on the 23rd. They all went over to Crediton, to the attorney's, and waited a considerable time while the contract was being prepared; the contract was then read over to them, and was regularly executed. The treaty between the parties must have preceded that, of course. Now the conversations which are sworn to as having occurred after that communication between the parties, in which Curson had agreed to sell to Belworthy, are perfectly consistent with the whole case, as it appears to me; because Belworthy was then speaking to the witnesses with reference to a purchase which he had actually made; and the expression made use of by Curson himself, which is proved by his own witnesses, strongly corroborates that view; because, on his brother remonstrating with him, he says, "it is sold, or as good as sold,"—a remarkable expression, which one understands when used by a person in that condition of life. If these conversations took place before the verbal agreement, it would have been an act of folly on the part of Belworthy, of which no man can suppose he would be guilty; because, against all truth and against everything that appears in the case, he would have been declaring that he had bought the property, when in fact he had not bought it at all. Well, my lords, the bill further puts the case on an untrue ground; it puts it upon the ground of an attempt by Belworthy, for which there is not the slightest foundation, to represent the bond as a contract which bound this man. It is curious enough, as was observed by the Vice-Chancellor of England, with reference to what is sworn as to the attempt to impress on the different parties what was the operation of the bond, that no man ventures to swear that that impression was conveyed to his mind. Now, my lords, this is a very remarkable case as regards the evidence. The purchaser himself was a small farmer, but of sufficient substance to enable him to buy this property. He was present at this cottager's funeral. After the funeral the parties adjourned to a public-house, and there conversations arose with reference to this property, and afterwards, on the 23rd of September, several of them went to Ham itself, the place in question, and there other conversations occurred. Now, one thing which has struck my mind very forcibly in this case is, that Curson himself, the appellant at your Lordships' bar, was surrounded by his family. He had three brothers,—Andrew, Thomas, and John,—all assisting him with their advice, and all in point of fact endeavouring to persuade him not to sell this property. That you can very easily understand. One can readily suppose that, small as this property was, they looked with great apprehension and alarm at the entail being cut off. The brothers, therefore, were persuading him not to sell the property, and out of the advice they gave arose a conversation. There was a man named Vanstone, who is said to have been connected in some way with the solicitor, and to have taken a considerable part in these proceedings; and he himself, it is said, wanted to rent this estate, and assisted in imposing on the appellant. Now, this man, the appellant, who was a labourer, was a married man, and his wife seems to have been an active and vigilant woman; perfectly competent to understand business; as when the conveyance was executed she went with her husband to the attorney's. She interfered, and insisted on a reduction of the interest from the purchase-money. It became a matter of contest. The purchaser gave way at last, and then she made an observation, which shewed that they were aware it was a bargain, for she said to the purchaser, "You have got a better bargain than you thought for;" and therefore she asked that something might be struck off, which ultimately was done. Now, when your lordships consider that this man had the assent of his three brothers, all of whom were most anxious, as the evidence shews, that he should not complete this purchase,—when you consider that he had the assent of his wife, a shrewd and vigilant woman, —it is perfectly clear that there is no evidence to establish the charge made in the bill. The man was left alone for a couple of years, and during all that time this estate no doubt formed a constant subject of conversation in his family. Even after his father's death he was vigilant; for it is in evidence that in point of fact Curson went to the mortgagee, and before he entered into the contract for the sale of the estate, he said to Mr. Medland, "What shall we do if the mortgagee will not take his money?" Upon which the attorney said, "I shall have no objection to advance the money;" so that Curson was going about with a view to facilitate the completion of the transaction. I can well account for Curson's conduct by the circumstances in which he was unhappily placed. He had this small property devolve upon him. He owed 20*l.* to Mr. Belworthy; and he uses it as a badge of fraud that no interest on that 20*l.* had been demanded from him by Belworthy; and he draws an inference from that, that the money which he had already received was given to him as part of the purchase-money. It appears to me that there is not the slighest foundation for that. No man, I think, can doubt, who understands the nature of these transactions, that the money was advanced upon the probability of the estate coming to Curson; and there is no doubt in my mind that it was so advanced to him, not from a mere regard to this man, or from a desire to assist him, but in the hope that it might lead thereafter to Belworthy's coming into possession of the estate. In those circumstances, it is not at all surprising that the interest should not have been demanded; indeed, I should have been surprised if it had been demanded. How could Belworthy have expected to get interest even on 20*l.* from a man whose weekly income did not exceed eight or nine shillings, and who had a wife and family to support. The intention, no doubt, was to have it paid out of the estate ultimately, if it should come to this man in his lifetime. I think that is shewn by what took place at the attorney's office; for when the subject was first mooted, the attorneys were asked, whether Curson could make a title; and upon being told that he could not, Belworthy refused to purchase at that time. This man might have died in his father's lifetime, and the father might have barred the estate tail. Upon the whole case, my Lords, my opinion is, that there is no evidence to make out the allegation in the bill. If we look at the earlier transactions, as they stand upon the instruments, nothing could be more correct. The bond is in the common form. It is filled up in the regular way, and witnessed. It was read over to the man who executed it. With a full knowledge of what he was doing, he received the money which was secured by the bond, and he never affected to deny the debt, but allowed it to remain unquestioned. Then the contract which was entered into was also read over to him. It begins by reciting that he has now contracted to sell,—not that he had contracted in 1838 to sell the property,—but it is a present contract to sell the property. The family were talking of this contract, as is apparent from conversations which are detailed in the evidence. This man could not neglect a day's work, and go over to the attorney's, and enter into this contract, without its being the subject of conversation among his own family and neighbours; but not a word of objection is raised, and sixteen days afterwards the contract is carried out by the execution of the conveyance. The appellant is a pauper. The case is one certainly of hardship; for this estate has been obtained for an under-value by a man of superior capacity and of higher position than himself, who may be considered, therefore, as having obtained an advantage, by securing to himself this property from a man who was a pauper, but at the same time it appears to me that the appellant has failed to make out the allegations in his bill, and therefore I should advise your lordships to dismiss this appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

The "BOLD BUCCLEUGH."

Saturday, April 24.

HARMER v. BELL and OTHERS.

Ship—Collision—Maritime lien—Proceeding in rem—Foreign attachment—Lis alibi pendens.

A Scotch steamer ran down an English barque lying in the Humber, and kept out of the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty. The owners of the steamer were then sued in Scotland, and the steamer was arrested there, but released on bail, and then sold without notice of this unsatisfied claim. The Scotch suit still pending, she re-appeared in England, when she was immediately arrested under an Admiralty warrant, and an action for damage entered in the Admiralty Court here, the cause of action being the same, though instructions were immediately sent to abandon the Scotch suit. The owner of the steamer appeared under protest to this Admiralty action, pleading lis alibi pendens and purchase without notice:

Held—1. The plea of lis alibi pendens was bad, as the suit in Scotland was substantially a proceeding in personam, while the present was in rem; 2. The ship was liable, into whose hands soever she had come.

When a vessel at sea causes damage, an inchoate lien emerges, and when the amount of the damage is judicially ascertained by a proceeding in rem, the lien relates back to the period when it first attached, and takes priority, to the extent of the then value of the vessel, of all other liens, and travels with the vessel wherever she goes or into whose hands soever she passes: but this lien arising out of damage is not indelible, but may be lost by negligence or delay, where the rights of third parties are compromised.

A foreign attachment like that which prevails in London, Scotland, &c. is intended solely to compel an appearance; whereas a proceeding in rem in the Admiralty Court for wages, salvage, collision, or bottomry, goes against the ship in the first instance.

A maritime lien and a proceeding in rem are correlative: wherever a proceeding in rem is competent, a lien exists, and vice versâ.

This was an appeal from the High Court of Admiralty of England. The Bold Buccleugh was a steamer, which belonged to the Edinburgh and Dundee Steam-packet Company, the partners of which company all resided in Scotland; and she traded between the ports of Leith, in Scotland, and Kingston-upon-Hull, in Yorksh[ire]. On the night of the 11th December, 1848, as the barque William was lying at anchor in the river Humber, it was run down and totally destroyed by the Bold Buccleugh, then on her voyage to Leith. On the 19th December an action for damage was entered in the Court of Admiralty here on behalf of the respondents, Bell and others, the owners of the William, who resided in England; and a warrant was forwarded to Hull to arrest the steamer, but she had left before the arrival of the warrant, which, consequently, could not be executed. The owners of the Bold Buccleugh were applied to, to give bail to this action entered in the Admiralty Court, but declined to do so. Thereafter the Bold Buccleugh kept out of the way, and ceased to ply to Hull, or to come within the jurisdiction of the Court. The owners of the William being thus unable to obtain redress, resorted to the Court of Session, which is the Court of Admiralty in Scotland, and on 30th January, 1849, commenced a suit against the above owners of the steamer, and she was forthwith arrested in Leith Harbour, but on bail being given she was released. While this Scotch suit was pending, the owners of the Bold Buccleugh, on 26th June, 1849, by a bill of sale, absolutely sold her to Harmer, the appellant, for 4,800*l.* and they did not apprise him that there were any unsatisfied claims arising out of damage to the William. In the end of August following, the Bold Buccleugh reappeared on her old track, between Leith and Hull, upon which the owners of the William, without discontinuing the Scotch suit, entered on 27th August, 1849, an action in the Admiralty Court here in the sum of 2,600*l.* and on her coming to Hull she was arrested by virtue of a fresh warrant under seal of that Court. The appellant, her owner, then entered appearance under protest, and gave bail to the action. On the act of protest being brought in, affidavits were produced by Harmer, that he had no notice of the unsatisfied claim when he purchased the steamer. The owners of the William also produced an affidavit of their attorney in Scotland, which shewed that, subsequent to the present action being brought, they had offered to abandon the Scotch suit, and that, though this was opposed by Harmer, who applied to be made a party, yet in respect of this abandonment the suit was at length finally dismissed by the Court of Session, on 6th December, 1849. The contents of the protest now insisted in before the Judge of the Admiralty were— 1. That at the time of the arrest there was lis alibi pendens. 2. The steamer had been sold prior to the arrest, and it was unjust that the innocent purchaser should suffer. Both points of the protest were overruled, and Harmer and his bail were condemned in costs. (See 3 W. Rob. 220.) Against this order or decree Harmer now appealed.

Anderson, Q.C. and Dr. Haggard, for appellant.— Liens are created by bottomry, mortgage, salvage, and wages, but it has never yet been decided, that liens arise out of damage. If there was a lien, we admit it would be vigorous enough to give jurisdiction. Liens are not favourites of the law, and the silence or absence of authority is primâ facie hostile to the assumption, that damage founds a lien. If then there was no lien here, the arrest was in the nature of an attachment. Now a foreign attachment exists in London and Scotland, and its sole object is to compel an appearance. The proceeding in rem in the Admiralty was precisely the same— we seize the ship, and if the owners do not come forward, we sell it: but if they do come forward, we deal with them exclusively. If then there was no lien, how can this undefined claim of damage travel with the ship wherever she goes? Can a ship which at some former period of her history may have caused a collision, and may have subsequently passed through the hands of twenty different owners —can she be arrested in whatever part of the world she may be for this early misfeasance? If so, the rights of third parties, including innocent purchasers, would be inextricable. The present rather resembles the case of cattle damage feasant being sold. There the proceeding is also in rem, but then it must be taken at the time. There being then no lien on the ship for the damage, what was the effect of the release of the ship in Scotland? The release was a mere modus procedendi. The object of the arrest being not to make available any lien, for such did not exist, but merely to get a fund to satisfy the damage, the release merely discharged the process of the Court and left the ship in statu quo as before the arrest. The Scotch suit being therefore for the same cause of action, and the proceeding being the same substantially, lis alibi pendens was a good plea to this action, and the purchaser, having had no notice, cannot have his ship now arrested and made liable. The following authorities were cited during the argument:—Ned Elwin, 1 Dodson, 50; John Dunn, 1 W. Rob. 161; The Aline, Id. 111; The Hope, Id. 154; re Alexander, Id. 288; The Volant, Id. 383; The Druid, Id. 391; The Fortitudo, 2 Dodson.

Dr. Addams, contrà. Cur. adv. vult.

JERVIS, C.J. now delivered the judgment of the Court.—There were two questions in this case. First, the effect of the pendency of another proceeding in Scotland for the same cause. Secondly, the liability of the vessel by a proceeding in rem after a bonâ fide sale without notice. It is manifest that these two defences are of a totally different nature, the first being a declinatory plea, properly the subject of a protest: and the second an absolute bar. Generally it is inconvenient to depart from the settled rules of procedure, and to raise such questions differing in degree by the same defence; but as the Court below did not object to this course, we merely notice it to observe, that we do not approve of such a proceeding, and pass on to deliver our opinions upon the two points raised. Upon the first point, we have not, from the commencement of the discussion, entertained any doubt, but we desired the second question to be re-argued, because it was of great general importance, and because we were unable to find any authorities bearing directly upon it, and some of the cases to which we were referred were apparently conflicting with each other. The course which was taken upon the second argument makes it convenient to dispose of the second question in the first instance. It is admitted that the Court of Admiralty has jurisdiction in a case of collision by a proceeding in rem against the ship itself; but it is said that the arrest of the vessel is only a means of compelling the appearance of the owners, that the damage confers no lien upon the ship, and that the owners having appeared, the question is to be determined according to the interests of the party litigant, without reference to the original liability of the vessel causing the wrong. For these propositions, dicta have been referred to which are entitled to great respect, but which, upon consideration, will be found not to support the propositions for which they were cited. In the Johan Frederic, W. Rob. 37, Dr. Lushington is reported to have said, that proceedings in rem in the Court of Admiralty were analogous to those by foreign attachment in the courts of the city of London. For the purpose for which that allusion was made, viz. the liability of the property of foreigners to be arrested by process out of the Court of Admiralty and the courts of the city of London, the two proceedings may be analogous, but in other respects they are altogether different. The foreign attachment is founded upon a plaint against the principal debtor, and must be returned nihil before any step can be taken against the garnishee; the proceeding in rem, whether for wages, salvage, collision, or on bottomry, goes against the ship in the first instance. In the former case the proceedings are in personam, in the latter they are in rem. The attachment, like a common law distringas, is merely for the purpose of compelling an appearance, and if the defendant appears within a year and a day, even after judgment and execution against the garnishee, and puts in bail, the attachment is abandoned. If the owners do not appear to the warrant arresting the ship, the proceedings go on without reference to their default, and the decree is confined exclusively to the vessel. Many other distinctions will be found upon reference to the notes to Treobell's case, 1 Wms. Saund. 67, n. 1. It is not correct, therefore, to say, that the proceeding in rem is in all respects analogous to the proceeding by foreign attachment, and that the former is merely to compel an appearance because the latter is undoubtedly for that purpose only. In all proceedings in rem, whatever be the foundation of the jurisdiction, the warrant is the same, and the proceedings are conducted in the same form, and there is no reason for saying that a different rule is to prevail where the foundation of the jurisdiction is a collision, from that which is admitted to be the practice when the suit is instituted for salvage, or the recovery of wages against the ship. But it is further said, that the damage confers no lien upon the ship, and a dictum of Dr. Lushington in the case of the Volant, 1 W. Rob. 387, is cited as an authority for this proposition. By reference to a contemporaneous report of the same case (1 Notes of Cases, 508), it seems doubtful, whether the learned judge did use the expression attributed to him by Dr. W. Robinson. If he did, the expression is certainly inaccurate, and being a dictum merely, not necessary for the decision of that case, cannot be taken as a binding authority. A maritime lien does not include or require possession. The word is used in maritime law not in the strict legal sense in which we understand it in courts of common law, in which case there could be no lien where there was no possession, actual or constructive, but to express, as if by analogy, the nature of claims which neither presuppose nor originate in possession. This was well understood in the civil law, by which there might be a pledge with possession, and a hypothecation without possession, and by which in either case the right travelled with the thing into whosesoever possession it came. Having its origin in this rule of the civil law, a maritime lien is well defined by Lord Tenterden to mean a claim or privilege upon a thing to be carried into effect by legal process, and Mr. Justice Story (1 Sum. Rep. 78) explains that process to be a proceeding in rem, and adds that wherever a lien or claim is given upon the thing, then the Admiralty enforces it by a proceeding in rem, and indeed is the only Court competent to enforce it. A maritime lien is the foundation of the proceeding in rem, a process to make perfect a right inchoate from the moment the lien attaches, and whilst it must be admitted that where such a lien exists a proceeding in rem may be had, it will be found to be equally true that in all cases where a proceeding in rem is the proper course there a maritime lien exists, which gives a privilege or claim upon the thing to be carried into effect by legal process. This claim or thing travels with the thing into whosesoever possession it may come. It is inchoate from the moment the claim or privilege attaches, and when carried into effect by legal process by a proceeding in rem, relates back to the period when it first attached. This simple rule, which, in our opinion, must govern this case, and which is deduced from the civil law, cannot be better illustrated than by reference to the circumstances of "The Aline," referred to in the argument, and decided in conformity with this rule, though apparently upon other grounds. In that case there was a bottomry bond before and after the collision, and the Court held that the claimant for damage in a proceeding in rem must be preferred to the first bondholder, but was not entitled against the second bondholder to the increased value of the vessel, by reason of repairs effected at his cost. The interest of the first bondholder taking effect from the period when his lien attached, he was, so to speak, a part owner in interest at the date of the collision, and the ship in which he and others were interested was liable to its value at that date for the injury done with reference to his claim. So by the collision the interest of the claimant attached, and dating from that event, the ship in which he was interested having been repaired, was put in bottomry by the master, acting for all parties, and he would be bound by that transaction. This rule, which is simple and intelligible, is, in our opinion, applicable to all cases. It is not necessary to say that the lien is indelible, and may not be lost by negligence or delay, where the rights of third parties may be thereby compromised, but where reasonable diligence is used, and the proceedings are had in good faith, the lien may be enforced into whosesoever possession the thing may come. The remaining point may be disposed of in a few words. The pleadings shew that the proceedings in Scotland were commenced by process against the persons of the defendants, and that the seizure of the vessel was collateral to that proceeding for the mere purpose of securing the debt. We have already explained that, in our judgment, a proceeding in rem differs from this, the one being in personam, the other in rem; and it follows that the two suits, being in their nature different, the pendency of the one cannot be pleaded in suspension of the other. For these reasons, we are of opinion that the judgment of the Court below must be affirmed with costs.

Equity Courts.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S COURT.

(Before Lord St. Leonards, L.C.)

Tuesday, June 1.

Re North of England Joint-Stock Banking Company, ex parte Crossfield.

Joint stock company—Winding-up Acts—Power of Master to review his decision—Contributory—Executor—Costs.

A. the holder of shares in a joint-stock company died in 1838, appointing H. and C. his executors. In March 1849, the Master on the winding up of the company, placed the name of H. on the list of contributories as personally liable in respect of those shares. In February 1851 he struck out the name of H. and instead thereof substituted the names of H. and C. as the executors of A.

Held, affirming the decision of the Vice-Chancellor, that it was competent to the Master under the Joint Stock Companies Amendment Act, 1849, to review his decision in that respect.

A. being the holder of shares in a joint-stock company, by her will bequeathed them to her son (H.) and daughter, and appointed H. and C. her executors. A. died in 1838, and her will was proved by both executors, who thereupon wound up her estate, except with reference to these shares. In 1840 the probate was entered in the books of the company, pursuant to the directions in the company's deed, and which thereupon gave H. and C. a right to deal with the shares.

In the dividend lists of 1815 and 1816, H.'s name appeared as executor, but the warrants were made out in favour of H. simply. From the death of A. to the year 1848 H. received the dividends on the shares, and had various communications with the managers of the company in respect of them. In the greater part of these communications H. called himself, and was called executor of A., but in some of them no allusion was made to his representative character. C. never had anything to do with the management, and in no way interfered with the shares. On the winding up of the company in 1848 it was Held, affirming the decision of the Court below, that H. and C. were properly placed on the list of contributories as executors of A.

In a case where there was a great deal of merit, but no law, the Court refused to follow the general rule as to costs, on the dismissal of a petition of appeal.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce. The facts of the case were reported at length on the original hearing (17 Law T. Rep. 47).

Russell, Daniel, and Randell appeared for the appellant, and cited The North of England Banking Company, ex parte Doyle, 2 Hall & Twells, 221; and Best's case, 16 Law T. 340.

Bacon and J. V. Prior, for the company.

Russell, in reply.

The Lord Chancellor.—I very much regret being compelled to decide this case against Mr. Crossfield. It is a very hard case; he has been guilty of no misconduct of any sort or kind, and he is visited at a distance of some years with a considerable infliction that ought not to fall on him; but I am afraid the rule of law is too strong for me. The first point which is made against his liability is upon the Act of 1849, and it is insisted that the power there given to the Master is not retrospective, and that at all events I must decide whether it be altogether retrospective and cannot be prospective—it cannot be both. Now from the view that has been taken at the bar, I entirely dissent. I think the words are clearly retrospective; but then I think the words very naturally, and easily bend to the clear intention of the Legislature, and would be prospectively applicable to a then future event. A past event has already taken place to which the words will apply. A past event will by and by take place, and a future event to which the words will clearly apply. I cannot think there is any doubt upon the retrospective operation of the words grammatically considered. Now it is clear what the intent of the Act was: there had been a great number of cases in which the Master, according to the recent decisions of the Court, had miscarried, and, according to the decision of the higher authorities, it was not possible to review those cases: they, who had a right and were bound to decide whether the construction of the Master was right or wrong, did, according to their view, decide that the conclusion to which the Master had arrived was wrong, and required correction, and that it could only be corrected under the Act of Parliament. It is said that the 17th section of the Winding-up Amendment Act 1849, is entirely inconsistent with this construction, but it does not appear to me to be so; that section gives a power to the Master, and that power therefore being given to an officer of this court, it was no doubt considered that it might be entrusted to him with greater latitude than could be given to a co-contributor, and as by the former Act of 1848 that power was given in this very case, for example, where one party had been included and another excluded by the Master, so that there could be no longer a power to vary that order, still the Act of Parliament of 1849, even in the case of a contributor, went so far as to say, that the contributor might still bring a co-contributor before the Court, although he had been included or excluded under the old Act in respect of any shares which had not been brought for adjudication in the former instance. It appears to me therefore, I confess, that there is no doubt about the legal right between the gentlemen here. But then the next question is, whether I can hold that the acts which have taken place between the company and Mr. Hall, one of the executors, varies the right of the company, or of the official manager as representing it. Now, the shares in question belonged to Ann Hall, and they are entered regularly in the books of the company in her name, and she by her will gave them to her daughter and son. Richard Hall was one of the legatees, and he, with Mr. Crossfield, were joint executors. Mr. Crossfield does not appear to have taken an active interest; he says he wound up all the executorship affairs years ago, except with reference to these thirty shares, and that he considered he had nothing further to do in regard to those shares. Now, as regards the winding up: the winding up is all very well as between the co-executor and the legatees, but it had not the slightest bearing against persons who were entitled to come in as creditors against the assets; unfortunately, Mr. Crossfield was in the predicament which too often happens to a man proving and acting as executor, but trusting (as he ought not to have done for his own sake) to the acts of his co-executor, for which he might be made and clearly is liable, and yet not looking after his co-executor, or seeing how he executed his duties. Now, Mr. Crossfield, on the death of the testator, having proved the will, became liable, as I have said, in all respects; and he subsequently acted. When the probate was carried into the office of the company, there is a very proper entry still under the original name of Ann Hall—"Probate, &c. of Ann Hall's will, exhibited here 9th March, 1815; Richard Hall her son, and James Crossfield, executors: dated 9th December, 1839;" and with that entry is a memorandum where Mr. Crossfield lives. That, therefore, is a compliance with the direction in the Act of Parliament, and gave them a right as executors to deal with the shares according to the provisions of the deed. Now, one great point which has been made, and the leading point on the part of the appellant, is this, that by section 30 of the deed constituting the company, no executor would be entitled to receive the profits of the share of his testator until he should have become a member, but that those profits should be kept in suspense accumulating; and then it was said, first, that a great damage had accrued to Mr. Crossfield because the money had not been in such deposit; for had it been so (as it ought to have been), it would have gone to answer in a great measure the liability (if any) of that gentleman; and, secondly, that it shewed that Mr. Richard Hall had been accepted as a member of the company, and that they were bound by that acceptance. In the first place, I have held, and am prepared to hold again, that directors may do acts binding upon the whole body, by which they waive certain formalities which they ought to have executed in regard to the transfer of shares. (Ex parte Straffon's Executors, 19 Law T. Rep. 78.) But in this case a privilege has been conceded to one of two executors: one executor may act—one executor is entitled to receive, and therefore there is a privilege and a benefit to both of the executors. If Mr. Crossfield had chosen to have availed himself of it, it enured to both. It might be considered, therefore, to have been received by both; and it was a benefit, and not a burden. But Mr. Crossfield could have got no benefit, if the money had been there, because the latter part of the clause, which has not been adverted to, declares that the money shall "remain in suspense, and shall not be paid till the transfer thereo shall be completed, and the new holder thereof shal claim the same, and every transfer shall carry with i the profits and interest and share of capital," and sc on; the consequence of which is, that if it had bee accumulated, as is here directed, it would no have been unfortunately a fund in hand for th benefit of Mr. Crossfield, but it would have been fund really in suspense—nominally ready, not fo him, but for the person who bought the share, and as the shares are worth nothing but waste paper, and, of course, wholly unsaleable, they would not bring any benefit, but would impose a great burden; that money, if it had remained in suspense, never could have been a benefit to Mr. Crossfield, or any body else; so that it cannot be said that Mr. Crossfield sustained any loss, but might have had a benefit. Then the question is, can this admission on the part of the directors be held to be an admission of Richard Hall in his own proper person as a member and owner of this property? Now, the will does not give him any right so to make himself owner of the property. I do not see myself any very clear direction in the deed of what is to be done in the case of several executors; whether you are to take those early clauses, and say the first is entitled to be a member—which, I think, is doubtful—or whether you must not resort to those other clauses—which I apprehend, is the true construction—and say that they must all be members, and that no other course is left for them. However, without deciding that, am I to consider this Act so relied on, as an admission of this gentleman, supposing he could be admitted? Clearly I cannot consider it so, because every Act I have before me shews a direct contrary dealing with that gentleman. He never asked to be a member in the proper character of a member. When he sold the fifteen shares, the notice he gave was as executor. When he wrote those letters, not in every one, but in two out of three, he speaks of the shares as those of Ann Hall. In all the documents I have before me there is not one in which he is introduced as a member. In every single instance the credit is given for the dividends to the executor; and although that is discharged on the opposite side by the payment to him, yet of course it must be in that character in respect of which, on the opposite side, the credit is given to him. I must say I never saw a case in which there was less foundation for the argument that the dealings between the parties had altered the right that existed between them. I have looked with the greatest care and anxiety to see if I could find anything of the sort, for I have been anxious to relieve Mr. Crossfield if I could, but there is nothing of the sort in any part of the dealings or any one of the documents. Well, then, the clause referred to by Mr. Prior at the end of the deed shews these parties, who must be considered as shareholders, cannot have been taken by surprise in this respect, for there is an actual independent covenant binding their real and personal representatives by the shareholders, that they shall continue liable in respect of any shares that form part of their assets. Why was that introduced? Because the executors, quâ executors, not becoming members and not having sold, would not themselves be responsible personally, as has been decided in the cases that have been referred to, and properly decided, and as I have since decided, and therefore they must be assumed to have been perfectly aware, as members, that until they sold and other persons came in their place, there would be no personal responsibility. The original shareholders entered into covenants that their real and personal assets should be considered liable for all the conditions under the deed which would attach to any shareholder whilst the shares remained the assets of the particular shareholder. This is a case, unfortunately, with a good deal of merit, but without any law. It is too clear to entertain any doubt about it, and therefore I am under the necessity of affirming the decision of the Vice-Chancellor. But this really is so hard a case that I shall not do what I consider myself bound to do in most cases where a party has no merits, and chooses to try an experiment in which he cannot succeed; in such a case I should feel bound to dismiss the appeal with costs, but this is an appeal that I shall not dismiss with costs. I think it is a hard case on Mr. Crossfield, and I am not surprised at the attempt made to relieve him from such an unmerited hardship.

Bacon.—The costs will come out of the estate?

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—Yes, I suppose there is no help for that.

Re* ATKINSON'S TRUST ESTATE, AND 10 & 11 VICT. c. 96.

Wednesday, June 9.

Insolvency—Provisional assignee—Purchase for value of an equitable fund.

The rule requiring notice to complete an equitable assignment applies between the provisional assignee of an insolvent and a subsequent assignee for value.

In this case, which was an appeal from a decision of the Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce, and which is reported 17 Law T. 282, the Lord Chancellor affirmed the decision of the Court below, observing that he had always considered it settled that the provisional assignee took whatever the insolvent had; he took that which the insolvent had to give, and he took it subject to all the equities to which the insolvent was liable: he took as the representative of the insolvent. The Act directed the insolvent to execute an assignment of all his estates and effects; that assignment when executed would have as high an effect as an assignment for value, but no higher. His lordship was not aware of any positive rule of law, which gave to a subsequent purchaser who had given notice to a trustee priority over a prior purchaser who had failed to do so, but it was the rule of that Court, and from which he (the Lord Chancellor) should not depart. The question which he had to decide was this, had the purchaser done all that he could? He (the Lord Chancellor) thought that he had. The mere circumstance of a prior purchaser having got the legal estate vested in him could not prevent the application of the rule. The present case, said his lordship, ought to teach assignees to be more diligent in making inquiries as to the property of insolvents. If proper inquiries were made, as in the present case, among the families and friends of insolvents, interests of this kind could not be overlooked or concealed. The point raised in this appeal was a settled one, and its correctness had never been doubted.

Follett and Osborne appeared for the appellant, and cited the following cases:—Smith v. Smith, 2 Cr. & Mees. 231; Mens v. Bell, 1 H. 73; Collett v. De Gols, Tor. 65; Ex parte Knott, 11 Ves. 609; Ryall v. Rowles, 1 Ves. sen. 371; Dearle v. Hall, 3 Russ. 1; Warburton v. Loveland, 1 Dow. & Clark, 97.

R. Palmer and Schomberg appeared for the respondents, but were not called on.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Re* FAWCETT'S Patent.

Practice—Conflicting claims—Reference to law officers of the Crown.

Where there are conflicting claims as to the issue of a patent, although the caveat may not have been entered at any of the preliminary proceedings, a reference to the law officers of the Crown the usual practice.

A caveat may be lodged at any stage of the proceedings.

This was an application for the sealing of a patent, notwithstanding a caveat had been lodged by parties bonâ fide opposing its grant.

The facts were shortly these. In August 1851, Mr. Fawcett presented his petition for a patent for a new mode of manufacturing carpets. On the 14th it was referred to the Attorney-General. No opposition was then offered, but, from some unavoidable delay, the necessary steps could not at once be taken to pass the patent. Mr. Fawcett being desirous of exhibiting his invention at the Great Exhibition, obtained the temporary protection afforded by the Act of Parliament passed for that purpose. On the 20th of September, the invention was exhibited, and on the 23rd, a caveat was entered against the sealing of the letters patent by Messrs. James Humphries and Sons. On the 4th of October Fawcett's patent was left for the great seal, but, in consequence of the above caveat, the great seal was not affixed. The then Solicitor-General (Sir W. Page Wood), after having heard both parties, certificated that the invention claimed by the Messrs. Humphries and Sons was in direct conflict with that of Mr. Fawcett, and that they ought not to have a patent. He further certificated that there might be a question whether the invention of the Messrs. Humphries and Sons was not an improvement, but it involved Mr. Fawcett's idea and scheme as a basis. Numerous affidavits were filed on both sides; those on the part of the petitioner to shew that he was the original inventor, and those on the part of the respondents that he was not, and that the invention was not new. Before these objections and the [illegible] vent the great seal being affixed to the petitioner's patent, and the petition stood over, in order to bring Mr. Beech before the Court, so that the questions raised on both caveats might be disposed of cotemporaneously.

After Daniel had entered into a statement of the facts and merits of the case,

Campbell, who, with Webster, of the Common Law Bar, appeared on behalf of the respondents, Humphries and Co., submitted that this was not a question which should be gone into on the merits by the Lord Chancellor, but that it should be referred back to the law officers of the Crown.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The objection should have been taken on the opening of the case, but I will hear any authorities you may have, if they bear on the point of practice.

Campbell argued that under the old practice, where there were two claimants for an invention before the law officers of the Crown, and they could not agree, the custom was not to grant any patent at all. Assuming that no caveat had been lodged before the Attorney-General, it was competent for parties to enter one at any of the later stages, and that, if no caveat had been entered at any of the preliminary stages, one might still be entered for the first time before the Lord Chancellor, and every objection might be offered to the patent at the last moment. He submitted that the jurisdiction of the Lord Chancellor was not an appellate one from the decision of the law officers of the Crown,—for those officers did not report to the holder of the Great Seal, but to the Secretary of State for the Home Department. The jurisdiction of the Lord Chancellor was in the nature of an original one. The only case in which the Lord Chancellor had entered into the merits of a patent was in Ex parte Fox, 1 Ves. & B. 67, before Lord Eldon; but a much more convenient course had been adopted by his successors, and by whom the practice had been settled. In the case of Alcock's patent, which was before Lord Brougham in 1832, there was an application to discharge a caveat then for the first time entered, on the ground that the parties had not opposed in the preliminary stages; his lordship held that the caveat having been entered before his lordship, was not too late, and referred the matter back to the Attorney-General to inquire and report whether the patent ought to issue or not. In 1834, in Danghell's patent, his lordship (Brougham) followed the same course; and Lord Cottenham, in the cases of Joyce, Cutler, and Stansfield, adopted the practice of sending the parties back to the law officers, in order that they might inquire into the merits and report. (Vide 4 M. & C. 510; Webster on Patents, 418, 134, 101, 173.)

Webster followed on the same side.

Selwyn, for Beech, rested his opposition on the same grounds.

Daniel, with him Woodhouse, in reply, said that the question on the merits had been fully gone into by the late Solicitor-General, and read his certificate. A reference was required for the purposes of delay only, and which delay would deprive the petitioner of the benefit of temporary protection which he had acquired for his invention by its registration.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said that this was a matter in which he had had considerable practice some years ago, when one of the law officers of the Crown, and he was convinced that it would be impossible for the Chancellor to undertake the duty of going into the merits of a question like the present, which would require a very careful examination of of models, the hearing of affidavits, and the evidence of persons conversant with these matters, and a discrimination of rights which could not be carried on in open court. Such matters must, if at all, be investigated at chambers, a course quite inconsistent with the functions of the Court. Was there any reason why the ordinary business of the Court should be interrupted by such investigations? It was true that Lord Eldon had done so in the case of Ex parte Fox, but that had not been the general practice of the Court, and a more inconvenient practice he could not conceive. That was the only precedent that was to be found, and one which his lordship was not disposed to follow, because he thought it would produce the greatest inconvenience and much delay. The petitioner's case appeared to be, primâ facie, a favourable one; and if he (the Lord Chancellor) had reason to think that the attempt to stop the petitioner's patent was fraudulent, he (the Lord Chancellor) would not hesitate to interpose at once, and hear the case privately, but it did not appear that the claim put forth by the other party was unfounded, as statements had been made which shewed that the opposition was bonâ fide. He thought that the four cases cited by Campbell had settled the practice on satisfactory grounds; that it would not only be an inconvenient but a mischievous thing to depart from it. He knew well to what it would lead; parties would delay entering caveats until the last moment, in order to compel the Chancellor to hear their cases. As the opposition appeared to be bonâ fide, and as there appeared to be a great deal to be cleared up, he should send this matter back to the law officers of the Crown, but with a direction that the inquiry should be prosecuted without delay; and in order that Mr. Fawcett might not suffer any loss, or be deprived of any advantage from the registration of his patent, in the event of his having reason to think that the matter was improperly retarded, his lordship gave him leave to apply.

Re THE WILL OF NORTON, deceased.

Appointment of new trustees to be made "with the consent of the Lord Chancellor."

The Court disclaiming the liability, made the order with a declaration that it was not to be drawn into a precedent.

This was a petition for the appointment of new trustees in the place of one who was desirous of being discharged, and of another who had died. The will containing the power to appoint such new trustees directed "that such appointment should be made with the consent, however, of the then Lord Chancellor of Great Britain, but not otherwise."

Messiter for the petition.

The LORD CHANCELLOR at first refused to entertain the application, but subsequently made an order in the following terms:—"His lordship, disclaiming the liability which the words "with the consent, however, of the then Lord Chancellor of Great Britain, but not otherwise," contained in the will of the testator William Francis Norton, seek to throw upon the Lord Chancellor for the time being; but being willing to relieve the petitioners, &c. from the difficulty in which they are placed, as appears from the statement in the said petition, doth in this case (which is not to be drawn into a precedent) think fit to consent that A. and B. &c. be appointed trustees under the will of the said testator in substitution for C. D. (who is desirous of being discharged from the trusts of the said will), and of E. F. deceased, and it is ordered that the said C. D. be at liberty, under the power for that purpose contained in the said will, to appoint the said A. and B. to be such trustees accordingly, and to vest in them (when appointed such new trustees) the trust estate now vested in the said C. D. under the said will, and that such appointment shall be effected in manner following (that is to say). That the said C. D. be at liberty to appoint the said A. to be a trustee of the will of the said testator jointly with himself, and in substitution for the said E. F. deceased, and that on such appointment being made, the said C. D. be at liberty to retire from the trusts of the said will upon his appointing the said B. to be a trustee thereof, jointly with the said A. and in substitution of himself, the said C. D.; and his lordship doth order that the same A. and B. be at liberty, out of the trust funds which shall come to their hands as such trustees when appointed, to pay to the said C. D. his costs of this application and consequent thereon, and also his costs of the appointment of such trustees; such costs to be taxed," &c.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

(Before the LORDS JUSTICES.)

May 26 and 31.

PRICE v. MACAULAY.

Specific performance—Vendor and purchaser—Tenure—Misrepresentation—Waiver of objections—Condition of sale.

A. at a sale by auction purchased two lots, six and seven, both of which were described in the posting bills as "valuable freehold estate." Part of lot seven was described "as a reservoir and waterworks," &c. which, exclusive of land and buildings, yielded a yearly rental of 60l. By the third condition of sale all objections relative to the title were to be taken within a month from the delivery of the abstract or be considered as waived.

By the sixth condition any misstatement of the quality or tenure, outgoings, or other particulars of the premises was to be the subject of compensation.

The abstracts were delivered on the 30th of June, 1851. A. at first repudiated the contract, but ultimately, on the 7th of October, 1851, wrote to the vendor's solicitors saying that he did not any longer attempt to repudiate the sales.

It turned out that the property comprised in both lots was of copyhold tenure, but nearly if not quite equal in value to freeholds, and that the representation as to the tenure was not made with any wilful design of enhancing the value of the property.

As to lot seven it turned out, although it did not appear upon the abstract, that the pipes conveying the water from the reservoir to the houses, from which the rental of 60l. was derived, passed by permission, according to an arrangement determinable on a short notice, through the lands of two other persons, to whom 5s. and 10s. were paid each year for such permission. Two claims having been filed, specific performance was decreed as to both lots by the Court below, with compensation for the difference of the tenure, but allowing the plaintiff the same costs only as would have been allowed him had both claims been embodied in one.

Held, under the circumstances, that the decision of the Court below as to lot six ought to be affirmed.

Held, also, as to lot seven, reversing the decision of the Court below, that the claim ought to be dismissed on the ground of misrepresentation in the description of the property, in a matter unconnected with the title, and which, therefore, was not waived by the defendant not taking objections within the time mentioned in the conditions of sale.

Where a representation calculated to induce a belief in the value of property not warranted by the circumstances is made by a person, the inaccuracy of which might have been known to him, it will be considered as a fraud in equity, disentitling him to specific performance.

Semble, a purchaser, knowing the real state of facts would have no right to complain, but a vendor would have to shew his knowledge very clearly.

This was an appeal from the decision of Vice-Chancellor Parker, whereby, on two claims having been filed, he decreed specific performance of two contracts for the purchase of two lots (six and seven) at a sale, under the following circumstances:—

On the 26th of March, 1851, some property at Halifax was put up to sale by auction, by Messrs. Rudd and Kenny, as solicitors for the vendor, which was thus described in the advertisements, and also in the posting bills distributed in the room where the auction was conducted,—"Valuable freehold estate in Northowram, near the town of Halifax, to be sold by auction, by Mr. Carr, at the White Lion Hotel in Halifax, on Wednesday, the 26th day of March, 1851, at six o'clock in the afternoon, in the following or such other lots as may be agreed upon at the time of sale, and subject to conditions, &c. Lot 6. All those four valuable closes or parcels of land adjoining to lots 2 and 3, known by the several names:—The Little Jug, 1a. 3r. 2p.; The Square Field, 2a. 2r. 37p.; The Far Square Field, 2a. 2r. 21p.; The Well Jug, 1a. 2r. 12p.; total, 8a. 3r. 10p. Lot 7. All that substantial messuage or dwelling-house adjoining lot 6, now in the occupation of Mr. Joseph Thompson, with the garden and three closes of land adjoining, known by the several names and containing the several quantities following:—The Cobbler Common, 2a. 3r. 34p.; The Cowroyd, with the sites of buildings, &c. 1a. 0r. 37p.; The Lower Cowroyd, 1a. 2r. 20p.; total, 5a. 3r. 21p. together with the reservoir and waterworks, and valuable supply of water contained in this lot, which, exclusive of the land and buildings, now yields a yearly rental of about 60l. The above estate is situate immediately out of the limits of the borough of Halifax, and presents favourable sites for dwelling-houses and other buildings, is well roaded, abundantly supplied with fine water, contains beds of good brick and fine clay, and valuable seams of coal. A plan of the premises, as divided into lots, may be seen upon application at the offices of Messrs. Mallinson and Healey, architects and land surveyors, situate in Union-street, Halifax; and further particulars may be had at the offices of Messrs. Rudd and Kenny." The defendant, F. E. Macaulay, attended at the sale, and bid for lot 6, which was knocked down to him at 700l., and for lot 7, which was knocked down to him, at 1,310l. and the auctioneer, Mr. Carr, thereupon signed two memoranda in writing, indorsed upon two copies of the conditions of sale, to the effect that, as agent for both parties, he declared that the lots above mentioned were respectively sold by John Price to F. E. Macaulay. By the third of the conditions referred to, it is provided that the purchaser should be entitled to an abstract of title deduced for the last forty years, to be prepared and delivered at the expense of the vendor on or before the 30th day of June then next, any abstract of title deduced from an earlier date should not be required, except at the expense of the purchaser, who should, within one month from the time of such delivery, give or leave notice in writing at the office of Messrs. Rudd and Kenny, the vendor's solicitors, of all objections relative to the title, and every objection or requisition of which notice should not be so given or left as aforesaid should be considered as waived, and the title should be deemed as against the purchaser, to be approved and accepted, except as to any objection or requisition as to which notice should have been given, or left in manner as aforesaid. By the sixth condition, any misstatement of the quality, tenure, outgoings, or other particulars of the premises was to be the subject of compensation. By the seventh of the said conditions, it is provided that the purchaser should bear the expense of comparing the abstract with the title deeds, and other muniments of title, of preparing his conveyance and surrender or assurance, and any covenant which may be required for production of deeds from the vendor and all other necessary parties, of getting the same duly executed by them respectively, of all statutory declarations, official, attested, or other copies of, or extracts from, any matters of record, deeds, wills, registers, or other documents which may be required for verifying the abstract or otherwise, and of deducing the title to, getting in the conveyance and assignment or surrender of all outstanding, or other legal estates, if any there be.

On the 30th June, 1851, Messrs. Rudd and Kenny sent the abstracts to the defendant, with a letter, which is in the following terms. "Herewith we send you abstracts of title to the two lots purchased by you on the 26th March last. We also send you copies of conditions of sale and purchase contracts." On the 4th July following, the defendant returned the abstracts with the following answer, repudiating the contracts upon grounds which he totally failed in supporting:—"Sir, I return you herewith the abstracts, &c. left at my office on Monday last, during my absence from home. I have entered into no contract or agreement with Mr. Price, nor authorised any other party to do so for me." The abstracts were immediately sent back to Mr. Price, and a correspondence then ensued, the result of which was that the defendant asked that the matter might stand over for a short time, which request was acceded to. And afterwards, on the 7th of October, 1851, the defendant wrote to Messrs. Rudd and Kenny the following letter:—"In pursuance of my letter to you of the 30th ult. I now beg to inform you that I do not attempt to repudiate the sales. I am not, however, prepared to complete them at present, but I trust that on your Mr. Rudd's return from London an arrangement may be made that will be satisfactory to all parties. I have not yet looked at the abstracts, but I take it for granted that a good title can and will be made out." The hereditaments comprised in lots 6 and 7, as it appeared by the abstract, were not of freehold but of copyhold tenure, holden of the manor of Wakefield, in the county of York; but it was proved by the evidence that the suits and services in respect of all the copyhold hereditaments holden of that manor are compounded for, and the rents, fines, and heriots payable in respect thereof are fixed and certain, and are merely nominal, and the mines and minerals, timber and other trees in and growing upon the said hereditaments belonging to the copyhold tenants of the said hereditaments, and all the copyhold hereditaments holden of the said manor, are considered and treated by the owners thereof as equal in value to freehold hereditaments. As to lot 7, it turned out that the reservoir and waterworks, which were stated in the advertisements and posting bills to yield, exclusive of the land and building, a yearly rental of about 60l. supplied certain houses with water by means of pipes, part of which passed through the lands of two neighbouring proprietors, Mr. Haigh and Mr. Barraclough, to whom annual rents of 5s. and 10s. were respectively paid, for permission, that the pipes should pass through their lands, which permission, it appeared, might be withdrawn on a very short notice. The fact of the pipes passing through the lands of those gentlemen, or of those payments being made to them, did not appear on the abstracts, or on the plan referred to by the advertisements and posting-bills, and was not known to the defendant at the time he wrote the letter of the 7th October, 1851. Further correspondence ensued, the plaintiff's solicitors urging the immediate completion of the contracts, and on the 15th December, 1851, the defendant wrote to them a letter of that date, which is partly as follows. "Lot 7, notwithstanding your note of the 10th instant, I am still convinced that the water rent is considerably less than the sum advertised by you, namely, 60l. per annum, and consequently, that I am entitled to compensation, to be settled in the manner stated in the sixth condition of sale. But if I am charged with being the purchaser, surely I am entitled to, and claim to have delivered to me a full list of the tenants of the water, with the amount which each tenant pays, and an account of his outgoings. I understand a payment is made to Mr. Thomas Barraclough. Pray, what is that for? It strikes me the first thing for the vendor to do is to furnish an abstract of his title to the water and waterworks, which up to this date he has neglected to do, and until I receive it, it will be impossible for me to lay the abstract already received before counsel to advise thereon."

One objection raised against the specific performance as to both lots, was that the land was represented in the posting bills, &c. as freehold, whereas it was of copyhold tenure.

Another objection against decreeing specific performance as to lot 7, was the suppression of the fact that the reservoir was supplied with water by pipes which passed through the lands of other persons, and that rents were payable to those persons, and the misrepresentation that 60l. was the rental derived from the reservoir and waterworks alone, whereas it was derived from the reservoir waterworks and the permission for the pipes to pass through the lands of Mr. Haigh and Mr. Barraclough.

For the plaintiff it was contended, and, in effect, proved, that the difference in value between the copyholds sold and lands of freehold tenure was slight, if any; and that by the 6th condition, compensation might be awarded to the defendant for the difference in the value of the tenure. It appeared from the evidence that the description of the land as of freehold tenure was the result of mistake on the part of the vendor's solicitors and agents.

For the plaintiff it was also contended that the defendant was a solicitor, and acted in such capacity for him relative to the property in question, and that he was aware of the tenure being copyhold, and also that the pipes passed through the lands of Haigh and Barraclough; this, however, was not considered as proved. That he had, moreover, waived all right to take such objections. Upon the two claims coming on to be heard before Vice-Chancellor Parker, on 3rd March, 1852, his Honour (amongst other things) declared that the agreements as to lot 6 and 7, mentioned in the claims, ought to be specifically performed, and referred it to the Master (in case the parties differed) to settle the amount of compensation to be made to the defendant in respect of the property comprised in the said agreements being held on copyhold instead of freehold tenure. And the Master was to take an account of the rents and profits of the said messuages, lands, and hereditaments comprised in the said agreements received by the said plaintiff or any person for him on or subsequent to the 29th of September, 1851; and that what the Master should settle as the amount of compensation, and what should be coming from the plaintiff on the said account of rents and profits, should be deducted from the sums of 700*l*. and 1,310*l*. making together 2,010*l*. the amount of the purchase-moneys, and that the Master was to compute interest at five per cent. from the 29th of September, 1851, on the balance of the purchase-money, after deducting such compensation as aforesaid, and upon the defendant paying to the plaintiff what should be remaining due to him for such balance of purchase-money and interest after such deduction as aforesaid, that the plaintiff should surrender or cause to be surrendered the messuages, &c. comprised in the said agreements to the defendant, &c.; and that the defendant should pay to the plaintiff his costs of these suits; and it was referred to the Taxing Master to tax such costs, but in taxing the same the Taxing Master was to allow to the plaintiff no greater amount of costs than he would have allowed if the plaintiff had embodied both claims in one claim, and filed only one claim against the defendant instead of two, &c. &c. From this decree the defendant now appealed.

Willcock and Welch, for the plaintiff, the spondent, contended—1st, as to lot 6 that the copyholds were equal in value to freeholds, and that as they were not by fraud represented to be such, the plaintiff was entitled to specific performance according to the 6th condition. Moreover, that the defendant had precluded himself from taking objections by not having taken them within a month according to the 3rd condition, and that he had in fact waived all objections by his letter of the 7th Oct. 1851. 2nd, as to lot 7, that there had been no misrepresentation as to the reservoir, &c. [Lord Justice KNIGHT BRUCE.—You allege that that property yields 60*l*. a year, whereas it was that and another thing, that is, the permission to lay down pipes through another person's land, which jointly produced that sum. The plaintiff paid 5s. to one and 10s. to another proprietor through whose land the pipes, which conveyed the water from the reservoir to houses which paid the 60*l*. passed, what excuse can be suggested for not stating that?] It was from a mistake that such statement was not made; but even supposing that it was not made, the defendant is bound, as he must have had notice from his employment for the plaintiff professionally, and there was also sufficient in the abstract to put him upon inquiries, which would have given him notice. [Lord Justice KNIGHT BRUCE.—Suppose a stranger had come to the sale, and bid for lot 7; what excuse would you allege? A vendor is bound to be plain and distinct in his representations; if he leave anything obscure and ambiguous it will be at his own peril. There are abundance of cases at law and in equity to that effect.] Trower v. Newcombe, 3 Mer. 704.

...ord Justice KNIGHT BRUCE.—The case divides itself into two branches: one as to lot 6, the other as to lot 7. With regard to lot 6, the only point is as to the tenure, and from the evidence there appears strong reason to be satisfied that the difference in value between copyholds in this manor and freeholds is very slight indeed. Perhaps, however, that would not be material for the plaintiff if we had been of opinion that there was anything wilful and designing in the representations substantially made by the advertisements and posting bills, that the whole was freehold. By wilful, I mean with a view to enhance the value. This was the part of the case which struck me as of great importance; and it is with great pleasure that I found myself able to exempt Messrs. Rudd and Kenny, and Mallinson from all wrong intentions, and probably it would not be too much to extend the same construction to the plaintiff. The difference is so slight in point of value, the right to the timber and minerals being in the copyholder, there is hardly a motive for the misstatement. But whether motive or not, if we had thought it made with wrong intention, it would have had considerable influence with us, notwithstanding the subsequent conduct of the defendant; but considering what the abstract stated, and the length of time the defendant had the abstract when he wrote the letter of the 7th of October, we are of opinion with the decree as to lot 6, and think it has dealt favourably to the defendant by allowing compensation for the difference of the tenure of the land. But we both think, perhaps not exactly on the same ground, but not much differing from one another, that the case is very different with regard to lot 7. That lot is described as all that, &c. [his lordship here read the description of lot 7 from the posting-bill], and there is this statement added, "together with the reservoir and waterworks, and valuable supply of water contained in this lot, which, exclusive of the land and buildings, now yields a yearly rental of about 60*l*." &c. The truth of the case being (which must have been known to the plaintiff personally, whether known to the agents or not), that the rent represented as being 60*l*. per year, was a rental obtained from certain hou... which were supplied with water from a reservoir, but the houses did not immediately adjoin the property. Between them and the reservoir lay lands of two other proprietors, and the water only arrived at the houses by means of pipes passing through the intervening lands of Mr. Haigh and Mr. Barraclough. It is not in proof that there was any title to the lands through which the pipes pass, the plaintiff was merely a permissive tenant from year to year, and this easement was essential to the enjoyment, and for it the plaintiff paid 5s. to the one, and 10s. to the other proprietor. The advertisement and posting bills have not a word about this, but represent the rental of 60*l*. as incident to the property, or part of the property. That, in my opinion, was a most serious and important misrepresentation concerning the property, calculated to induce an erroneous notion as to its nature and value. Here, again, I acquit the legal and other agents, concerned of any wrong intention, and it is not necessary to impute any wrong intention to the plaintiff. But, as Sir William Grant says, in Burrowes v. Lock, 10 Ves. 176, "The plaintiff cannot dive into the secret recesses of his heart, so as to say whether he did or did not recollect the fact; and it is no excuse to say he did not recollect it. At least it is gross negligence for a person to take upon himself to aver positively and distinctly that he is entitled to the whole of a fund, without giving himself the trouble to recollect whether the fact was so or not,—without thinking upon the subject." Now here, in my view is an important fact untruly represented, the inaccuracy of which might have been known to the person making it; a representation calculated to induce a belief in the value not warranted by the nature and circumstances of the property. Without imputing wrong intentions to any one, it is such a representation as in this Court must be considered a fraud, as much as in Lysney v. Selby, Ld. Raymd. 1118; and Dobell v. Stevens, 3 B. & C. 623. But supposing the defendant had actually known what the real state and condition of the subject were, it may be that he would not be entitled to complain, but in order to enable a vendor to avail himself of that defence in such a case he must shew very clearly the defendant's knowledge of the real state of things, for no person who has made a representation can complain that he is believed in what he has said. Now the purchaser had been connected with the profession of the law, and professionally concerned for the vendor, and it is possible he might have become acquainted with the real state of the case, but the evidence falls far short of this, that at the time of the purchase the defendant was aware of the exact state of things. It is then said, that subsequently he had notice; that, however, is not sufficient: in a case of misrepresentation, he must be shewn clearly to have had information of the real state of the facts from communications to him made. Now, here there is no evidence that he knew the real state of this property, after the purchase, when the correspondence was proceeding by which he became bound to perform the contract, independently of extraneous matter vitiating it. It is said that the abstract afforded that information but it was only to part; it did not shew a title to the easement. It is probable that it ought to have produced suspicion in the mind of a careful man; but that is not enough; the vendor ought to have stated to him that the water by means of the pipes, except by permission of others, could not reach the houses, and that permission might be withdrawn. If as to this point of notice the case goes so high as suspicion (of which I am not sure), it is not carried high enough, in my judgment. It is said that by the third condition objections to the title were to be communicated within a given time on pain of being barred from sustaining them. In the first place, however, it is at least doubtful whether the condition applies where there has been wilful misrepresentation, a point on which I refer to Stewart v. Alliston, 1 Mer. 26. But in the next place, it is a misapprehension to call this a question of title. This representation is not introduced into the contract, the auctioneer did not copy it, the contract ended with the quantities, this is a representation ultra the contract signed. It is such as was made in Lysney v. Selby, Ld. Raym. 1118; and Dobell v. Stevens, 3 B. & C. 623, as far from the title as anything can be, a misrepresentation vitiating the contract unless the Court be satisfied that there has been a waiver after a clear notice of the fact. My opinion is, with the greatest deference to the Vice-Chancellor, that the claim as to Lot 7, ought to have been dismissed. But as some facts not clearly made out here before inquiry were not stated to the Vice-Chancellor, I differ from him with less diffidence. The order, therefore, as to Lot 6 is to stand; as to Lot 7, to be dismissed, with costs.

Lord Justice Lord CRANWORTH.—I come to the same conclusion. But I had, during the argument, considerable doubt. Lot 7 is described as, &c. [his lordship here read the description of Lot 7]. If the contract signed had been a contract for land, together with a reservoir and a supply of water, I should have thought that what the vendor was bound to do was to make out a title to land and a reservoir of water and waterworks, which reservoir and waterworks yield a yearly rent of 60*l*. and that the question whether he made out that would have been a question of title. When I say works, I mean he would have had to shew that he was entitled to the whole of the waterworks. And then having delivered the abstract, and the defendant not having objected to the title within the limited time, the doubt I had was, whether the condition of sale did not exclude him from taking the objection, but I think, on further consideration, the doubt was unfounded. For this reason: the plaintiff having supplied a good title to the piece of land, there was nothing, on the point of title to which the defendant could take objection. The objection he takes is quite of a different nature: he says it was represented that the reservoir, &c. yielded a yearly rental of 60*l*. but it was connected with another person's land, or an easement over it, which produces that sum. There is a misrepresentation therefore, and the question of title, and the condition as to limitation of time for taking objection to the title, do not apply to the case. A vendor seeking specific performance ought to be optimæ fidei, whether he misleads intentionally or not is unimportant. As to this lot, therefore, the plaintiff is not entitled to specific performance.

ROLLS COURT.

MAXWELL v. MAXWELL.

Heir—Trustee—Scotland—Heritable bond—Will, what passed under—Election.

A testator domiciled in England devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate whatsoever and wheresoever to certain trustees, their heirs, &c. upon trust for his wife for life, and after her decease for all his children, their heirs, &c. as tenants in common. The will, though a good English will, was insufficient according to the Scotch law to pass a heritable bond in Scotland, to which the testator was entitled:

Held, that the heir was not a trustee of the heritable bond for the executors of the testator, and that he was not bound to elect between the heritable bond and the benefits to which he was entitled under the will, but took both.

This was a special case for the opinion of the Court as to the construction of a will bearing date the 27th of February, 1837, and duly made in the English form, and by a person domiciled in England, but who possessed valuable heritable bond in Scotland; and the question whether such a will, which, though valid as an English will, yet being in general terms, and insufficient to pass heritable bond in Scotland, would nevertheless have the effect of putting the heir to his election between the bond and the benefits he was entitled to under the will. It appeared that the testator was possessed of both real and personal estate in England, and of a heritable bond in Scotland, and was domiciled in this country; and by his will, duly made in the English form, and dated as above, gave, devised, and bequeathed to trustees, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns all his real and personal estate whatsoever and wheresoever upon trust for his wife for life, and at her decease upon trust for all his children, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, share and share alike, as tenants in common. This will was executed by the testator when on his death-bed, and on that account, as well as because it did not contain the proper words of disposing, or the form of attestation required by the Scotch law, it was insufficient to pass the heritable bond, which of course passed to the eldest son and heir-at-law of the testator; and the question was, whether he could take it, as well as the benefits given him by the will in common with the other children, or should be put to his election. The case was brought before the Court by the heir claiming the bond.

Anderson and Fleming, for the heir, contended that he was not put to his election. The case of estates tail and copyholds, which under the old law were not properly subjects of devise, is very different from that of a heritable bond, which would pass under a will if the proper formalities were observed in its form and attestation; the testator's intention to pass the bond at all events is clearly shewn by the general words of devise. And in Brodie v. Barry, 2 Ves. 127, where there was a general devise, the heir was put to his election. [The MASTER of the ROLLS.—In Brodie v. Barry there was specific mention of lands in Scotland.] No specific property was mentioned: the words were, "all my freehold, leasehold, and copyhold estates in England, Scotland, and elsewhere." If the words "England and Scotland" were omitted, that case would be similar to the present. They cited Allen v. Anderson, 5 Hare, 162; Ker v. Wauchope, 1 Bligh, 1; Cunningham v. Gainer, 1 Bligh, 27, n.; Gibson v. Macbain, 1 Mor. 600; Bennett v. Bennett's Trustees, 7 Shaw & Dun. 817; Johnson v. Telford, 1 Russ. & M. 241; Churchman v. Ireland, 1 Russ. & M. 250; Rich v. Cockell, 9 Ves. 369; London v. London, Hugh, Dec. 23; Trotter v. Trotter, W. & Shaw, 407; Dundas v. Dundas, 2 Dow. & Cl. 349; Campbell v. Munro, 15 Dunl. B. & Mur. 310; Dummer v. Pitcher, 2 Myl. & K. 262; Rop. Leg. 1582.

R. Palmer and Bagshawe, contra, contended that the case was governed by that of Allen v. Anderson, 5 Hare, 162.

The MASTER of the ROLLS thought the case was concluded by that of Allen v. Anderson. The question was, whether the words of the will were sufficient to raise a case of election against the heir-at-law. In Allen v. Anderson, Vice-Chancellor Wigram said that the point appeared to him to be governed by authority, and he felt himself bound by it; and though he (the Master of the Rolls) did not feel quite satisfied with the grounds of the Vice-Chancellor's decision, he thought it better to follow settled authorities than to act upon his own notions of what would have been a more expedient course. The Vice-Chancellor appears to have thought that where any act was to be done besides the mere execution of the will to give to its dispositions as in the case of copyholds under the old law, estates tail, or joint property, it was necessary in order to raise a case of election that the testator should refer to the property as distinctly as if it were the estate of a stranger, and that a Scotch heritable bond fell under the same rule. In this view of the case, however, the Vice-Chancellor has been shewn in the course of the argument not to have been altogether correct, for it appeared that no such act is necessary in the case of a heritable bond; and possibly a distinction ought to be made on that account between this case and that before his Honour. At the same time he (the Master of the Rolls) thought the facts before him were so similar to those of the case before the Vice-Chancellor that he could not distinguish this case from that of Allen v. Anderson, which distinctly laid down the doctrine that a general devise would not put the heir to his election in respect of a heritable bond. He was also of opinion that Johnson v. Telford was strictly in point. In that case it was said that some of the uses expressed in the will could not be applied to Scotch property, but he (the Master of the Rolls) could see no distinction in that respect between the uses .. that .... and in the present. He decided this case without any reference to some of the older authorities, in which an opinion was expressed with which he did not agree, that different words were necessary to raise a case of election in the case of an heir from that of any other person. He would also remark that one ground of his decision, by analogy to tl cases on the execution of powers, was that there were other lands in England on which the words of the will could operate. If it was desired to take the case to a higher court the case might be amended s. as to bring out more clearly the state of the Scotch law on the subject. Costs to come out of the estate.

March 17 and 18.

WHIELDON v. SPODE.

Will—Construction of—Charge of debts—Legacies on real estate—Exoneration of personal estate.

E. B. by her will gave all her real and personal estate to trustees on trust to pay her debts in the first place, and then such legacies as she should give by any codicil thereto. The testatrix by a codicil devised the T. estate to her sister for life, and after her decease directed it to be sold for payment of legacies, and she thereby made various bequests, amounting to a very large sum. The personal estate proved insufficient to pay the debts and legacies:

Held, that the object of the direction to sell at the death of testatrix's sister was merely to exempt her life estate from payment of the legacies: that the reversion after the life estate only was thereby made an auxiliary fund for payment of legacies; but that the personal estate was the primary fund, and was not exonerated.

The question in this case arose between the next of kin and the heir-at-law of Elizabeth Bree, the testatrix in the cause, as to their respective rights under the terms of the will and codicil of the testatrix. The will bore date the 7th of May, 1840, and contained the following clause.—"As to all my freehold, copyhold, and other real property, and all my personal estate of every kind and description, and whether in possession, remainder, or expectancy, and wheresoever the same may be, over which I have any appointing or disposing power, I give, devise, appoint, and bequeath the same, and every part thereof unto and to the use of the said George Whieldon, Robert Gordon, and William Harrison, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, according to the nature and quality of the same estates and property respectively upon trust thereout in the first place to pay and discharge all my just debts and funeral and testamentary expenses; and in the next place to pay all and every the legacies, which I shall or may bequeath by any codicil or codicils to this my will, or any memorandum or writing, which I may hereafter add to or endorse on this my will. And, as to all the rest, residue, and remainder of my said real and personal estate and property hereinbefore by me appointed, devised, and bequeathed, and which shall remain after satisfying the trusts and purposes aforesaid, I appoint, give, devise, and bequeath the same unto and to the use of the said George Whieldon, Robert Gordon, and William Harrison in equal shares, as tenants in common, and to their respective heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, for their absolute benefit." And the testatrix thereby appointed the said George Whieldon, Robert Gordon, and William Harrison executors of her will. The testatrix afterwards made two codicils to her will both dated the 31st August, 1841, by one of which she merely republished her will under the Wills Act; but by the other she gave various legacies, amounting in the whole to upwards of 55,000*l.* and made a devise in these terms: "To my dear sister, Mary Birch, I give and devise the Tradeswill estate for her life; at her death to be sold for the payment of legacies." And she also thereby devised the Ash estate to two of the sons of the said George Whieldon. William Harrison died in the lifetime of the testatrix, and his residuary gift therefore elapsed. In March, 1845, the testatrix died, leaving George Whieldon, Robert Gordon, and Mary Birch her surviving. Mary Birch and Josias Spode were the next of kin of the testatrix, the latter of whom was also her heir-at-law. A suit having been instituted for administering the trusts of the will and codicils, a decree was made therein on the 27th of June, 1846, directing a reference to the Master and the usual accounts and inquiries. The Master, by his report, found that the personal estate amounted to about 48,000*l.*; that the real estate consisted of the Tradeswill estate, devised to Mary Birch for life, and of the value of 13,000*l.*; the Ash estate, also devised, of the value of 88,000*l.*; and a third estate, called the Stoke estate, valued at 11,000*l.* The personal estate being insufficient to pay the debts and legacies, a decree was made in the cause, on further directions, on the 25th March, 1850, ordering the Stoke estate to be sold, and the produce paid into Court. Mary Birch, the tenant for life of the Tradeswill estate, having died since the date of that decree, the cause now came on again upon further directions, and a question was raised as between the heir-at-law and next of kin of the testatrix, in respect of the gift to William Harrison, which had lapsed by reason of his death in the testatrix's lifetime, whether the Tradeswill estate was or not, by the codicil, made the primary fund for payment of the legacies, to the exoneration of the personal estate.

Roupell and Evans for the executors.

Lloyd and V. S. Lean, for the heir-at-law, contended that the next of kin must shew that there was an express exemption of the personal estate before the legacies could be thrown on the real estate. It was not enough merely to shew that the real estate was charged; and to see whether the personal estate is exonerated you must look at the whole will to ascertain the intention of the testator. The testatrix here makes three persons her executors, and then before the disposition of the real and personal estate, she says all that coming to them as executors, they are to apply that on the trusts of the will, and then she gives all her property to them. This circumstance, generally speaking, as Lord Eldon has observed in Bootle v. Blundell, 19 Ves. 527, affords an argument against the intention to exempt the personal estate. Besides the testatrix has not anywhere exempted the personalty, but has put realty and personalty on an equal footing; and this being so the rule of law is unaltered, and the personalty is the primary fund. Then as to the particular estate in question, the Tradeswill Estate, there is no direction to sell and create a mixed fund, but merely a declaration that the estate shall be sold, which amounts merely to a repetition of an obligation which is laid on it by the will. There is no exoneration of the personalty. All that is done by the codicil is to give a life estate to Mary Birch, and after that the testatrix in effect directs that the estate shall go as mentioned in the will. (They cited Boughton v. James, 1 H. L. Cas. 406, reviewing on this point, S. C. 1 Colly. 26; Davies v. Ashford, 15 Sim. 42; Peterson v. Scott, 14 Jur. 284; Roberts v. Walker, 1 Russ. & M. 752; Lord Inchiquin v. French, 1 Cox, 1; 1 Ambl. 33; Watson v. Prickwood, 9 Ves. 417; Rhodes v. Rudge, 15 Sim. 79; Walker v. Hardwick, 1 Myl. & K. 396.)

R. Palmer and G. L. Russell, for the next of kin, admitted that on the will alone there was no ground for contending that the personal estate was exempted; but they insisted that the codicil took the Tradeswill Estate out of the general charge contained in the will, and made it after the death of Mary Birch, the primary fund for payment of the legacies given by the codicil, and that the legacies so given were postponed till after the death of the tenant for life. They referred to 2 Jarm. Wills, 592.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—I am of opinion that in this case the personal estate is not exonerated from the charge of legacies. On the will there is no doubt; the only question is on the codicil. To exonerate the personal estate you must shew a clear intention to that effect. By the will the testatrix subjects one to the payment of her debts, and one to the payment of her legacies, to be given by any codicil to her will, and gave all her real and personal estate to her executors. The legacies given by her codicil amounted in the whole to 52,500*l.* while the personal estate was somewhere about 48,000*l.* The personal estate, therefore, was not sufficient for the payment of her debts and legacies, and she must therefore have known that the provision she had made for the various objects of her bounty would not be satisfied out of her personal estate, and that therefore it was necessary to make the real estate contribute to the deficiency. Now, the testatrix prefaces the codicil by a devise to Mary Birch for life, and at her death the estate so given to her for her life is to be sold for the payment of legacies. The object of the testatrix was, in my opinion, to exempt the life estate of Mary Birch from the payment of legacies. This was necessary to secure to Mary Birch the full enjoyment of the estate for life, as under the will it was liable to the legacies; and therefore the testatrix says, that at Mary Birch's death it is to be sold, and not before. It would, moreover, be a strange construction to hold that the legacies are postponed till the death of Mary Birch, for, according to that construction, some of the legatees might never take at all, though they survived the testatrix. That would not, in my opinion, be a fair construction. On the whole, I think that the whole scope and object of the codicil was simply to exempt the life estate of Mary Birch from the payment of legacies, and that the intention of the testatrix was to make all the real estate, with the exception of Mary Birch's life estate, an auxiliary fund for payment of legacies.

VICE-CHANCELLOR TURNER'S COURT.

Thursday, April 15.

FLINT v. WOODIN.

Vender and purchaser—Specific performance—Auctioneer vendor—Puffing.

A vendor who was auctioneer sold an estate, but did not disclose that he was owner. the purchaser had before the sale intimated he would bid a certain price: the property was knocked down at that sum; the particulars of sale stated the property to be let on lease, containing a covenant to keep in repair. The vendor could not shew in whom this lease was vested. The purchaser refused to complete, on the ground of no person being shewn who could be proceeded against for breach of the covenant to repair; that the vendor had an unfair advantage over him, and that the sale was not conducted bonâ fide, but the Court decreed a specific performance with costs.

This was a claim for the the specific performance of an agreement for the purchase of copyhold property. The claim was filed by Mr. George Flint against Mr. J. S. Woodin, and it stated that on the 12th of August, 1851, three copyhold houses, 16, 17, and 18, Hamilton-row, Bagnigge Wells-road, forming lot 5 of a certain printed particular, were put up by him for sale by auction, when Mr. Woodin attended, and was the highest bidder for, and was declared the purchaser at 700*l.* and that by an agreement with Mr. Flint, dated the same day, Mr.

Woodin declared himself the purchaser at that price, and h[illegible] it 140*l.* and agreed to pay the remainder and compl[illegible] his purchase in accordance with the conditions of sale; that he, Mr. Flint, had made several applications to Mr. Woodin to complete, but he had not done so. The said George Flint therefore claimed to be entitled to specific performance of the said agreement and to have his costs of the suit, and for that purpose to have all proper directions given, and he thereby offered specifically to perform the same or his part. The claim was supported by the affidavit of the plaintiff and his clerk, and of the plaintiff's solicitor and the clerk of the latter. In the particulars of sale the property was described as "a desirable copyhold estate, consisting of three houses," &c. "with early reversion to a considerably improved rent," and to the description was added, "This desirable estate is let upon lease, containing all the usual covenants to keep in repair, &c. at a ground-rent of 18*l.* per annum, for a term which will expire at Christmas, 1852, when seventy guineas per annum may readily be had." The abstracts were duly delivered, and some objections were taken and requisitions made, but the only one necessary to be mentioned was one calling on the vendor to shew who was the lessee or assignee of the lease referred to, in the note at the foot of the particulars of sale, as the houses offering to be out of repair, the purchaser wished to know against whom he could go on the covenants to repair.

The defendant's affidavit was in all material parts as follow:—I called on George Flint on the 7th of August, 1851, and in course of conversation he directed my attention to the particulars and conditions of sale, and he recommended me to purchase the same premises; and I therefore looked at the particulars, and consulted him as to the price at which the property would probably be sold, and I inquired whether he thought it would be sold at about 700*l.*; to which he replied that it possibly might, but that he did not think it would be sold at less. He then recommended the property to me in very strong terms, and advised me to purchase, and said that I should find it cheap at the above price; and in answer to my inquiry for the reason why the vendors wished to sell, he said that the property was situated in a part of the town distant from where their other property lay, and that he understood to be their only reason for parting with it." But, relying on such representations, he allowed the sale, and bought at 700*l.*; that Flint acted as auctioneer, and there was little competition, and Flint offered to get the necessary conveyances to the deponent for 5*l.* which was declined; that deponent's solicitors informed him, on the 27th of September, 1851, that the title was not in a satisfactory state, and that there was no sufficient evidence of the existence of any subsisting lease, and at that time deponent was first informed that Flint was owner of the estate. That the deponent did not see the premises until the end of October 1851, and then only the outside; and that in the following month he was informed by a surveyor that the repairs would cost 200*l.* The affidavit stated that Flint concealed the fact of being the owner, and that deponent was thrown off his guard, and relied more implicitly on his statement than he would have done had he known that Flint was the owner; that he considered and treated Flint as auctioneer only, and not suspecting he was the owner, and considering his representations as only those of an agent, he took his advice in that character, and did not make such inquiries as he would have done as to the state and condition of the property had he suspected Flint to be the owner. The affidavit then stated the deponent's belief that the auction was not conducted bonâ fide, but that some of the biddings were not real; that the plaintiff is unable to prove that the biddings were bonâ fide; that the action was conducted by the plaintiff with the unfair advantage of an understanding from the conversation of the 7th of August, that the defendant was willing to bid up to 700*l.* and that other biddings were arranged accordingly, and that deponent immediately after the sale told the plaintiff that the deponent would not have bid another 10*l.* beyond the 700*l.* Part of the affidavit of one of the firm of the defendant's solicitors was to the effect that on the 13th of March, 1852, the defendant expressed his willingness to complete, if he could be advised that a good title could be made, and that a letter was that day written to the plaintiff's solicitor offering to have a resale, each party bearing half the loss, if any; but if a gain were made the whole to belong to the plaintiff, or that the plaintiff should allow a deduction of 5*l.* per cent. off the purchase-money. The plaintiff filed an affidavit in reply, in which he denied that he recommended the property to the defendant; and he swore that he told the defendant that it was uncertain what the property would fetch, and he told the defendant that the reason for the property being sold was that the proprietor had no other property, which was the fact, in the same neighbourhood. He also swore that there were thirty persons at the sale, and there was a very fair competition, and were at least four bonâ fide bidders including the defendant; that he did not offer to get the conveyance done for 5*l.* but said his solicitor would probably not charge much above 5*l.* for it. That it is not unusual for auctioneers to sell their own property, and that at the sale only one person was employed to bid to prevent a sale below the value, the reserved bidding being 695*l.* and that there were twenty-five biddings at the sale. He denied that the defendant told him he would give, or was disposed to give, 700*l.* and he then swore that he believed the property to be worth 800*l.* and that he would not have sold it for less than 700*l.* by private contract, and that he believed the rental to be nearly 70*l.* a year.

Sir W. P. Wood and Boyle, for the plaintiff, contended that the defendant was not entitled to the production of evidence as to the devolution of the title to the lease. The occupiers had paid the rent, and more than the amount stated, and that was sufficient. There was nothing to shew that the plaintiff made any fraudulent misrepresentation as to the existence of a lease, and every presumption was the other way. Then it was said the auctioneer was also the owner; why not? Might not a man sell his own property by auction? Assuredly he might. But then the defendant, by his affidavit, said his first conversation with Mr. Flint made that gentleman aware that he would bid 700*l.* Leaving out of view, for the sake of the argument, the denial of this in Mr. Flint's affidavit in reply, suppose it had been so, would not Mr. Flint have the same right to the bidding as if he had been not the owner but only the auctioneer? And if he had been only the auctioneer and not the owner, it is obvious it would have been his duty to the vendor to obtain the 700*l.* at least, and to take care that the sale was not for less. The affidavit in reply as to mala fides in the employment of a puffer was plain and satisfactory, and no sufficient reason had been shewn to the Court for the refusal of a decree for specific performance, with costs.

W. T. S. Daniel and Smale for the defendant.—The particulars of sale convey to the defendant the notion that the lease on which the houses are held is a repairing lease, and unless the plaintiff can shew in whom it is vested, so as to enable the defendant to enforce the covenant for the repairs, he is not in a condition to enforce the specific performance of the agreement. The auctioneer being himself the vendor, has given him an unfair advantage over the defendant, as by means of that he has found out that the sum which was to be offered was 700*l.* and so the biddings could be regulated. The defendant was thrown off his guard by the recommendation of the plaintiff that the property would be cheap at 700*l.* and therefore he did not, until long after the sale, look at it; but when he did so, he found it dilapidated, and his own surveyor reported that the repairs would cost 200*l.* The plaintiff is bound to produce evidence in support of his allegation in the particulars of sale as to the existence of the lease, and he has not so done, and the abstract delivered not shewing that never was a complete abstract. Hobson v. Bell, 2 Beav. 17; Blacklowe v. Laws, 2 Hare, 40; Symonds v. James, 1 Y. & C. C. C. 487. The auctioneer is considered as a mere stakeholder; and if he be more, that is, the vendor himself, he ought to disclose it. Here, Mr. Flint took the money at a time that the defendant believed him to be a mere stakeholder, and moreover, he had obtained before-hand the knowledge of the fact of the defendant's willingness to bid 700*l.* The following cases, among others, were also cited and relied on:—Robertson v. Skelton, 12 Beav. 363; De Visme v. De Visme, 1 Mac. & Gor. 336; and Clive v. Beaumont, 1 De G. & Sm. 397.

Sir W. P. Wood, in reply, observed that although it was said the defendant did not originally know that Mr. Flint was owner as well as auctioneer, still he proceeded with the matter at a time, subsequently to that at which, by his own affidavit, he knew the fact. If that was a valid ground of objection, which it was not, the defendant should have refused to go on from the time he knew of it. Nothing had been shewn to bar the plaintiff of the relief he sought, and he therefore asked the Court for the decree he sought by his claim.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—This is a claim for specific performance. Three objections are made on the part of the purchaser: 1st. That, in truth, there is no person to answer for the covenants in the lease; 2ndly. That the auctioneer himself filled the character of the vendor; and, 3rdly. That there was a puffer employed at the sale. As to the first question, when this property was put up for sale, it was described as property "which is held subject to a lease;" it is not the sale of a leasehold interest, but, the reversion is, what is sold. The property is sold as being "a substantially-built brick house, of copyhold tenure," and it is said, at the first, "this desirable estate is sold subject to a lease containing all the usual covenants to keep in repair, at a ground-rent of 18*l.* per annum, for a term that will expire at Christmas, 1852." I agree to this position, that if, in truth, a vendor knowing that there is no person who could be liable upon the covenants in the lease, puts up the property to sale as being let upon a "lease containing all the usual covenants to repair," that that might be well considered as a false representation on the part of the vendor; for representations that the lease contains all the usual covenants to repair are calculated to lead a purchaser to believe that they will all be performed. If the vendor knew at the time that the performance of the covenants cannot be enforced, that would go far to induce the Court to hold that it was a ground for refusing specific performance of the agreement. But that is a case to be made out by the evidence. How do the facts of this case stand? There is a counterpart of the lease granted in 1799; the rent under that has been received; there are two persons now in possession of two of the houses, constituting the property demised by the landlord, and paying the rent. I could not possibly hold that that could be considered as anything like a fraudulent representation, which would preclude the Court from decreeing specific performance of the agreement. The purchaser might have made inquiry, if he had thought it necessary to do so, or had considered it a material ingredient in the question of the price he was to pay for it. The second objection is, that the auctioneer, in this case, filled the character also of vendor. It is said, as the ground of that objection, that the auctioneer is the agent of the purchaser, when the purchase is made. It is quite true that, for some purposes, the auctioneer is the agent for the purchaser, but he is not for all purposes. The auctioneer, as it seems to me, may properly hold the character of owner, and that no objection can be well founded on that ground. But, if any objection could be founded upon that, the facts of this case displace the objection; for what took place here, was the sale taking place on the 12th of August, the abstract was delivered on the 21st, which gave notice to the purchaser's solicitors, that the auctioneer was himself the vendor of the property. It does not rest there, because, in September ensuing, distinct notice comes to the purchaser himself, that the auctioneer is the vendor. In that state of circumstances, if the purchaser meant to insist upon that objection, it was his duty at once to raise it; and not having done so, I think that objection, if any, must be considered as having been waived. I consider that a purchaser, knowing of an objection of this description to be raised upon the contract, which will affect the validity of the contract, cannot lie by, and then, afterwards, attempt to avail himself of it. The instant a party knows that there is an objection, which affects the contract, it is his duty immediately to insist upon that objection, if he means to rely upon it. He cannot treat the contract, as subsisting, at one time, and at a subsequent period say there was no contract. The last objection is, that there was a puffer employed at the sale. I was very much struck at an early period of the argument with the consideration of the question, whether the fact of there being a person bidding through the last long series of biddings, antecedent to the final close, might not affect the case. I was rather struck at the time with the view that the Master of the Rolls took of the question in the case of Smith v. Clarke, 12 Vesey, 483, where he says that a bidder cannot be employed to "screw up the price, or take advantage of the ignorance of the bidders." We must look at the question, whether this person was employed for the purpose of "screwing up the price." I cannot draw the inference that he was employed for such a purpose, from the fact of his having bid against a bonâ fide bidder through a long series of biddings. For it is not to be expected that when a person is employed to bid for property up to a certain sum, say 700*l.* he should at once proceed to bid 695*l.* he would rather bid gradually up to 695*l.*; and if, after that, no bonâ fide bidder offers against him, that fact alone should not lead to the conclusion that the party is employed to "screw up the price," or to take advantage of the ignorance of the bidder. Then it rests upon this,—Mr. Smale says, the reserved bidding was fixed, with a knowledge that this would be a sum of 700*l.* for the houses, and that it was fraudulent to force it up to that by a person who was not a bonâ fide bidder. Looking at the affidavit of the defendant, I find no more than this, that the plaintiff went for the purpose of receiving rent from him, the auctioneer, who was himself the vendor of the property, and he then inquired what he, the auctioneer, thought it would be sold for? whether it would be sold at about 700*l.*? To which Flint, the auctioneer and vendor, replied, that he thought it possibly might, but he did not think it would be sold at less than that sum. Then Flint recommended him in strong terms and advised him to purchase it, and said he would find it c[illegible]. This was on the 7th of August. The sale does [illegible] take place until the 12th, and from that time till the sale, this gentleman does not go to look at the property, or make further inquiry, but he relies on the representation so made. Now there was no objection at that time; he merely makes the inquiry, will it sell for 700*l.*? Is it a fraud, when the vendor and auctioneer, when a party comes to him and makes an inquiry whether it will be sold for 700*l.* chooses to fix the reserved bidding at that sum? I think not. It was open to the vendor to make inquiries. I think upon these grounds, I cannot refuse to make a decree for specific performance of the contract; and though I have had some doubt on the point of costs, I think I cannot do justice unless I give costs against the purchaser. Decree specific performance, and as the question of title has been submitted to the Court, and the Court being of opinion that there is no valid objection to the title, there must be a decree for specific performance, with costs, and a reference to the master to settle the conveyance.

VICE-CHANCELLOR PARKER'S COURT.

Reported by GEO. S. ALLNUTT, Esq. of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law.

Jan. 15 and Feb. 9.

Will—Construction—"Vested"—Remoteness.

By will a sum of 1,000*l. charged on real estate was given to trustees upon trust to invest and to pay the interest to A. B. for life, and after her decease to pay, apply, and dispose of the principal sum and interest unto, between, or amongst all and every the child and children of A. B. in equal shares, or if but one such child the whole to such only child, to be a vested interest or vested interests on their respectively attaining the age of thirty years; and if any child or children of A. B. should die under thirty without lawful issue, the share or shares of him, her, or them so dying, as well original as accruing, should go to the survivors or survivor, and become vested at such ages or times as the original share or shares; and in case all the children die under thirty without issue, the same was given over. A. B. had two children, C. D. who died in her lifetime unmarried, and under thirty years of age, and E. F. who survived her and attained the age of thirty:*

Held, that E. F. and the executor of C. D. were entitled to the fund, as the children of A. B. took a vested interest under the will, the executory bequest on the death of any under thirty without issue being void for remoteness.

By a marriage settlement made on the marriage of Thomas Taylor and Ann Frobisher, and dated the 12th of February, 1810, W. Blanchard, for himself and his wife Mary, covenanted to surrender, and the said Mary Blanchard appointed, certain copyhold hereditaments of the manor of Fishlake, in the county of York, to the use of A. Thorpe and J. Gray, in fee, according to the custom of the said manor, upon trust, to pay the rents and profits thereof to Mary Blanchard for her separate use for life, and after her decease, in case the said Ann Taylor, or any child or children of her should be then living, upon trust to raise 1,000*l.* as therein mentioned, and subject thereto to stand seised of the said copyhold premises, in trust for such person or persons, for such estate or estates, intents, and purposes, and in such manner and form as the said Mary Blanchard, whether covert or sole, and during and notwithstanding her coverture, by any deed or deeds, writing or writings, with or without power of revocation, by her signed and sealed as therein mentioned, or by her last will and testament in writing, or any codicil or codicils thereto, should from time to time direct or appoint, and in default of and subject to such appointment, in trust for the heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns of the said Mary Blanchard. By her will, dated the 23rd of March, 1833, expressed to be intended as an execution of the said power, Mary Blanchard devised and appointed unto her son, Thomas Frobisher, his heirs and assigns, the copyhold hereditaments therein described, and situate at Fishlake aforesaid, subject nevertheless to and charged and chargeable with the payment of the sum of 1,000*l.* to be paid unto Jonathan Gray, William Husband, and James Barber, their executors, administrators, and assigns, upon the trusts thereinafter declared concerning the same. The testatrix then declared that her said trustees should permit the said sum of 1,000*l.* to remain chargeable on the said premises until the same should be required for the purpose of the trusts thereinafter declared concerning the same, and should in the meantime receive of the said Thos. Frobisher, his heirs or assigns, interest thereupon after the rate of 4*l.* per cent. per annum, by equal half-yearly payments; but, nevertheless, in case her said son should be desirous of paying the same, the said trustees should receive the same, and invest the said sum at interest in their names as therein mentioned, until the said trust moneys should be payable or transferable as thereinafter mentioned. The will then proceeded as follows: "And upon further trust to pay the interest, dividends, and annual proceeds of the said sum of 1,000*l.* whether remaining on the security of the said estate, or invested as aforesaid, to my daughter Ann Taylor, and her assigns, for the term of her natural life, and from and after her decease upon trust to pay, apply, and dispose of the said principal sum of 1,000*l.* and all interest due thereon, unto, between, or amongst all and every the child and children of my said daughter, in equal shares, or if there shall be but one such child, then the whole to such only child, to be a vested interest, or vested interests, on their respectively attaining the age of thirty years, and if any child or children of my said daughter should die under the age of thirty without lawful issue, the share or shares of him, her, or them so dying, as well original as accruing, by survivorship, shall go to the survivors or survivor in equal shares, if more than one, and become vested at such ages or times as his, her, or their original share or shares. And upon this further trust that they my said trustees do and shall, after the decease of my said daughter, and until the share or respective shares of such child or children as aforesaid shall become vested and payable by and out of the interest, dividends, and annual proceeds of the said sum of 1,000*l.* pay and apply to and for the maintenance and education of the ..... child or children respectively, such yearly sum or sums of money as to them my said trustees shall seem meet, not exceeding the interest of the expectant share of such child or children respectively in the said principal sum of 1,000*l.* And I hereby direct and declare that in case all the children of my said daughter shall die under the age of thirty years and without lawful issue the said Jonathan Gray, William Husband, and James Barber, their executors, administrators, and assigns, shall stand possessed of the said principal sum of 1,000*l.* upon trust to pay or transfer the same unto said Thomas Frobisher, his executors, administrators, and assigns." By a codicil to her will dated the 12th Feb. 1833, Mary Blanchard, after reciting that part of the copyhold property had been enfranchised, and was become freehold, declared that the description thereof as copyhold in her will should not affect the devise thereof. Mary Blanchard died on the 12th Feb. 1835, leaving Thomas Frobisher and Ann Taylor her only children, and on the 23 Feb. 1850, the will and codicil of the testatrix were proved in the proper Ecclesiastical Court by the said Thomas Frobisher. Ann Taylor died on the 20th Nov. 1841, leaving Thomas J. Taylor, her only child her surviving, but having had issue one other son named Benjamin Frobisher Taylor, who died without having been married on the 5th April, 1839, aged twenty-seven, having by his will dated the 2nd Jan. 1836, appointed Richard Tollington and John Loseley executors thereof; and Richard Tollington having renounced probate, the will was proved by John Loseley alone on the 29th July, 1839. Thomas J. Taylor attained the age of thirty years on the 8th Oct. 1849. James Barber was the only surviving trustee of the sum of 1,000*l.* appointed by the will of Mary Blanchard. Thomas Frobisher paid to Ann Taylor during her lifetime interest in respect of the said 1,000*l.* and subsequently to her decease and up to the 12th of Feb. 1850, he paid interest in respect thereof to the said Thomas J. Taylor, but the whole of the principal still remained unpaid. Thomas J. Taylor concurred with the other parties claiming an interest in the said sum of 1,000*l.* in submitting these facts to the Court by way of special case. The questions thereby submitted for the opinion of the Court were, whether the bequest or appointment contained in the will of Mary Blanchard of the sum of 1,000*l.* after the decease of Mary Taylor unto and amongst all and every the child or children of the said Ann Taylor, and charged upon the estates in the said will mentioned, was or was not a valid bequest, and if valid, who was or were the person or persons then entitled under such bequests.

Monday, Feb. 9.—The VICE CHANCELLOR said, the question in this case depended on the meaning which, upon consideration of this will, was to be attached to the word "vested," as used by the testatrix. It was scarcely necessary to say that in construing this will the Court placed out of sight the circumstance that if one construction were adopted, the disposition in favour of the children of Ann Taylor would be void for remoteness; while, if the other were taken, it would be in a great measure supported. The Court in such cases, in the first instance, ascertained what were the provisions of the instrument and whether they were opposed to the ordinary rules of construction; and then to what extent they were in accordance with the rules of law. In this will the testatrix used the word "vested," not in its ordinary sense, but in the sense of not being subject to be divested, so as to be defeasible. It was only in this way that her intention could have been carried into effect in the form which was in her contemplation. The word "vested," though it had a technical or strictly legal meaning, especially when applied to various interests in real estate, was in effect used in different senses. In Barnes v. Allen, 1 Bro. C. C. 181, Lord Thurlow said:—"Contingent and executory interests may be as completely vested as if they were in possession;" obviously there using the word "vested" in the sense of "transmissible." In Berkeley v. Swinburne, 16 Sim. 275, where the testator directed the shares to be vested interests in sons at twenty-one and in daughters at twenty-one or marriage, the Lords Commissioners construed the word to mean "indefeasible," and held that the shares vested before the ages of twenty-one or marriage, on the death of the tenant for life, subject to be divested on their deaths under that age, and in the case of daughters without having been married. In Glanvill v. Glanvill, 2 Mer. 38, Sir W. Grant construed the "vested," in its ordinary sense, observing, however, that there was no evidence from any part of the will that the testator did not affix to the word its precise legal meaning. In the present case the testatrix, after the death of Ann Taylor, directed the trustees to pay, apply, and dispose of the said principal sum of 1,000*l.* and all interest due thereon, unto, between, or amongst all and every the child and children in equal shares, or if there shall be but one such child, the whole to such only child, to be a vested interest or vested interests on their respectively attaining the age of thirty years; and if any child or children of Ann Taylor should die under the age of thirty, without lawful issue, the share or shares of the child or children so dying should go to the survivors or survivor. In this disposition, as well as in what followed it, the testatrix contemplated that each child before attaining the age of thirty years, was in some sense at least to be entitled to a share of the fund which she designated as the share of such child. If any child died under thirty, without issue, then the share of such child was to go to the others; if any child died under the age of thirty years, leaving issue, the share of such child was not to go to the others, but the original gift remained unaffected. The conclusion appeared to be irresistible, that the testatrix intended the child so dying with issue to retain his share as an interest transmissible to his representatives. His Honour considered that it did so by force of the original gift. It was impossible to suppose that the words implied an intention that while the share of a child dying and leaving no issue was to go to the others, a share of a child dying leaving issue was not to go to the others, but to go to those who were to take in default of appointment. So, when the testatrix, in the ultimate disposition of the fund gave it to Thomas Frobisher, in the event of all the children of Ann Taylor dying under the age of thirty years, and without issue, she must have meant that to be the only event in which, under the previous dispositions, the fund was to be undisposed of; but in the event of an only child dying and leaving issue, the fund was not to go over to Thomas Frobisher, because such deceased child took an absolute interest in the fund. The object of the testatrix was to make a complete disposition of the fund, and in such a case the Court always endeavoured to construe the will so as to prevent a failure of the interest of any party named therein. He considered that here the meaning was, that all the children of Ann Taylor were to take vested interests in the fund, subject to be divested by their deaths under thirty without issue, and that when they attained thirty they were to take respectively indefeasible interests in their shares. This construction, which made all the will consistent, was in accordance with what was said by Sir John Leach in his judgment in the case of Bland v. Williams, 3 My. & K. 411. He there said, "Whether in a gift of this nature the time of vesting is postponed, or only the time of payment, depends altogether upon the whole context of the will. If the gift over is simply upon the death under twenty-four, then the gift could not vest before that age. In this case the gift is not simply upon the death under twenty-four, but upon the death under twenty-four without leaving issue. If upon a death under twenty-four, at whatever age issue was left, then the gift over is not to take place. It is in effect, therefore, a vested interest with an executory devise over in case of death under twenty-four without leaving issue. All the cases upon the subject, except the one before Lord Gifford are reconcileable with this distinction." If the case before Lord Gifford were referred to, it would be found to form no exception to the rule, as stated by Sir John Leach. In that case (Bull v. Pritchard) the gift was not to any children, except such as should attain the age of twenty-three years. Such a gift in favour of children was of the same nature as that in Glanvill v. Glanvill; and in the latter case Sir William Grant's decision would probably have been different if the gift over had been in the event of the death of children under age without leaving issue. The case of Russell v. Buchanan, had been referred to, but there was nothing in the will in that case to shew that the word "vested" was to be taken in any other than its ordinary sense, the clause being similar to that adverted to in Glanvill v. Glanvill, and Bland v. Williams, for the destruction of the contingent remainders in that case by an event subsequent to the testator's death, could not affect the construction of the will. In the present case the direction as to maintenance did not throw much light upon the intention of the testatrix either way, neither did the discretionary power to the trustees. She appeared to have considered the fund as entirely disposed of by the previous disposition. For the reasons he had stated his Honour's opinion on the case was, that the bequest or appointment in the will of Mrs. Blanchard of 1,000*l.* after the decease of Ann Taylor unto and amongst all and every her child and children was a valid bequest, and that the gift over of the shares of any child or children who should die under the age of thirty without issue was void for remoteness, and the consequence was that Thomas J. Taylor and the executor of Benjamin Frobisher Taylor were the persons who were entitled under the clause in question. The costs of this special case must come out of the fund.

WILSON v. BENNETT.
Will—Construction—Power of sale—Heir of surviving trustee.

In this case, which is fully reported 17 Law T. Rep. 240, Newman Hyde, the testator, had given his real and personal, copyhold and leasehold estates to three trustees, their heirs, executors, and administrators, upon certain trusts; and he also empowered his said trustees, and the survivors and survivor of them, his heirs, executors, or administrators, to sell all or any part of his said property. The survivor of the three trustees appointed two executors of his will, and devised to them and their heirs his trust estates. These executors contracted to sell part of the copyhold property to Richard Bennett, who objected to their power to sell. The Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce (April 1, 1851) held that the title was too doubtful to force upon the purchaser. It having afterwards been discovered that Samuel Wilson, one of the executors, was also heir-at-law to the surviving trustee, the special case was amended by stating that fact, and was now again brought before the Court.

Malins and Hamilton Humphreys appeared for the plaintiff.

Russell and Hardy for the purchaser.

Osborne for the other defendants.

The following cases were cited:—Cole v. Wade, 16 Ves. 27; Bradford v. Belfield, 2 Sim. 264; Cooke v. Crawford, 13 Sim. 91; Titley v. Wolstenholme, 7 Bea. 425; and Miller v. Priddon (see 18 Law T. Rep. 323).

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that the case of Cooke v. Crawford had often been misunderstood: it was not an authority that a trustee might not devise trust estates, but that if a trustee had an estate and also a power he might devise the estate, although he might not devise the power. The present title was too doubtful to compel a purchaser to accept it. The power was intended to be exercised by the persons who had the estate, and now the estate and the power were severed. The persons who entered into the contract had not the power to sell, and the contract could not be enforced.

April 28 and 29.
WARWICK v. HAWKINS.
Will—Construction—Separate use of married woman.

A testator by his will gave to A. B. a married woman, an annuity for her separate use, and by a codicil he gave to A. B. "in addition to the legacy mentioned in his will, the sum of 300l. to be paid to her free of legacy duty." The annuity was the only legacy given to A. B. by the will:

Held, that the 300l. was given to A. B. for her separate use.

William Bayley, by his will, dated the 4th of July, 1846, gave several annuities to the women therein named, and among others gave and bequeathed to Ann Warwick, the wife of William Warwick, one annuity, or clear yearly sum of 100*l.* for and during her natural life free of legacy duty, and the testator afterwards directed that the several annuities given by that his will should commence from the day of his death, and should be paid to the several persons to whom they were respectively given half-yearly for their sole and separate use and benefit, independently and exclusively of any husband or husbands with or to whom they were then, or thereafter might happen to be, married, and not to be in any way subject to the debts, control, or engagements, of any such husband or husbands; and the testator directed that the receipts of the said several annuitants respectively, notwithstanding their coverture, should be good and effectual discharges to the person or persons paying the same. By a codicil dated the 5th of November, 1850, the testator, after stating it to be his wish that Ann Warwick should live in his house, desired his executors to pay to her "in addition to the legacy mentioned in his will, the sum of 300*l.* to be paid to her free of legacy duty, and immediately after his death." No other legacy than the annuity had been given to Mrs. Warwick by the will. By a second codicil dated the 3rd of Dec. 1850, he bequeathed as follows:—"As Mrs. Warwick is intended by me to continue in this house after my death, I hereby, by this codicil, bequeath to her all the furniture belonging to me at my death, except the linen and plate, which I have disposed of by my will. I desire, also, that Mrs. Warwick shall have whatever money may be in this house belonging to me for her own use and purposes after my death." The testator died on the 30th of November, 1851, and the will and codicils were duly proved by the executors. The present claim was filed by Mrs. Warwick against the executors claiming to have the legacy of 300*l.* with interest, paid to her for her separate use, or, in case the Court should not consider she was entitled to it for her separate use, then to have the same settled upon her and her issue.

Glasse and Faber, for the plaintiff, referred to Day v. Croft, 4 Bea. 561.

Malins and Dauney, for the executors, only desired to have a declaration by the Court upon the construction of the will. The plaintiff's husband was out of the jurisdiction, and the executors were willing to act as the Court should direct.

Thursday, April 29.—The VICE-CHANCELLOR said, that upon the authorities he thought there could be no doubt that this sum of 300*l.* was given by the first codicil to Mrs. Warwick for her separate use, and there must be a declaration accordingly. His Honour considered that the plaintiff had better not ask any declaration as to the furniture. As assets were admitted, the costs must be paid out of the estate.

Thursday, April 29.
WESTBY v. WESTBY.
WESTBY v. WESTBY.
Practice—Charging order—Fund in Court.

Under a sequestration against A. B. for contempt sums had been paid into Court and invested. A. B. had been ordered to pay certain costs to the plaintiffs, which, as A. B. was out of the jurisdiction, they had been unable to obtain. Upon a petition by the plaintiffs, the Court charged the sum standing to the sequestration account, with the amount of these costs.

This was a petition by the infant plaintiff in the second suit above mentioned. By an order dated the 11th of February, 1848, a petition presented by the defendant Mary Westby, was dismissed with costs, to be paid by her. The present petitioner's costs on that petition were taxed, and a writ of fi. fa. was, in May 1851, issued for the amount; but Mrs. Westby was out of the jurisdiction, in France. Under a sequestration issued in the second suit against Mrs. Westby, for contempt in not producing certain deeds, the sum of 99*l.* 16*s.* and other sums were paid into the bank, to the credit of that cause, the sequestration account; and by an order afterwards obtained, these sums were invested in stock. The present petition was presented for the purpose of having an order nisi, charging the stock standing to the sequestration account, with the amount of such taxed costs.

Schomberg, in support of the petition, referred to 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, ss. 15 and 18; 3 & 4 Vict. c. 82; and cited, Stanley v. Bond, 7 Bea. 386.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that the petitioners might take a similar order to that made in Stanley v. Bond.

Schomberg asked, that as the order was to be an order nisi, his Honour would fix a time for shewing cause.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that they might take a month.

Saturday, May 29.
Re COKE'S TRUST.
Trustee.
As a general rule the Court will not appoint the tenant for life a trustee.

The petition in this case prayed, among other things, that the husband of one of the tenants for life of the trust fund might be appointed a trustee.

De Gex appeared in support of the petition.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said, that as a general rule the Court would not appoint a tenant for life of a fund a trustee. The petition must stand over, and the parties must endeavour to find some other person to act as trustee.

Saturday, June 5.
Trustee Act, 1850.

Real estate was devised to trustees upon trust for A. B. for her life, and afterwards for her children equally, and if A. B. died without leaving a child, for the testator's right heirs. In a suit, part of the real estate was sold, and the purchase-money was paid into court, and the trustees being dead, the two children of A. B. who were infants, petitioned under the above Act that the estate might be vested in the purchaser, or that a proper person might be appointed to convey:

Held, that the petitioners were not constructive trustees, and the Court dismissed the petition.

John Jacob by his will devised, subject to the payment of his debts, all his real and personal estate to trustees for Maria Williams for her life, and after her decease for Eliza Weston for her life, and, after the decease of the survivor of them, for all and every the child and children of E. Weston, their executors, administrators, and assigns, equally to be divided between them as tenants in common; and if E. Weston died without leaving a child or children, for the testator's own right heirs. By a decree made in this suit, part of the testator's real estate was directed to be sold, for the purpose of raising a fund for the payment of costs to which the estate had become liable. The sale was effected, and the report of the purchase was confirmed, and the purchase money was paid into court. The trustees of Jacob's will were dead, and the present petition was presented under the Trustee Act by Mrs. Weston's two children, who were infants, praying a declaration by the Court that they, and the unborn children of Mrs. Weston, on their coming of age, would become trustees of the estate, and that their estates might be vested in the purchasers, or that H. W. Weston, or some other proper person, might be appointed to convey to the purchasers.

Malins and Bilton, in support of the petition, referred to the 29th and 30th sections of the Trustee Act, 1850, and contended that the petitioners were constructive trustees.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR declined to make the order, observing that he did not consider the sections referred to were applicable to the case, or that the infants were constructive trustees.

DRAKE v. WHITMORE.
Mortgage—Power of sale.

Where the Court directed money to be raised by mortgage, an application that a power of sale should be inserted in the mortgage was refused.

The parties beneficially interested under the will in this case were directed by the Court to raise money by mortgage of devised real estates, in order to pay certain charges, the Master having found that it would be more beneficial to raise the money by mortgage than by sale.

Glasse asked that the mortgage should contain a power of sale.

Faber appeared for some of the parties.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that he did not consider that he could delegate such a power to a mortgagee, and declined to permit a power of sale to be inserted.

ENTHOVEN v. COBB.
Production of documents—Privileged communications.

A. and B. alleged to have a common cause of action against C. brought separate actions against him, which were still pending. A. obtained counsel's opinion upon his rights, and gave a copy of the case and opinion to B. C. filed a bill of discovery against B. and B. by his answer, admitted the possession of this copy among other documents. Upon a motion by C. for the production of the documents admitted by B. to be in his possession, it was Held, that this copy of case and opinion was privileged.

This was a motion for the production of documents admitted by the answer of the defendant to be in his possession, and a question arose as to the production of a case and opinion under the following circumstances. Nine bonds of the Copper Miners' Company were in 1845 placed by the plaintiff with Messrs. Cunliffe, the bankers, and seven of these were afterwards handed to the Misses Hoyle, and the other two to the defendants Cobb. By the plaintiff it was contended that there was an actual transfer of the bonds, but by the Misses Hoyle and the Cobbs it was alleged that the bonds were deposited by way of security for the amounts of the bonds advanced by them. Actions were subsequently brought by the Misses Hoyle, and also by Messrs. Cobb, against the plaintiff, for the amounts of principal and interest alleged to be due to them respectively (see 15 Law T. 137, as to the Misses Hoyle's action). The Misses Hoyle having taken counsel's opinion as to their rights, a copy of the case and opinion was given to the defendants Cobb, and in their answer to the present bill, which was filed for the purpose of discovery, this copy appeared among the documents in their possession, but they claimed a right to withhold it on the ground of its being privileged.

Wigram and Rawlinson, in support of the motion, cited Desborough v. Rawlins, 3 Myl. & Cr. 515; Greenough v. Gaskell, 1 Myl. & Keen, 98; Whitbread v. Gurney, 1 Younge, 541; Goodall v. Little, 1 Sim. N. S. 155; and Glyn v. Caulfield, 3 Mac. & G. 163.

Malins and Karslake, for the defendants, were not called upon.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said he did not think the plaintiff was entitled to see the case or opinion. As he understood the facts, it appeared that nine bonds were deposited with Messrs. Cunliffe, seven of which being in respect of a separate transaction, passed into the hands of the Misses Hoyle, and the other two into the hands of Messrs. Cobb, the present defendants. The question in litigation had arisen between the plaintiff and Misses Hoyle and Messrs. Cunliffe; the main point being what was the nature of the transactions between the plaintiff and Messrs. Cunliffe in the first instance. There was an action still pending between the plaintiffs and Misses Hoyle, with respect to the seven bonds, and another action was also pending between the plaintiff and the defendants Cobb relating to the other two. It appeared that the Misses Hoyle, with a view to assert their right in their defence to the action, submitted a case with respect to the seven bonds through their own solicitor to counsel, and obtained an opinion upon it. This case and opinion were privileged as between the plaintiff and the Misses Hoyle beyond all doubt. Then Misses Hoyle's solicitor gave a copy of that case and opinion to the present defendants Cobb, their cases, as it must be assumed and as was alleged by the answer, being alike. These were privileged and confidential communications: privileged as between the plaintiff and the Misses Hoyle, and ought not to be produced to the plaintiff. His Honour decided this on the ground of the interest of the defendants Cobb in these matters. But the proceedings of Misses Hoyle being still pending, he thought there was a great deal of importance in the view of it, that Misses Hoyle's interest was not represented here, and that, therefore, these confidential communications with their solicitor, with a view to their defence to the action, should not be produced without giving them an opportunity of objecting to it. This was, in fact, a communication between the present defendants and their legal adviser, the Misses Hoyle having lent it to them to enable the defendants' solicitor to understand their common case. He thought that the cases cited did not apply to the present. There must be the common order for production of all documents excepting these.

MAJOR v. MORITY.

Claim—Parties.

Some of a class who might be intended under a particular construction of a will, permitted to represent the class in a claim for administration.

Under the will of the testator in this claim, a question arose as to the meaning of the word "issue." The claim was filed for the administration of the estate, and

G. L. Russell now asked for leave to amend the claim by adding as parties some of the class who might be interested under the term "issue." The children and grandchildren who might be included in the term were very numerous, and it was not known where they all were.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR gave the leave, observing that it was not desirable to bring before the Court all the parties, when it was probable that some of them would be brought only to be informed that they had no interest.

Ex parte RECTOR OF LEA.

Railway company.

Upon the petition of A. B. rector of L. a reference was directed to the Master as to a proposed investment in land of purchase-moneys paid into court by a railway company for lands belonging to the rectory, and A. B. died before the report: it was Held, that the Master might, with the new rector's consent, proceed with the reference without a supplemental order.

By an order, dated the 11th of June, 1851, made upon the petition of the Rev. D. C. Legard, the rector of Lea, a reference to the Master was directed to inquire as to the propriety of a purchase of land proposed to be made with money which had been paid into court by the Great Northern Railway Company on account of lands belonging to the Rector of Lea, and taken by them. Mr. Legard died before the Master had made his report, whereupon the Master declined to proceed with the reference.

Nalder now applied for a supplemental order.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that he considered the Master could proceed upon the reference directed by the order of the 11th of June, 1851, without any supplemental order; that was assuming that the present rector was a consenting party, but if there were any difficulty the registrar might draw up a supplemental order.

Re RICHARDS'S ESTATE.

Trustee Act 1850.

Service of notice of proceedings for the appointment of new trustees on the parties beneficially interested.

The testator in this case had by his will given to trustees the residue of his property, which was divisible into six parts, to one of which parts the seven children of a [illegible] of the testator were entitled. It being necessary to appoint new trustees, four of the seven children had, under the 38th section of the Trustee Act 1850, obtained the Master's certificate, and a motion was now made for an order appointing the trustees in accordance with the certificate.

W. H. Harrison appeared in support of the application.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR inquired whether any of the other parties interested in the property had been served with notice of these proceedings.

W. H. Harrison replied that they were very numerous, and it would be impossible to serve them all. The Master had considered himself entitled to proceed under the 37th section of the Act.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that that section spoke of persons beneficially interested. Primâ facie all the parties interested should receive notice, but if that were impracticable, a case should be made for proceeding as to particular parties without notice. In the present case his Honour did not consider the parties were sufficiently represented by these applicants, who were entitled only to four-sevenths of one-sixth of the property, and he must, therefore, refer it back to the Master to review his certificate.

Re LEVETT'S TRUSTS.

Trustees Relief Act (10 & 11 Vict. c. 96).

Petition under this Act should state in terms the money.

This was a petition under the 10 & 11 Vict. c. 96, for the payment to the tenant for life of the income of a fund paid into court by trustees under the Act.

Renshaw appeared in support of the petition.

Dawney for the trustees.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR, upon making the order, observed, that as the affidavit made by trustees upon paying money into court under this Act, was the declaration of trust upon which the Court acted, petitions ought to set forth in terms the necessary parts of the affidavit. This had not been done in the present case, and the absence of such a statement occasioned much inconvenience.

Ex parte HALL, re THE DIRECT EXETER, PLYMOUTH, AND DEVONPORT RAILWAY COMPANY.

Joint-Stock Companies Winding-up Acts—Costs.

Where the costs of an application to the Court were not disposed of at the time when the order was made, the application for them should be made to the Master in the first instance.

This was an application to the Court on behalf of Dr. Wm. Hall (whose case is reported in 3 De G. & Sma. 214, and 15 Law T. 109) that the costs incurred by him of or in relation to, or in consequence of an application made to the Court on his behalf on the 2nd of May, 1850, and the costs incurred by him in appearing before the Master and the costs of this application might be paid to him by the official manager. The case had been considered to come within the principle of other cases since decided, and consequently Dr. Hall's name was struck off the list of contributories.

Karslake appeared in support of the motion.

Roxburgh, for the official manager, contended that the costs were in the discretion of the Master, and he referred to the 103rd section of the Winding-up Act of 1848, and the 12th section of the Act of 1849, and that in fact an application had been made to the Master and refused. If, therefore, any application were to be made to the Court it should be by way of appeal.

Karslake, in reply, said, that the application which had been made to the Master, referred only to the costs before him.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said, that from the sections which had been cited, it appeared to be quite plain that Dr. Hall must go before the Master in the first instance, and then, if he were dissatisfied with his decision, he must appeal. If he had already been there, he must bring the matter before the Court by way of appeal, but if he had not he must apply to the Master.

Roxburgh asked for the costs of this application.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said, that if they were insisted upon, he must give them.

Receiver—Fire insurance.

By the decree in the cause it had been declared that L. B. H. was tenant in tail in possession of certain real estates in the pleadings mentioned. A receiver of these estates had been appointed by the Court, with a direction to pay certain fire insurances on the mansion-house, stables, and other buildings, and he had also been directed to pay the surplus monies arising from the rents, &c. to the account of L. B. H. A portion of the buildings having been burnt down:

Held, that the tenant in tail was entitled to the monies arising from the insurance on them.

This was a petition presented by Louis B. Harcourt, an infant, by his guardian, praying that certain monies which had been received from an insurance office might be paid to his account in the cause. The suit had been instituted for the administration of the trusts of the will of Lord Harcourt, and, by an order made in April 1819, it was ordered that the receiver of the real estates in the cause, formerly the property of Lord Harcourt, should pay all rates, taxes, insurances, and the other necessary outgoings in respect of the mansion-house, &c. at St. Leonard's-hill, devised by Lord Harcourt's will. Wm. B. Harcourt, the first tenant in tail in possession under the will, who had died in 1817, had effected insurances on the mansion-house, stables, and other buildings at St. Leonard's-hill, in a large sum of money, in his own name. After his death, the insurances had been kept up, and the premiums duly paid, by the trustees under the will, and after the appointment of the receiver by the receiver under the above order. In the month of February 1850, the stables were burnt down, and the insurance money, amounting to 800*l.* was paid by the insurance office to the representatives of Wm. B. Harcourt. This sum of money was subsequently paid into court, it having been determined that the stables were unnecessary and inexpedient that they should be rebuilt. By the decree subsequently made on the hearing of the cause, it was decreed that certain estates of Lord Harcourt, including those at St. Leonard's-hill, had become, and then were vested in the petitioner L. B. Harcourt, as tenant in tail male in possession, and the receiver was directed to pay the balances from time to time in his hands to an account to be entitled "The Account of the Infant Defendant L. B. Harcourt."

Leach, in support of the petition.

Selwyn, for the party entitled in remainder, contended that the effect of the order of the Court was that the insurances were for the general benefit of all parties, and the money received under the insurance ought to be considered as part of the estate, and the premiums borne by each tenant in tail in succession.

Messiter, for parties in the same interest, cited Norris v. Harrison, 2 Madd. Rep. 268.

Leach, in reply, said the testator himself had not directed any insurance on the premises. That the effecting the insurance was a mere temporary arrangement, and done to save harmless the tenant for life. The amount of the premiums being paid out of the annual surplus rents, he was entitled to the benefit of them. (Re C. J. Skingley, a Lunatic, 15 Jur. 958.)

The VICE-CHANCELLOR, referring to that part of the order of the Court which had directed the receiver to pay out of the balances from time to time in his hands the annual premiums of the insurances, said he thought this had been done for the benefit of the parties who, in the result of the decision in the cause, should prove to be interested, and the outgoings should be borne accordingly. The result of that decision having been that the infant petitioner had become tenant in tail, the fair construction was, that he was the party for whose benefit these insurances had been effected.

Order according to the prayer of the petition.

HOOD v. BRIDPORT.

Tenant in remainder—Repairs.

A reference is usual to ascertain if repairs to be done are for the benefit of an infant party to the cause.

This was a petition presented by the next friend of an infant plaintiff, praying for a reference to approve of a sum of money being laid out towards the repairs of certain buildings on the real estate of which he (the petitioner) was tenant in tail ex- nt on the death of his mother, the tenant for he being willing to contribute her share to- those repairs. The money proposed to be l had arisen from the surplus rents of other --, of which the petitioner was tenant in ..ssion.

Lewin, in support of the petition.

Prior appeared for the guardians of the infant, who had been served with a copy of the petition, and relied on Ware v. Polhill, 11 Ves. 257, as shewing that the Court never converted the property of an infant so as to change the nature of it as between him and the representative, who was not to be prejudiced in any way by any Act done by the Court. In the present case the property was not only intended to be converted, but could never be got back, and the money, if the infant died before he came into possession, would go to other parties, and not to his representative.

Lewin, in reply, said the Master was the proper person to inquire whether in fact the proposed outlay in repairs was for the benefit of the infant or not. The Court was in the daily habit of applying personal estate towards repairs. He relied on a case, Ward v. Ward, in which a similar order to that now asked for had been made by Vice-Chancellor Parker in November last.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said he thought the order for the usual reference ought to be made. The Master could consider whether the proposed expenditure was or not for the benefit of the infant, and if it was, to state the amount which ought to be contributed. Order accordingly.

REG. v. THE INHABITANTS OF THE COUNTY OF SOUTHAMPTON.

Bridges—Indictment for non-repair—Local Act affecting the Isle of Wight.

The Isle of Wight is a division of Hampshire, having no separate commission of the peace. It was always assessed to the general county rate, but the public bridges in the island were not repaired out of that rate. Before the passing of a local Act (53 Geo. 3, c. 92), those bridges, if not repairable ratione tenuræ, were repaired either by the parishes in which they were situate, or by rates in the nature of county rates made at the county sessions upon all the parishes in the island. In 1774 an arrangement was made at the county sessions, whereby the proportion of the county rate to be paid by the island was settled, subject to a deduction of the amount paid by the island for the repair of bridges, &c. the island agreeing to maintain the bridges. By the local Act (passed in 1813) it was enacted that all the bridges within certain parishes specified, which had previously been accustomed to be repaired by any parishes, tythings, &c. were to be afterwards repaired in the same manner and by such ways and means as other bridges, usually called county bridges, within the same had been accustomed to be repaired.

Upon an indictment against the county at large for the non-repair of a county bridge, situate in the Isle of Wight, which, previously to the Act of 1813 had been repaired by the parish in which it was situate,

Held, that as the Act removed the liability of the parish, it fell upon the county at large, and not upon the island only, the arrangement of 1774 not affecting the legal liability of the county or island.

This was one of three indictments for the non-repair of three bridges in the Isle of Wight; tried by consent at the last assizes for the county of Somerset, when a verdict of guilty was taken, subject to the opinion of this Court upon special cases, stating the facts applicable to each indictment. The principal facts, however, were the same in each case, and were thus stated:—Before the year 1842, all the public bridges in the Isle of Wight, not repairable by tenure, had been maintained and repaired, either by the inhabitants of certain tythings, parishes, and places in which they were situate, or by rates in the nature of county rates levied on the inhabitants of all the parishes and places in the island under the arrangement hereafter mentioned. From the year 1774 until 1842, the practice was for the justices of the Isle of Wight division to apply to the Quarter Sessions of the county of Hants for "a rate in the nature of a county rate," and thereupon an order of sessions and rate was made on every parish in the island, purporting to be "for repair of the bridges and Bridewell in the island, and for other purposes to which such rate was by law applicable within the island." Before 1774 entries in the order books and books of assessment of the general county rate shew that rates were at various times made on the several places and parishes in the Isle of Wight; but the sums levied thereon were not uniform. (Numerous entries found in the existing county records down to 1774, shewing the practice before that year, were inserted in the case.) The last entry was as follows:—"1774,—Assessment made on the Isle of Wight according to the arrangement hereinafter mentioned,—3d. rate, at 235*l.*; 1½d. rate, at 117*l.* 10s."

These contributions were parts of the general county rates, and applied indiscriminately with the contributions of the main land. No instance is known before 1842 of the application of the general county rate to the repair of an island bridge, but the county justices of the Isle of Wight division were used to expend the island rate in the nature of a county rate, made in the manner above specified, on the objects for which it had been directed to be applied by the County Quarter Sessions, i. e. island bridges and bridewell, and this was the usage and practice when the Local Act above referred to passed. Until very recently there has always been a House of Correction, or Bridewell, for the Isle of Wight, in Newport. There is not, nor ever was, mission of the peace for the island, which is a division of the county of Southampton.

In 1772, the Isle of Wight having been assessed in common with the other parts of the county, appeals against such assessment were entered, which were continued to 1774, when an arrangement was made by consent of the General Quarter Sessions; the terms of which are embodied in the following order:—

1774. Easter Sessions. Brook, Brigton, &c. v. County Rate. } The appeal of the several parishes of Brook, Brigton, &c. against the county rates received and respited at the last sessions, coming now again before this Court, in order to put an end to the present disputes subsisting between the inhabitants of the several parishes in the Isle of Wight and the inhabitants of the county at large, and to prevent disputes in future concerning the proportion the inhabitants of the said island are and ought to pay to the county rates, it is hereby agreed by Mr. Missing and Mr. Kirby, of counsel, on part of the county, and Mr. Grose and Mr. Rashleigh of counsel for the said appellants, that whenever a rate of 3d. in the pound shall be made on the county at large, the proportion to be paid by the Isle of Wight, for such rate shall be 270*l.* and accordingly that the rate made at the last Michaelmas Sessions of 1½d. in the pound, and now appealed to, shall be 135*l.* and that the like proportions shall be observed in assessing the said island, be the general rate upon the county more or less than 3d. in the pound, deducting, however, out of such proportion, such sum and sums of money as the Isle of Wight ought to have paid to the bridges and house of correction, had they been liable, calculating the annual average value thereof from the treasurer's accounts for the last fifteen years, the said island hereby being adjudged and declared not to be liable or subject to pay to the county bridge rate or to the house of correction, and it is hereby agreed that two persons shall be appointed (one by each party) to inspect the treasurer's accounts and ascertain such average, and make such deduction, and after such deduction so made, the sum remaining of the proportion of 270*l.* is from henceforth to be the proportion of the Isle of Wight when the whole rate upon the county is at 3d. in the pound, the Isle of Wight agreeing to erect and maintain from time to time houses of correction and bridges within the said island at their own and sole expense, &c.; and this Court doth hereby order and direct that the said agreement shall be, and the same is hereby an order or rule of Court.

The magistrates acting for the division of the Isle of Wight, did by and out of the local rate levied exclusively on parishes in the Isle of Wight by Order of Sessions, and made in the form above stated, from time to time repair such public bridges in the Isle as were of the nature of county bridges, and so far as regards the general county rate, the proportions settled by Order of Sessions in 1774, and subsequently, in 1819, were alone contributed by the Isle of Wight down to 1842, such proportions exceeding the 5*l.* There never was any indictment against the county for not repairing bridges in the Isle of Wight previous to 1842, nor any indictment against the inhabitants of the Isle for such non-repair.

In 1813, a local Act (53 Geo. 3, c. 92, made public, and to be judicially noticed) was passed for consolidating the management of all roads and highways in the Isle of Wight, and appointing commissioners for that purpose, in which Act is contained the following clause (sec. 67): "And be it further enacted, that all bridges, drains, and sewers within the said parishes and places aforesaid, which have, previous to the passing of this Act, been accustomed to be repaired by any parishes, tythings, divisions, or townships, shall from and after the 11th day of October, 1813, be for ever repaired and kept in repair in such and the same ways and means as other bridges, drains, and sewers usually called county bridges within the said island, have been and are accustomed to be repaired. And that from and after the said 11th of October, such particular parishes, tythings, divisions, and townships shall be discharged from the exclusive burden of keeping and maintaining such bridges, drains, and sewers in repair.

Sec. 81 of the same Act enables the commissioners under that Act to build and repair, and keep in repair any bridge or bridges, or any part of the roads in the island, and across any river, stream, ditches, or drains therein, or contiguous thereto, making recompense to the owners and occupiers of lands for damage done to them.

In 1842, the county again proposed to assess the Isle of Wight in common with the rest of the county, according to a fresh valuation made under 55 Geo. 3. c. 51, and 56 Geo. 3. c. 49, and without reference to the old proportions, and in consequence of the opinions of counsel then given, such assessment was made, and has since continued, and has been from time to time paid; and the Isle of Wight has ever since been included in the general assessment, and no separate island rate has been made at the quarter sessions, but applications have been made from time to time by the island justices to the justices of the general quarter sessions at Winchester, to repair bridges and bridewells in the Isle of Wight when the repairs became necessary. Doubts being raised as to the liability of the county to repair such bridges, and as to the validity and legal effect of the order of 1774, this indictment was preferred, and the verdict thereon taken by mutual consent for the purpose of settling the above doubts.

One of the three indictments was for the non-repair of a bridge, called Black-bridge, situate in the tything of Niton, in the Isle of Wight; and which had always, before the passing of the local Act in 1813, been repaired by that tything. The present bridge was erected in 1840, instead of an ancient public bridge of the same name; but in the erection of it the island justices did not comply with the directions of the 43 Geo. 3, c. 49. A second was for the non-repair of a certain public stone and brick building, called Sandown-bridge, in the parish of Brading, in the Isle of Wight. The bridge mentioned in that indictment was a stone and brick bridge used by the public, and erected in the year 1814, under the circumstances hereinafter mentioned, instead of an ancient bridge of stone called by the same name, situate in the tything of Sandown, in the same parish of Brading, across the same stream of water, which bridge always before and at the passing of the local Act 53 Geo. 3, c. 92, hereafter mentioned, had been used to be repaired by the tything of Sandown. The present bridge was built in the year of our Lord 1814, since the passing of the local Act above mentioned. The old one was of stone, and narrow dimensions, sufficient only for one carriage or waggon to pass at a time, and stood in a different position, rather lower down the stream. This bridge had two arches, and was generally used for carriages only when there was a great depth of water; at other times carriages used to pass through the stream.

This bridge being out of repair, the justices for the island division caused the present new bridge to be built of stone and brick, of greater width than the old one, and sufficient to enable two carriages to pass each other. It consists of one arch only, and the road has been raised at each end, so that all carriages now regularly pass over it at all times. The expense of the new bridge was defrayed out of a local rate, ordered by the Quarter Sessions of the county, in the manner hereinbefore described, and levied on the inhabitants of the island. In the erection of the bridge, the justices of the island division employed a local surveyor, but did not comply with any of the directions of the statute 43 Geo. 3, c. 49. Before 1842 the new bridge was usually repaired by order of the justices of the island division, from the local rate ordered and levied as aforesaid. The commissioners of highways, under the above-named local Act, have always repaired the road over the bridge, and 100 yards at each end, down to the year 1842.

The third indictment charged the nonrepair of a bridge called Tinker's-bridge; but as upon the facts stated with reference to the structure of that bridge the Court thought it could not be considered a county bridge at all, it is unnecessary to give the particulars of that case. The bridges were admitted to be out of repair; but the question submitted to the Court in each case was whether the county of Southampton was liable to repair the bridge.

Saturday, May 1.—The case was argued by Crowder (Barstow with him) for the Crown; Kinglake, Serjt. (Smirke with him) for the defendants, before Lord Campbell, C.J. Wightman, Erle, and Crompton, JJ.

The nature of the principal question appears sufficiently from the judgment of the Court; but in the case of Sandown-bridge a distinction was taken on the ground that the new bridge was in a different position and more commodious than the old. The Court, however, intimated at the time that substantially it was the same bridge, and to be so regarded. (R. v. Lancashire, 2 B. & Ad. 813; R. v. Devon, 5 B. & Ad. 383; R. v. West Riding, 5 Burr. 2594; R. v. New Sarum, 7 Q.B. 941, were referred to.) Cur. adv. vult.

JUDGMENT.

Lord CAMPBELL, C.J.—In this case an indictment was preferred against the inhabitants of the county of Southampton for the non-repair of a public bridge, called "Black-bridge," situate in the Isle of Wight, and the question for our consideration is, whether the county of Southampton is liable to repair this bridge, or, indeed, any bridge in the island; or whether the inhabitants of the island are exclusively bound to repair this and other public bridges within the island. The Isle of Wight is within, and a division of, the county of Southampton. There is no separate commission of the peace for the island, and, primâ facie, the county generally will be liable to repair the public bridges within it. It appears, however, before the passing of the 53 Geo. 3, c. 92, all the public bridges in the island, not repairable by tenure, were repaired either by the inhabitants of the several tythings, parishes, and places in which they were situated, or by rates in the nature of county rates levied on the inhabitants of all the tythings, parishes, and places in the island. The island was always assessed to the county rate, but before 1812 the public bridges in the island were never repaired out of the general county rate; but a rate, in the nature of a county rate, was ordered at the Quarter Sessions of the county, to be made on every parish in the island, for the repair of the bridges and the bridewell, and for other purposes to which such rate would be applicable by law within the island. In 1774, an arrangement was made at the Quarter Sessions of the county as to the proportion of the county rate to be paid by the island, from which proportion it was agreed that the amount which th island ought to pay for bridges and the house of correction should be deducted, the island agreeing to maintain the bridges and the house of correction in the island; and this agreement, which was merely conventional, was acted upon when the stat. 53 Geo. 3, c. 92 was passed. That was an Act for amending the roads and highways in the Isle of Wight. By the 67th section all the bridges, drains, and sewers within the parishes and places specified in the Act (the bridge in question being one of them), which had, previous to the passing of the Act, been accustomed to be repaired by any parishes, tythings, divisions, or townships, were to be repaired after the 11th of October next in the same manner, and by such ways and means as other bridges, usually called county bridges, within the same, had been accustomed to be repaired. The bridge in question had always been before the passing of the Act repaired by the tything of Niton. The future repair of the bridge being, by the 67th section of the Act, declared to be by the same means, and in the same manner as other county bridges of the island, we are of opinion that the county generally is liable to the repair, and that there is nothing in the statute, nor is there any legal ground upon which the county can claim to be exempt. The statute has taken away the liability of the tything of Niton, which had previously always repaired the bridge, and has made it repairable by such ways and means as the other bridges in the island. The county bridges in the island were repaired out of a rate in the nature of a county rate made at a quarter sessions of the county upon the parishes in the island. Such a rate, however, could be but conventional, as the sessions would have no authority to make such a rate in the nature of a county rate upon parishes in the island; nor would this conventional mode of dividing the proportion of a legal obligation alter the right of the public, when the liability to the performance of it became a legal question. No indictment could be maintained for non-repair against the inhabitants of the island, which, though a division of the county of Southampton, is not a district chargeable as such with any liability known to the law, and the statute has expressly removed the obligation from the parishes, tithings, and places, which had formerly repaired. The county can be discharged of the general legal liability thrown upon it to repair the general county bridges within it, only by shewing that some other person or persons are liable. As the county of Southampton has failed in establishing such legal liability in others, we are of opinion that there should in this case be judgment for the crown. There were two other cases against the county for the non-repair of two other bridges in the island—Sandown-bridge and Tinker's-bridge. The case of Sandown-bridge turned upon the same question as that on which we have just expressed our opinion. Some minor points were made in it which were in effect disposed of during the argument. Our judgment, therefore, in this, as well as in that of the Black-bridge, will be for the Crown. In the case of Tinker's-bridge, we were of opinion, at the time of the argument, and still are of opinion, that, upon the facts stated, it was not such a bridge as the county could be bound to repair, or a county bridge; and in that case our judgment will be for the defendant. In fact, we may consider it like a plank across a ditch in a highway.

THE COMPANY OF PROPRIETORS OF THE KENNET AND AVON CANAL v. WITHERINGTON.

Company—As to continuance of powers conferred by Act of Parliament.

An Act of Parliament authorised a company to make a river navigable, and to maintain and preserve the same, and to erect weirs and dams in the river, and on the lands adjoining, and from time to time to alter and amend the same, first making compensation to the owners of the lands made use of, as the commissioners should direct. The commissioners had power to settle the compensation, with the aid of a jury, in certain cases, and they were appointed by the Act, with a power to nominate successors:

By a subsequent section, compensation was directed to be given for consequential damage arising from raising the water to a prejudicial height, cleansing, repairing the river, &c. the amount to be settled by the commissioners and jury:

The commissioners were allowed to die off without nominating their successors:

Held (Lord CAMPBELL, C.J. dissentiente), that the power of ascertaining the amount to be paid for consequential damage arising to a mill-owner, from the enlargement of a dam, being lost by the deaths of the commissioners, did not deprive the company of their right to make such enlargement for the purposes of the navigation of the river.

Trespass for cutting and breaking certain piles, stakes, and hurdles, forming part of a dam of the plaintiffs in the river Kennett. Plea, justifying the removal of part of the dam in question, on the ground that it was an enlargement of a dam formerly erected, and that such enlargement obstructed the water formerly allowed to be passed by the dam, which water the plaintiff claimed a right to in respect of his mill. Replication, that the dam was enlarged by the plaintiffs for the purpose of maintaining the navigation of the Kennett, under the powers of the Act of Parliament. (1 Geo. 1, st. 2, c. 21.) Rejoinder, that all the commissioners nominated in the said Act of Parliament for the purpose of settling compensation for damages, and all the commissioners who had been subsequently nominated under the Act were dead, and that no commissioners were in existence when the dam was enlarged. Demurrer to this rejoinder.

Whateley (Gray with him) contrà.

The argument rested on the construction of the above Act of Parliament mentioned in the pleadings, and the material sections are set out in the judgments.

JUDGMENT.

Saturday, June 12.—The judges differing in opinion, now delivered their judgments.

CROMPTON, J.—After stating the pleadings as above, the learned judge proceeded.—The plaintiffs having demurred to the rejoinder, the question arose whether the powers under which the plaintiffs acted had been lost or destroyed by the death of all the commissioners named in the Act, or subsequently appointed, and by reason of no commissioners under the Act being in existence at the time of making the works mentioned in the replication. By the first section, powers are given to seven persons named in the Act, their heirs, assigns, and nominees, to make the river Kennett navigable, and from time to time to continue and maintain the same, and to dig and cut through the banks of the river, and to erect in the river, and on the lands adjoining, or near to the same, weirs, pens, dams, &c. and from time to time to alter and amend the same, and to do all matters and things which they should think necessary for the making and maintaining the said river Kennett navigable, or for the improvement and preservation thereof, the said undertakers, their nominees and assigns, first giving satisfaction to the owners or proprietors of such lands, weirs, mills, tenements, or hereditaments respectively as shall be digged, cut, or removed, or otherwise made use of for the carrying on or effecting the said navigation, or for maintaining or managing the same, as the commissioners shall direct and appoint, in case the said undertakers, their heirs, assigns, and nominees, shall not before-hand have agreed with the proprietors of such weirs, mills, lands, tenements, and hereditaments, respectively concerning the same. By the second section the commissioners are appointed to mediate between the undertakers and the owners and occupiers of such lands, weirs, mills, tenements, and hereditaments, as shall be intended to be made use of, and to settle and determine the satisfaction to the parties for such portion of their lands as shall be cut, digged, removed, or made use of, with power to mediate by a jury before the commissioners, and the undertakers, on payment and not before, were authorised to remove, dig, cut, or use the land. According to these clauses, satisfaction to the owners in the manner prescribed was made a condition precedent to the digging, taking, and using the land of the adjoining owners; and the non-existence of the commissioners precludes the assessing compensation by the commissioners in the mode prescribed, and no power of this description could be exercised after the commissioners had ceased to exist except in the case of agreement between the undertakers and the owners. This provision for antecedent satisfaction was properly applicable to taking and injuring land, the compensation for which could be settled or determined before-hand, but it was not applicable to cases of consequential damage, and accordingly the Act of Parliament does not include such cases in the provision for compensation to which I have referred. The provision for compensation in the first and second sections only includes direct compensation for direct trespass on the land which it specifies. It was proper, therefore, to make other provisions for compensation for consequential damage, and this was attempted to be done by the 18th section of the Act. By that ion, "if any person or persons, at any time after the said river is made navigable, shall happen to sustain any damage or injury in his, or her, or their meadow, grounds, lands," and so forth, "by the said undertakers, their heirs, or assigns, or nominees raising the water to a prejudicial height or turning the steam, or by not sufficiently making up or repairing the banks of the said river, or cleansing the same, or by their taking away, wasting, or diverting the water from the said meadows, mills, water-engines, or wharfs," in such case a power is given to the commissioners by inquisition and jury to assess and settle the damage or satisfaction, and then means are provided by allowing them to take tolls to recover that satisfaction. The making satisfaction for damages of this description could not be made a condition precedent to the doing the act which might cause the damage, and, accordingly, in this section provision is made for subsequently ascertaining, settling, and recovering such damages. The damage sustained by the mill-owner in the present case was of this latter class, and, according to the intention of the framer of the Act, he ought, after the act done and the mischief sustained, to have had his compensation assessed for the damage the exercise of the powers had occasioned. The question is, whether, by reason of the mode of assessing the amount of such damage being lost, the plaintiffs have lost the power expressly given them by the first section, the exercise of which is not made to depend upon the prior satisfaction. It was argued before us that the Legislature must be taken as impliedly enacting powers, the exercise of which must be injurious to the mill-owners, which the Legislature would not have given without a compensation clause, which should not cease on the cesser of the powers of compelling compensation. It could not be said the making satisfaction was a condition precedent to the exercise of this power. But it was said the power was coexistent with the commission under the Act, and the existence of the means of obtaining compensation was a condition precedent to the exercise of the power. It appears to me, if I were to yield to this argument it would be rather making an Act of Parliament than construing one. The 1st section gives what may be called two classes of powers; one is to be exercised only on the condition precedent being complied with; the Act is silent as to any prior condition with respect to the other. It is true, in all probability the Legislature thought they had sufficiently provided for compensation to the millowners. If they had foreseen what has happened, they would not have left the millowners without compensation, but their care probably would have been to give compensation in a more secure way, and not to have taken away the power. Can we properly imply a condition which is to take away the powers expressly given by statute, because the Legislature have failed in making sufficient provision for compensation to the party injured by the exercise of those powers? And when I find express power is given by the Act, clearly sufficient for the purposes used, I cannot say this power has ceased by implying a condition which the Legislature has never contemplated, from the circumstances which they had not in their contemplation, and which, if they had contemplated, they would in my opinion have guarded against, not in the way now suggested, by taking away the powers, but by giving some other mode of making compensation. If I may make any implication of what I may call the intention of the Legislature, I should think that it was a less straining to imply that they considered in such a case reasonable compensation should be recoverable, than to imply that the powers were to cease. The Legislature did intend that compensation should be made, though they failed in the mode of carrying it out, and they never contemplated that the powers necessary for the existence of the navigation should cease. It must be remembered that the non-existence of the commission had not happened through the default of the plaintiffs or of the undertakers whom they represent. The commissioners were a distinct body, and it is through their negligence in not filling up the vacancies in their body according to the directions of the Act that the mischief has occurred. It would be equally hard upon the plaintiffs to have the navigation injured for want of powers necessary for its maintenance and preservation as it is upon the defendant to have sustained injury to his mill. Finding that the Legislature has expressly given the powers in question, and that they do not take them away by any express words in the event which has happened, I do not think I can imply that the powers are to cease because the Legislature has not provided a specific mode for recovering compensation. If they had given no compensation for damages those powers would have been good, but the case appears to me to be the same where compensation follows the power given to be exercised before the compensation is to be inquired into. I have assumed, for the purposes of my judgment that no mode of compensation exists in the case, and that the law is in favour of the existence of the powers. I do not wish to be considered as saying there is no mode of obtaining satisfaction. There seems various objections to the modes adverted to in the argument as the possible modes of obtaining compensation. I am by no means certain some mode may not exist, but it is not necessary to decide this point, as I think the powers do not cease, even if all power of obtaining satisfaction shall be gone. I think, therefore, that the rejoinder contains no sufficient answer to the replication, and that the plaintiffs are entitled to our judgment.

Erle, J.—I agree in the judgment of my brother Crompton. The question in substance appears to me to be whether the rights given by the statute to the canal company to raise a weir for the necessary purposes of the canal is taken away in the event that the right given to the owner of a mill by the same statute to recover compensation for consequential damage to his will through the commissioners is lost because there are no commissioners? I think this question must be answered in the negative. The right of the canal company is given unconditionally; and at the time it is exercised it is contingent whether there will be any damage to be compensated for or not. If one of the two parties is to lose his right, the canal company have the priority in the order of exercising the right, and the owner of the mill can shew no reason why his right should be preferred to the rights of the canal company, which are both public and private. Further, it seems to me to be ground for holding that an action would lie against the company for not making compensation, because when the right to raise the weir was created, the duty of compensating in case of damage was imposed, although a special tribunal for awarding such compensation was created with a special remedy by a receiver of tolls; yet, as a right to such compensation exists at Common Law, and the Common Law right was rather restricted by the statute then created by it, the special remedy may be concurrent with an action at Common Law, or the Common Law remedy may be revived in failure of the special remedy. Whether this be correct or not, the plaintiff seems to me to be entitled to our judgment, for the reasons before given.

Wightman, J.—The case, as it appears upon the pleadings, having been stated by my brother Crompton, it is unnecessary for me to repeat it. It being admitted that the compensating power given by the Act of Parliament is gone, the question for our consideration is, whether the power of the company to make such alterations in their dams and other works as may be necessary for maintaining the navigation is gone also, if such alterations are detrimental to the rights of others acquired subsequently to the constructing of the original dams or works. The dam was originally constructed, and the alterations made under the powers given by the 1st sec. of 1st Geo. 1, c. 24. By that section the company were empowered to make over, or in the river Kennett, such dams and other works as they might think fit, and from time to time to alter the same, and to do all such things as they might think necessary for maintaining the river navigable, or for the improvement or preservation thereof, first giving satisfaction to the owners or proprietors of such lands, weirs, mills, tenements, and hereditaments as should be damaged, cut, or removed, or otherwise made use of for carrying on the navigation as the commissioners therein after named should direct, in case the parties should not agree. Under this clause the defendant would not be entitled to compensation, even if the commission were still in existence, as the condition of "first making satisfaction" applies only to the actual taking or using the lands, &c. of others, and not the consequential damage arising to persons whose lands may be injuriously affected by the acts of the company, though they are not taken or used by them. But by the 18th sec. of 1 Geo. 1, c. 24, it is enacted, "If any person shall happen to sustain any damage or injury in his, her, or their meadow grounds, lands, tenements, hereditaments, mills, weirs, water-engines, or wharfs, by the said undertakers, their heirs, assigns, or nominees, raising the water to a prejudicial height, or turning the stream, or by not sufficiently making up or repairing the banks of the said river, or cleansing the same, or by their taking away, wasting, or diverting the water from the said meadow, mills, water-engines or wharfs," the commissioners are required to assess the damages by a jury. This clause for compensation is a substantive and independent clause, but not by way of condition either precedent or subsequent to the powers given to the company by the first section of the Act. The Act contains a provision for supplying vacancies in the commission by other commissioners to be named by those who remain; but it has happened that all the original commissioners have died without exercising the power, and in consequence no proceeding for compensation can now be taken under the Act. It appears to me, however, that the neglect of the commissioners to appoint successors, which is not imputable to any default on the part of the company, does not affect the rights of the latter to do whatever they are empowered to do by the first section. It was no doubt intended by the legislature that compensation should be given in such a case as that in question; but the statute is so framed that the compensation clause cannot be carried into effect. This may be a hardship on those whose lands or mills are injuriously affected by the works of the company, but it would be equally hard upon the company if their navigation was entirely stopped upon that account. I am, therefore, of opinion that as those enabling powers given by the first section are not, by the Act, made subject to the compensating powers contained in the eighteenth section, or dependent upon them, the company might lawfully do what they have done, and the defendant was not justified in pulling down part of the dam; and that the powers given by the first section to the company did not cease, because another power given by another independent section to recover compensation in case injury was done in exercise of the powers given by the first section, had expired; Lobley v. Lister, 7 A. & E. 129, is a decision in the plaintiffs' favour, shewing that an authority given by statute to do acts injurious to the property of another, giving satisfaction for the damage done, is not made void by failure of the means of obtaining satisfaction pointed out by statute. Whether the defendant may or may not be entitled to compensation independently of the provision of the statute, it is not necessary now to consider, as however that may be, it appears to me that the defendant was not justified in pulling down part of dam which the plaintiff had erected under the authority of the Act of Parliament. I therefore think that the plaintiffs are entitled to our judgment.

Lord Campbell, C J.—In this case, unfortunately, I differ from my learned brothers, but as after great deliberation, I strongly entertain a contrary opinion, it is my duty to declare it. The defendant has a clear answer to the trespass complained of, and is entitled to our judgment, unless the plaintiffs had a right under the 1 Geo. 1. stat. 2. c. 24, to raise a dam across the River Kennett, and thereby to cut off the supply of water which it is admitted had immemorially flowed for the driving of his mill. If the board of commissioners appointed, and directed to be continued by the second and third sections of the statute, had been duly continued, so that the defendant might have had compensation for the loss occasioned to him by the raising of the dam, they would have had a right to raise it, as they have done, for the necessary, reasonable, and beneficial use of the navigation by boats, barges, lighters, and other vessels. But the question is, whether they could exercise their power to the detriment of the defendant, after all the commissioners named in the statute were dead, and no successors to them had been, or could be appointed. I think that this power was not absolutely perpetual, but dependent on the condition of the board of commissioners being duly continued, so that compensation might be given for the very serious loss which the exercise of it might occasion. By the first section of the statute two classes of powers are conferred on the owners of the navigation; one to be exercised upon the soil of others, and another class to authorise acts whereby consequential damage might arise to the proprietors on the banks of the river. The granting of compensation through the instrumentality of the commissioners was expressly made a condition precedent to the exercise of the first class of powers, the said undertakers, their heirs, and assigns, first giving satisfaction to the owners or proprietors of such lands, weirs, mills, tenements, or hereditaments respectively as shall be digged, cut, or removed, or otherwise made use of for the carrying on or effecting the said navigation." It is quite clear, therefore, that these powers can no longer be compulsorily exercised. As the consequential damage arising from the exercise of this second class of powers, in some cases could not be foreseen, as the amount of it could hardly be adjusted and estimated by anticipation, no previous satisfaction is provided for; but section 18 enacts,—"If any person shall sustain any damage in his mill by the owners of the navigation taking away or diverting the water from the said mill, or any similar injury, the commissioners shall, by a jury empanelled as therein is directed, assess such damage and appoint a receiver of the tolls, who shall, from the tolls received, pay the amount of compensation assessed to the party aggrieved. Although this compensation is to come after the act has been done which causes the damage, can it be supposed that the Legislature intended to confer the power of doing such an act after all possibility of obtaining compensation for it had ceased, and has ceased, as I think, through the default of the owners of the navigation? They had an interest and a duty to keep up the board of commissioners, and there can be no doubt, as it seems to me, that on their application this Court would have granted a mandamus under sec. 3 of the statute for the appointment of new commissioners. Supposing the clause conferring this extraordinary power over the property and rights of others had begun with a preamble in these words:—"Whereas there is provision hereinafter made by the appointment of commissioners whose continuance the owners of the navigation may obtain for making compensation to those who may suffer from the exercise of such powers," it could not have been contended that these powers might have been exercised after the owners of the navigation who were to exercise them had suffered the board of commissioners to become irrecoverably extinct. May not the Legislature in the first enactment be supposed to have had in contemplation all the enactments that were to follow, and may not the exercise of the extraordinary powers conferred, be fairly considered as made conditional on the owners of the navigation preserving the means of making compensation. We must not suppose that Parliament has enacted what would be most arbitrary and iniquitous, if the language employed by them will bear a construction consistent with reason and justice. And looking to the whole of the statute I think the meaning of it may fairly be taken to be, that these extraordinary powers which it confers, to seize or to injure the property of others were only to be exercised, while the owners of the navigation took care that compensation might be obtained in the manner prescribed. The defendant's mill could no longer be taken from him without his consent for the purposes of the navigation, because that comes under the first class of powers, and why should it be supposed that the company have now the power of diverting the whole of the water which ought to flow to his mill, whereby his mill may be rendered useless and he himself may be ruined? The extreme improbability of such legislation being admitted, an attempt was made to argue that the defendant may obtain compensation, although not by means of the commissioners, but on the supposition that the act of raising the dam whereby all the water is diverted from the defendant's mill was lawful. No satisfactory mode has been pointed out in which compensation can be obtained. It is quite clear that the common action on the case for wrongfully diverting the water, would not lie; for this supposes a conjunction of injury and loss, and here would be an instance of damnum absque injuria. But it has been suggested that the Legislature must have meant compensation should be granted, and that an action of assumpsit might be supported on an implied promise to make the compensation, or in tort for the breach of duty in not making compensation. But while the statute, by the 18th section, provides compensation in a manner that can no longer be put in use, and anxiously gives an effectual remedy for obtaining payment for the sum assessed, it nowhere else mentions compensation for such a loss as the present; all the powers created by the 1st section, while they exist, are absolute, except as to awarding compensation through the medium of the commissioners, and if these powers now exist, they are altogether absolute. How, then, can there be any implied promise to make compensation? And how is any such duty imposed? The plaintiff's counsel relies on the case of Lobley v. Lister, in which this Court intimated an opinion that an action might be maintained for compensation by the owner of a house and land, after they had been taken under the authority of an Act of Parliament, although trespass would not lie for taking them without having previously made or tendered compensation. But there, the Act authorised the road trustees to enter upon and take the lands and pull down certain houses, making or tendering satisfaction to the owners of all lands and houses so taken for any loss or damage they might sustain thereby. Thus a duty was imposed on the trustees, after taking the land and houses, to make compensation for such loss and damage; and although, for the breach of this duty, they were not considered trespassers ab initio, yet the law would furnish an easy remedy. In the present case the statute contemplates no compensation except by applic[illegible] to these commissioners, and as there [illegible] longer any commissioners, if the act of raising the dam was lawful, no compensation can be obtained for the loss (of course I mean in my opinion) which the defendant has thereby suffered. The framers of the statute very possibly did not foresee the extinction of the commissioners, but I think the intention of the Legislature must be considered to have been that upon the extinction of the commissioners, the extraordinary powers conferred upon the owners of the navigation over the property and rights of others ceased. No hardship will arise from the conclusion that thenceforth all parties interested were to continue in the enjoyment of the property, and rights which then belonged to them, with a power of voluntarily entering into any new arrangement for valuable consideration. The act of raising the dam might improve the navigation, and raise the profits of the shareholders, but it would be strange if such a power existed, without any compensation being given to the defendant, whose mill thereby becomes a useless mass of stones, timber, and iron. It seems to me that the company acted unlawfully when they raised that dam, and cut off the supply of water from the defendant's mill, and that he might have brought an action against them for doing so, and that in this action he has a good defence for the alleged trespass he committed in removing the obstruction, which they had unlawfully caused to the enjoyment of his rights. But, as my brothers are of a contrary opinion, there must be judgment for the plaintiffs.

BANKRUPTCY.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY, LONDON, reported by JOHN A. FONBLANQUE, Esq. Barrister-at-Law.
COURT OF BANKRUPTCY, DUBLIN, reported by J. LEVY, Esq. Barrister-at-Law.

Wednesday, May 19.
(Before Mr. Commissioner FONBLANQUE.)
ANON.

Under sec. 211 an order for protection to a fixed day, instead of "until further order," is irregular but not void, and it may be amended.

Where there has been an assignment of all an insolvent's property previous to a petition for arrangement, upon a petition for adjudication founded on the assignment being filed, the Court will enlarge the time for opening that petition, until it can be decided whether the arrangement can be effected or not.

An insolvent had assigned all his property for the benefit of his creditors; he subsequently petitioned for protection under the arrangement, sections 211, et seq.

An order was made upon the petition, giving him protection until a fixed day, instead of "until further order," as required by the statute.

A petition for adjudication had been filed founded upon the previous assignment as an act of bankruptcy.

This was an application that the order for protection might be set aside, in order that the petition for adjudication might be proceeded with.

Linklater (solicitor), in support of the application. The order for protection is void as not being in the terms required by the statute. (Ex parte Bowers, 18 Law T. Rep. 203.) The insolvent having assigned all his property previous to his petition for arrangement cannot fulfil the conditions of the statute, by making the affidavit that he has 200*l*. ready to produce. The title of the assignees under the petition for adjudication will date from the assignment, which is a valid act of bankruptcy; it therefore will supersede the petition for arrangement.

Lawrance (solicitor) contra.—There appears to have been fraud in Ex parte Bowers. There the petitioning creditor's debt was subsequent to the petition for arrangement, and could not be affected by it, more than a debt incurred pending a bankruptcy is barred by the certificate. The words in the statute "necessarily include a fixed period." The irregularity is not material, and may be amended. The petition for adjudication cannot be sustained against the protection. (Fonb. 48.) The distribution of assets under the arrangement must be as complete as it would be under a bankruptcy. The Court will not entertain concurrent proceedings for the same purpose.

Mr. Commissioner FONBLANQUE.—It does not appear that in Ex parte Bowers the Court above held that the order was void, although it was declared irregular. The power to make the order to a fixed period seems to be contained in the words of the statute "until further order." Such an order is certainly convenient, for an order made in the precise terms of the stat. "until further order" might give protection for ever; for if creditors should omit to apply for "a further order," it would not be the insolvent's interest to do so. The arrangement will give the creditors as full remedies as they would have in bankruptcy, but under a milder form; and it should be shewn that there is some necessity for the more stringent remedy. The order for protection may be amended, so as to comply with the statute: but let the petition for adjudication remain on the file, and the time for opening be enlarged, in order that the Court may be satisfied that the insolvent has not entirely denuded himself of all his property by the assignment, and that he has 200*l*. assets ready to produce.

INSOLVENCY COURT.

Wednesday, June 30.
Re JOHN HIGGS.

Judgment summons at the date of the petition—Jurisdiction of Court for Relief of Insolvent Debtors upon committal of an insolvent by County Court for non-payment of a debt, from which he has been discharged by an adjudication under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110:

Held, that the Court has no power to order the discharge of an insolvent so committed.

Mr. Commissioner LAW.—I regret extremely that the law does not empower me to order the discharge of a man who, having obtained his liberty under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, is wrongfully imprisoned by a County Court, in defiance of the adjudication. When a man having his privilege against arrest, by an order under the protection statutes is so committed, this Court can order his discharge, but the provision of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, is this:—"The Court shall issue warrants of discharge pursuant to the adjudication, as to any detainers lodged before the debtor shall be out of custody. But if, having gained his liberty, he shall afterwards be taken by reason of any debt, or sum of money, to which the adjudication applies, he must apply to a judge of the court from which the process has issued, and such judge is required to release him, on proof that the cause of the detainer is within the scope of the adjudication, unless it was made without due notice to the plaintiff. The judge can also, in his discretion, order the plaintiff to pay costs to the defendant." In this case, it appears by documents from the Clerkenwell County Court, that in January 1848, Mr. Henry Beverley Wakeling, an attorney, recovered 5*l* 12*s*. 10*d*. with 1*l*. 6*s*. 5*d*. costs, against this John Higgs, who was ordered to pay the same by monthly instalments. He did not pay it, and was afterwards committed to Coldbath-fields prison on a judgment summons. The precise date does not appear, but in the recent summons there is an extra charge of 3*l*. 8*s* 1*d*. for that proceeding. On the 20th of November, 1850, Higgs being in execution for a large amount, petitioned under 1 & 2 Vict. and a vesting order was made; he was duly heard, notice being regularly given to Mr. Wakeling as to other creditors. Adjudication was made, and he was discharged on the 10th of February, 1851. On the 23rd of June, 1852, Mr. Wakeling brings the defendant before the Clerkenwell Court by a judgment summons founded on the judgment recovered in 1848, and he is committed for thirty days. It would be idle, in this instance, for this man to seek his liberty from the Court which has deprived him of it; because it appears from his affidavit that he exhibited to the judge of that Court the order of adjudication, and an office copy of the entry of Mr. Wakeling's debt in the schedule. I have shewn that the statute does not enable me to act, and the mischief can only be remedied by going before a judge of a Superior Court on habeas corpus.

JUDGES' CHAMBERS.

Wednesday, July 7.
(Before COLEMAN, J.)
DOE dem. KING v. HOLMES.

Inspection of documents—14 & 15 Vict. c. 99.

This was a summons taken out by the lessor of the plaintiff calling on the defendant to shew cause why the lessor of the plaintiff should not be at liberty to inspect and take an examined copy of the marriage-settlement of a party under whom the lessor of the plaintiff claimed to be entitled.

Hemings, for the defendant, objected that the lessor of the plaintiff was not a "litigant" within the meaning of sec. 6 of the Evidence Act, inasmuch as he had not joined in the consent rule, and until the lessor of the plaintiff does so, that he is not a party to the cause, so as to be made liable to pay costs, &c. The learned judge, however, thought that the lessor of the plaintiff was a "litigant" within the meaning of the 6th section of the Evidence Act, but added that the plaintiff's attorney must undertake to join in the consent rule. The summons was eventually dismissed on the merits, and the judge indorsed on the summons (to be embodied in an order), an undertaking on the part of the attorney of the lessor of the plaintiff that he would join in the consent rule. This was done to enable the defendant to obtain his costs.

PREROGATIVE COURT.

Will -Signature—15 & 16 Vict. c. 24.

A motion for probate of a will had been made on the 4th of December, 1851, but rejected on the ground of its not having been signed within one of the provisions of the 9th sec. of 1 Vict. c. 26, viz. at the "foot or end." No administration as if the deceased were consequently legally dead intestate had been taken.

The 1st sec. of the Wills Act Amendment Act (15 & 16 Vict. c. 24) had removed all doubt as to the validity of the will with reference to the position of the signature to it, and the 2nd sec. of that Act provided that "its provisions should extend to every will already made, where administration or probate had not already been granted or ordered by a Court of competent jurisdiction, in consequence of the defective execution of such will." The will itself was dated 1st May, 1850; it was all in the handwriting of the deceased; it was contained in six pages of paper concluding nearly at the end of the sixth page, where was the signature of the deceased, which also appeared at the bottom of each page. None of these signatures, however, as appeared from the affidavits of the attesting witnesses, were made in their presence, but all of them were affixed previous to their subscribing the will. The deceased afterwards signed in their presence, a formal attestation clause having first been written, but there not having been sufficient room at the bottom of the sixth page, where the will ended, to contain the attestation clause, that clause was written on the top of the seventh page, thereby leaving a blank space at the end of the will. After the attestation clause followed the signature of the deceased, and those of the attesting witnesses. This last signature alone was made in the presence of the attesting witnesses. The former motion for probate of the will had therefore been rejected, the Court having been of opinion that the signature was not at the "foot or end" of the will Spinks now renewed the motion for probate, as the will was clearly valid under the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 26, and since the rejection of the motion for probate did not amount to a decree against the paper, which might still be propounded and pronounced a valid instrument.

Sir JOHN DODSON.—The original motion might, I think, in this case have been granted. The will, however, under the circumstances stated by counsel, comes within the provisions of the late Act introduced by Lord St. Leonard's, and I shall decree probate of it.

BAKER v. STEVENS.

Practice—Judgment entered on irregular Parliamentary appearance—Setting aside.

A judgment entered up on a Parliamentary appearance, where an appearance has been regularly entered by the defendant, is irregular, and will be set aside, but such irregularity may be waived by defendant's delay and acquiescence.

Where, however, the judgment has thus gone by default for an untaxed bill of costs, the Court will order those costs to be taxed, and allow plaintiff to issue execution for the taxed costs only.

Martley, Q.C. on behalf of defendant, moved to set aside the parliamentary appearance, and all subsequent proceedings. In this case the defendant's attorney had entered an appearance in the office in the regular manner, and had only learned by accident that a judgment had been entered up against his client on a parliamentary appearance. This parliamentary appearance is, therefore, clearly irregular, and that, as well as the declaration and judgment, must be set aside.

Edward Johnstone, contrà.—This was an oversight of plaintiff's attorney. These proceedings are merely irregular, and not void; they may, therefore, be cured by defendant's conduct and acquiescence. The defendant here did not come in as on first discovering this irregularity. There has been a correspondence between plaintiff and defendant about this very judgment, and an attempt on defendant's part to enter into some arrangement and get time.

Martley, Q.C. replied.

MOORE, J.—I must refuse this motion with costs. —The defendant did not come in as soon as he discovered this irregular judgment and ask relief. He seeks to make terms and get time for the payment of this money, and when he cannot succeed, he comes here to ask to set aside this judgment, which he has not hitherto complained of. However, as this judgment has been recovered for an untaxed bill of costs, I shall order that the costs be taxed within a fortnight, when plaintiff may issue execution for the amount of the costs so taxed.

Personal representative—Lodgment of assets in bank—Trust.

Where an administratrix lodged money in a bank, with the intent of preserving it for the benefit of her children:

Held, that a trust was fastened upon it for the benefit of the children, and that she could not recover the possession of the money.

The rule in this case stated that Owen Quinn, of Newry, died intestate, leaving three infant children. The testator, at the time of his death, was possessed of a sum of 182*l.* 16s. 9d. Shortly after his death, the defendant and the plaintiff, by the advice of a solicitor whom they consulted, lodged the money in a bank, in the names of themselves and of a third party, and this was done with the full concurrence of the plaintiff, who was the wife of the intestate, for the purpose of securing the money for the benefit of the three children. The plaintiff subsequently took out administration to her husband, and in that character required the respondents to join in a receipt to the bank for the purpose of withdrawing the money. This being refused, on the ground that the money would be misspent, and that there was a trust created for the children, this bill was brought to compel the signature of the receipt.

Johns for the minors.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—In this case I have no difficulty as to the destination of the money. It is admitted the chief purpose for which the money is required is for the maintenance of the children of the plaintiff. There is no allegation that it is required for the purpose of administration, nor is it alleged that there are any debts; I am of opinion that, independently of the lodgment at the bank in the names of the defendants and of Mrs. Quinn, she is a trustee for her children. Mrs. Quinn has dispossessed herself of her legal title, and if any of these children had filed a bill for the purpose, the money should be brought into court. The defendants acted quite correctly in urging her, the defendant, to settle the money for the benefit of the children. In pursuance of the suggestion of the solicitors, whom the parties consulted, they deposited the money in the bank in the name of the lady and of two other persons; under these circumstances I have no doubt but that the money was lodged in trust for the children; if this had been her own money, she could by a similar proceeding have fastened a trust upon it for the benefit of her children. I have no difficulty in saying that the money was deposited upon trust, and must be brought into court and invested, the interest to be paid to the defendant from time to time as long as the children are to be maintained, with power to all parties to apply.

Winding-up Acts—Liability of a contributory—Jurisdiction—Upfill's case.

The House of Lords, sitting to hear appeals, is a court of justice; and it is inherent in the nature of every court of justice to correct any error into which it may have fallen.

A person who had been a provisional committeeman, who had had shares allotted to him, who had accepted these shares and paid the deposits thereon:

Held, not to be liable to contribute anything towards the expenses of the quasi company, beyond the amount of the deposit he had already paid, on the ground that no action at law would lie against such a person by the managing committee of such quasi company for contribution towards the moneys expended by them in such concern.

On these appeals being called on, on the first of the days above mentioned, a preliminary objection was taken to their being heard, on the ground that the House of Lords had not jurisdiction to hear them in the absence of the party who had obtained the order of the Court of Chancery directing the winding up of the association, but it was replied by the Lord Chancellor, with the assent of the other peers, that it might be assumed the House had jurisdiction, and therefore directed two points to be argued; the first as to whether an association similar to the present came within the scope of the several Winding-up Acts; and, secondly, as to the extent of liability which a contributory had incurred by accepting shares allotted to him and paying the deposit thereon.

The present report relates to the second question. The one as to the construction put by the judges on the Winding-up Acts, we shall give in a subsequent number.

In the year 1845 a company was provisionally registered pursuant to the statute 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, intituled, "An Act for the Registration, Incorporation, and Regulation of Joint Stock Companies," by the name and style of "The Direct Birmingham, Oxford, Reading, and Brighton Railway Company," but it was necessary that an Act of Parliament should be obtained to authorise its formation, and to carry into effect its objects. The capital of the proposed company was to be 2,000,000*l.* divided into 80,000 shares of 25*l.* each. Upon the allotment of each share it was proposed that a deposit of 2*l.* 12s. 6d. should be paid. A prospectus, registered 25th September, 1845, was printed, published, and circulated among the public by the promoters of the company, containing the names of divers persons (and amongst others that of the respondent), as constituting the provisional committee of the company. On the 8th October, 1845, a meeting of gentlemen was held at the office of the company, in Moorgate-street, at which a provisional committee and a committee of management were appointed, and resolutions passed to the following effect—viz. that the prospectus issued as that of the provisional committee, then read, should be approved and adopted, and that until an Act of Parliament should be obtained the affairs of the company should be under the control of the managing directors, to whom power was given to allot the shares, and to apply the funds of the company in payment of all the expenses incurred in its formation and in the preparation of the plans and sections to be submitted to Parliament. The respondent was not present at the meeting of the 8th October, 1845, and had no notice whatever thereof. On or about the 14th October, 1845, the respondent received from Mr. Rayner, the secretary of the proposed company, a circular letter, dated the 10th October, informing him that 100 shares had been appropriated to each member of the provisional committee. On the 14th October, 1845, the respondent wrote to the secretary a letter in reply to the circular, stating that he was willing to take the 100 shares placed at his disposal as a member of the provisional committee. On or about the 18th of October, 1845, the secretary sent to the respondent the letter of allotment. The respondent paid the sum of 262*l.* 10s. as the deposit on 100 shares allotted to him by the letter of allotment; no part of that sum has been returned to the respondent, nor has he paid any further sum on account of the company. Of the 80,000 of which the company was to consist, only 67,630 were even allotted, the deposits were paid on 4,295 only, no Act of Parliament was ever applied for to invest the company with the powers necessary to accomplish its object, and the undertaking was wholly abandoned. The several persons who were appointed the managing committee accepted and took upon themselves the office and duties thereof, and expenses to a large amount were incurred by them in and about the formation of the company; the respondent never directly authorised the incurring of any such expenses, nor was he ever present at any meeting of the company, nor did he in any manner whatever become a party to any contract under which any of such expenses were incurred. On the 21st of December, 1849, an order was made by his Honour the late Vice-Chancellor of England for the dissolution and winding-up of the company, under the provisions of the Joint-stock Companies Winding-up Acts, 1848 and 1849; and the matter was referred to Master Brougham, who appointed Mr. Hutton official manager of the company; and Mr. Bright was afterwards declared to be a contributory, as from the 14th of October, when he united in his own person the characters of provisional assignee and allottee, to the 30th of November. On the 13th of June, 1851, the Master ordered a call of 10*l.* per share upon each of the contributories, in order to pay the expenses of the company. Mr. Bright, on the 3rd of July, 1851, moved the Court of Chancery against the call, but Vice-Chancellor Lord Cranworth did not think fit to make any order thereon, and gave judgment to that effect on the same day, for the purpose of enabling the parties to come at once by appeal to this house. Mr. Bright appealed against that order —first, because he contended that previously to the passing of the Joint-stock Companies' Winding-up Acts he was not liable at law or in equity to pay any part of the expenses of the company; and secondly, because the Joint-stock Companies' Winding-up Acts have not the effect of making any contributory to the company liable for any part of the expenses incurred on its behalf for which he was not previously liable. Mr. Hutton, the official manager, also appealed against the order so far as it restricted Mr. Bright's liability within a given time—namely, from the date of his acceptance of shares (he being at the time a provisional committeeman) to the date at which the affairs of the company were ordered to be wound up.

C. Purton Cooper, Q.C. (with whom was Morris), for Mr. Bright, contended that but for the authority of Upfill's case (2 House of Lords, 674) no legal liability could be fixed on Mr. Bright. That case declared that when a man united in his own person the character of provisional committeeman and allottee of shares, he became liable. The Winding-up Acts and the Company's Registration Act, however, had not expressly made him liable as a contributory, and there was no principle of common law creating any such liability. In such a case each claim ought to be the subject of separate discussion, and no rule could be laid down as embracing every case, for every case must depend on the particular contract in it. Here was no such contract, and if a rule was to be applied, it was impossible to fix any limits to its application.

Bethell, Q.C. (with whom was Roxburgh), for the official manager, contended that it was necessary to lay down a general rule, and that no better rule than that which had been stated in Upfill's case could be adopted. If there was to be any liability, then the question was, whether that liability was to be individual and positive, or was to be calculated upon the ratio of the number of shares taken by the individual to the number of shares in the concern. The Master's decision was the right one. Every one person who formed part of an association like this must be taken to have given authority to the managing committee to do what was necessary to constitute the company. They were one and all joint contributors; and when they had done that which distinctly shewed (as being provisional committeemen and accepting shares did), that they were associated to form a company, they must be taken to be liable to contribute to the expenses of doing what they desired.

Cooper, in reply.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said that he proposed to state the facts of the case with regard to a supposed individual, whom he would call A. and then to put this question to the judges,—"Do the facts above stated afford sufficient evidence at law to warrant (in an action against A.) a verdict that A. is liable to contribute to expenses incurred beyond the amount of his deposit?"

The judges requested to retire in order to consider it.

In about an hour the judges returned, and

Mr. Baron PARKE delivered their opinion. Having stated the facts of the case, he said it was the unanimous opinion of the judges who had heard the argument that, but for the decision of this House in Upfill's case, the evidence stated in the question would not have warranted the verdict in respect of claims for work done as an engineer, or in the endeavour to obtain an Act of Parliament for the association. The judges considered that Upfill's case had decided two points. The first related to the nature of the evidence to be given before a jury as conclusive proof of a claim under the circumstances described; the other was a question of fact, that, under the particular circumstances there set forth, Upfill had given authority to incur the expenses. On the former the judges considered the authority of the decision as binding upon them, being, as it was, a decision of this House, and so they answered the question now put to them in the affirmative; but they desired to add that, except for the authority of that decision, they should all have been of a contrary opinion.

The judgment of the House was moved by the Lord Chancellor in the following words:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—My lords, in this case, in which you have just heard the opinion of the learned judges, a question of great importance remains to be decided. It is, whether, under the facts stated, Mr. Bright was, or was not, liable to pay as a contributory: he paid his deposit. With regard to that, no question was asked of the judges. The question was as to further liability. He was a provisional committeeman, and he had had shares allotted to him, and those shares he accepted and paid a deposit upon, but he did no further act. Now, I understand, my lords, the judges to be of opinion that, independently of Upfill's case, there was no liability arising out of those facts which would have made Mr. Bright liable to a creditor for business managed, carried on, or ordered by the managing committee for the completion of the undertaking, until it became a regular company. My lords, Upfill's case may be considered, as the Judges have considered it, as a mixed case of law and fact; therefore it may not be so difficult for your lordships to deal with it as it otherwise might be. At the same time I should venture to state to your lordships as my opinion, that although you are bound by your own decisions, as much as any Court would be bound, so that you could not reverse your own decision in a particular case, yet you are not bound by any rule of law which you could lay down, if, upon a subsequent occasion you find reason to differ from that rule; that is, like every court of justice, and I regard this as a court of justice, it is inherent in the nature of every court of justice, that it should have liberty to correct any error, into which it may have fallen. In regard to the point decided in Upfill's case, I must state to your lordships, in the presence of the learned judge, that I believe there is scarcely one judge before whom this question has originally come (and there is no Court and hardly any judge before whom this question has not from time to time come), which judge has not, and which Court has not, differed from itself in regard to the points decided. There was so much of novelty in the establishment of this provisional committee; there was so little of law to direct the opinions of lawyers upon it; and there was such a leaning in favour of a quasi partnership and an implied responsibility, that I am sure your lordships will not be surprised, if in Upfill's case, as in many others I could quote, there may have been a departure from that which is now considered to be the settled rule. I believe the general opinion now is, that the answer which has been given by the learned judges is that which your lordships will follow, that, considering their opinion to be that Mr. Bright in this case would not be liable to an action, your lordships would follow that rule, and leaving Upfill's case, as depending upon a matter both of fact and law, just where you found it, you will decide this case upon the questions submitted to the learned judges, and upon that opinion give your judgment. I should therefore propose to your lordships, without going further into detail, after the opinion delivered, that your lordships should dismiss the appeal of the official manager, requiring Bright to pay a larger sum than he has been hitherto charged with, and reverse the order of the Court below, which holds him to be liable to contribute to that call of 10*l*. The consequence of reversing the one and dismissing the other would be, that Mr. Bright would be held from this time not to be liable to any contribution in this company, beyond the deposit which he actually paid.

Lord BROUGHAM.—When I advised your lordships in Upfill's case, I had the concurrence of a very high authority, the late noble and learned Lord Cottenham, who not only went entirely with me in the advice that I tendered to your lordships, and which you were pleased to accept in that case, but went a great deal further, as I stated at the time, that I gave the judgment in Upfill's case. I either read or had in my hand a letter from Lord Cottenham on the subject, in which he certainly went a good deal further than I was disposed to go, in admitting the liability of a party in similar circumstances. I therefore felt no hesitation whatever in the conclusion which I arrived at myself in Upfill's case, and which I advised your lordships to adopt. Whether I should have altered that opinion now had I considered the question open, it would indeed be superfluous at present for me to say. The learned judges to whom the question has been submitted have given a unanimous and, I believe I may say an unhesitating opinion, that this question, which they say is partly a question of law and partly of fact, but which, in my opinion, is a great deal more a question of fact than it is a question of law—they have given their opinion upon that, to the extent that the evidence of a man being a provisional committeeman, and his having shares allotted to him by his own consent—indeed, at his request—would not be sufficient to warrant a verdict in an action of law brought against him for money expended by the managing committee in that concern. The learned judges have given this opinion. It is not for me to say whether I agree with them or not. It would be superfluous in me to say I agree with them, it would be unbecoming in me to say that I differ from them; it is enough for me to say that I entirely approve of the course recommended, under the circumstances, by my noble and learned friend on the woolsack, namely, the affirmance of one appeal, and the reversal of the other.

Lord CAMPBELL.—My lords, I rejoice very much that this matter of the liabilities of contributories is now put upon what, I think, is a right footing. I never could understand why it was considered a pure question of law, why provisional committeemen or allottees of shares, persons who stood in both capacities, were to be liable as contributories or not. The law does not know what the meaning of a provisional committeeman is. Yet we have had these liabilities talked of as if they were as well known to the law as "tenants for life" or "tenants in tail." I consider this as a matter of contract. A person can only become liable as a contributory in respect of the contract he has entered into, or in respect of a liability which he has incurred by taking a particular character. The question of contract will depend upon the facts of the case, not merely on his being a provisional committeeman, and then it will only be a question of law. Whether there is evidence to submit to the jury to consider whether a contract has been proved, is matter of fact, and to be decided as matter of fact. Now I say that I entirely concur with the opinion delivered by her Majesty's judges, and I think that in this case the evidence is not sufficient to fix the liability of Bright, and that if it had been laid before a jury, the judge ought to have nonsuited. A difficulty arises here from Upfill's case; and, if I considered that that was expressly in point, I must say, with the most sincere respect for the opinion of my noble and learned friend on the woolsack, I should hesitate in advising your lordships to decide against it. Because, according to the impression upon my mind, a decision of this High Court, in point of law, is conclusive upon the House as well as upon all inferior tribunals. I consider it the constitutional mode in which the law is declared, and that after such a judgment has been pronounced it can only be altered by an Act of the Legislature. My humble opinion is, that this House cannot decide a thing as law to-day, and decide differently the same thing as law to-morrow; because that would leave the inferior tribunals in uncertainty, and the rights of the Queen's subjects in a state of uncertainty. And after there has been a solemn judgment of this house, laying down any position as law. I apprehend that that is binding upon the rights and liabilities of the Queen's subjects, until it is altered by an Act of Commons, Lords, and the Sovereign on the Throne. That is my present impression. I state, that with great deference after a different opinion has been expressed by my noble and learned friend, I do not think that I am precluded from concurring in the motion that has been made in this case; because I do not consider Upfill's case as laying down any abstract point of law. It was an appeal from a Court of Equity. Your lordships sat as a Court of Equity to decide it. You took into view the facts and the law, and I consider what was laid down by my noble and learned friend, with the concurrence of that illustrious judge, Lord Cottenham, when he talked of the liability of the committee man, that was stating his opinion upon fact and not his opinion upon an abstract point of law. I do not think that Upfill's case prevents me from concurring in the motion of my noble and learned friend, and therefore, in that motion I entirely concur.

Lord CRANWORTH.—The question now before your lordships is, in fact, an appeal from an order made by myself. But I believe, as I stated in the course of the argument, that although the order was made by myself, it was made rather by consent and at the suggestion of, or rather at the instance of, the learned counsel, that I should affirm simply what the Master had done in order that the question might be brought by way of appeal to your lordship's house. I did so, but I believe upon that occasion, certainly if not upon that, upon a great many similar occasions in cases which were argued before me when Vice-Chancellor, I expressed my very strong doubt whether Upfill's case could have been rightly considered, or rather, rightly interpreted by the profession; or if so interpreted, whether it was a decision which could be acted upon. Because what was thought was, that Upfill's case had decided, as matter of law, that persons under certain circumstances were liable in point of fact to certain claims that were made upon them. Now it did not appear to me that it was possible that that could have been the intention of the house; that this house could have intended to decide that a combination of circumstances rendered a person liable in point of fact; it was, however, so interpreted, and having been so interpreted, I acted upon it. I rejoice that the matter has been brought before the House, because I cannot help thinking that the opinion that has now been delivered unanimously by the judges, in so very clear and distinct terms, will go far to settle doubts that have created enormous expense and anxiety beyond measure in the winding up of these several abortive companies. I concur with my noble and learned friend, I do not think that we need treat this case as necessarily at variance with Upfill's case, because Upfill's case was a mixed decision of law and fact. I confess that, treating it as a question of fact, the conclusion to which your lordships arrived was not, I believe, that to which I should have arrived, if I had then had the honour of a seat in your lordships' House. That was not so. I was certainly not a member of the House, and the decision came to was in a case which was an appeal both from law and fact. Your lordships decided that Upfill was properly put upon the list of contributories. I confess I think that that was an erroneous decision in point of fact. But treating it either in the one way or the other, the opinion now delivered by the judges seems to me to set us free to do that which is just between these parties. They are of opinion distinctly that but for that decision there was nothing here that could leave it for a jury to say whether Mr. Bright was or was not responsible. If he was not responsible, if the matter had been brought before a jury, he was clearly not responsible here. I think it necessary to advert to one of the arguments addressed from the Bar, namely, that although not responsible at law, he might be in equity. I know of no such possible distinction—he was liable, if at all, by virtue of a contract. If there was a contract, he was liable at law—if there was no contract he was not liable at law or in equity. The decision of the judges leads clearly to the inference that he was not liable at law, therefore if he was not liable at law, the result will be, as my noble and learned friend on the woolsack has moved, that one appeal would be dismissed, namely, that which sought to render him liable to a greater extent than he was liable below. The other appeal, on the other hand, of the party that complained of an order that was made making him liable, will be reversed, and the order reversed.

The appeal of the official manager dismissed.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S COURT.

(Before Lord ST. LEONARDS, L.C.)

Reported by C. H. KEENE, Esq. of Lincoln's-inn, Barrister-at-Law.

May 8, 25, and 31, and June 1.

Re NORTH OF ENGLAND BANKING COMPANY, ex parte HOLME.

Winding up—Joint stock company—Contributory—Transferror of shares—False accounts.

Under a joint-stock company's deed of settlement a transferror of shares was from the date of transfer to be released from any subsequent liability, but he was to remain liable for the proportion of the losses sustained by the company up to the date of the transfer; such losses were to be ascertained from the accounts of the company, which were to be exhibited to the shareholders at the half-yearly meetings, and the balance sheets were to be binding and conclusive on all the shareholders. H. a holder of shares in the company, transferred them to A. in January 1847. From the balance-sheets of the accounts up to the close of the years 1845 and 1846, it appeared that considerable profits had accrued to the company during those years. In the month of March 1847, the bank suspended payment, and the company was subsequently ordered to be wound up. The balance-sheets did not contain correct statements of the affairs of the company, and by an affidavit of the principal clerk who prepared such balance-sheets, it appeared that instead of profits, losses had actually accrued to the company.

The Master refused to put H. on the list as a contributory in respect of losses up to the date of transfer:

Held, on appeal by the official manager (affirming the decision of the Vice-Chancellor), that H. was rightly excluded.

This was an appeal motion by the official manager of the company, seeking to reverse a decision of the late Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce, and to place the name of Mr. Holme on the list of contributories to the losses of the company in respect of certain shares which were formerly held by that gentleman, but which he had since transferred.

The facts of this case were reported at length on the original hearing. (17 Law T. Rep. 14.) They, as also the particular clauses in the deed of settlement, which have reference to the transfer of shares, and the transferror's consequent liability, are referred to in the Lord Chancellor's judgment.

Bethell, Bacon, and J. V. Prior, for the appellant, contended that the words of the 26th clause clearly made the holder of shares liable for all losses up to the time of his transfer as surety for the transferee in the event of his inability to pay. It was admitted that serious losses had been incurred previously to the date of the transfer, and the only question was, whether the fraudulent representations of the directors was a protection or not. Mr. Holme relied on the statement of the accounts as they appeared in the balance-sheets; but the evidence of Mr. Hedley, the principal clerk, proved that these balance-sheets were inaccurate, and that they did not represent the true state of the company's affairs at the time they were issued. They contended also, that the directors were the agents of the shareholders, and that Mr. Holme, as well as the other persons interested in the company, joined in concealing the true state of the affairs from the public; of what the true state was they had ample opportunities of ascertaining, and it was not possible for Mr. Holme to take any benefits as arising from the accounts as set forth in the balance-sheets in the false statements of which he had acquiesced—those balance-sheets could not affect the mutuality of contract which existed between Mr. Holme and the other partners, or divest him of his liability to contribute to the losses up to the period when he ceased to be a holder.

R. Palmer, Willcock, and Bates supported the order of the Court below, and urged that a loss must be actually proved to have existed at the time of the transfer in order to justify the interference of the Court. As far as the evidence went the very reverse was the fact, as, by the balance-sheets, which were the only source from which the amount of profit and loss could be ascertained, there was, in every instance, a visible amount of profit. In order to prove the liability of Mr. Holme, it was necessary to shew the particular time that the bad debts of the company became losses. So long as any part of the nominal capital of the company remained unpaid there could be no actual losses, because until the capital was exhausted there could be no losses within the meaning of the 26th section, for losses meant liability to pay beyond the capital. The particular time at which the liability accrued could not be ascertained; on bills being dishonoured, they were from time to time renewed, until they became useless, and it was not until they could be renewed no longer that the shareholders found out the exact position of the affairs of the company. On the faith of the accounts, as they appeared in the balance-sheets, many of the shareholders had parted with their interest before they had incurred any liability. From 1835 to 1846 upwards of 1,200 transfers had been made, and was it possible to measure the extent of loss which was to be borne by each of those transferring parties?

JUDGMENT.

Tuesday, June 1.—The LORD CHANCELLOR.—This is the case of a joint stock company, and the question is, whether a person who has transferred his shares upwards of three years before the stopping of the company can now, on its winding up, be put upon the list as a contributory according to the Act of Parliament. In all these concerns, in which, of course, there are a great many floating balances and open accounts—or even if the concern is of a different nature, where there are any speculations — it is scarcely possible from time to time at any given moment to ascertain what the actual loss is, and therefore, generally speaking, when a man comes in as a purchaser of an interest in any of these concerns, he takes it just as he finds it, he takes it with a loss whatever it may be, and with whatever benefit may hereafter turn out; otherwise if a man who was selling a share with losses up to the time were to be liable, you would (unless you had some provision to meet that exact case) have, in every case, to take an account of what the actual extent of loss was at the time that particular individual sold. This, after the event, would be almost impossible. In this case there have been between 1,200 and 1,300 transfers. If the contention at the Bar on the part of the appellant is right, there must be on every one of these transfers an account taken to ascertain what was the amount of loss. There have been losses almost from the very commencement of the company at the particular time each individual making the transfer sold his shares. It would be a thing almost impossible to take such an account. I think this is quite clear, that on a question of this nature you cannot say the loss was incurred, as was attempted to be argued when the debt was incurred, that is, when the loan or advance was made. It is impossible to say that, although in the result the debt proves a desperate one: that is no reason why it should be considered as a loss at the time that particular debt was contracted. Then the question is, what is the exact moment? This company went on in a way that was sure to lead to ruin, having mere securities upon paper, and when they found that the debtor could not pay, they renewed their bills: well, those bills were useless, except for a fictitious credit, but that was the course they pursued. It is impossible for any man to say when the particular loss in many of these transactions did accrue, because that loss, as a mere matter of fact, would depend upon the particular period at which each debtor was insolvent, and that would lead to an inquiry that no man living could carry out. That is obviated in most cases by the circumstance, that, having regard to the impossibility of ascertaining anything about the real state of the concern, a man buys his share just as it stands, and then no question arises as to future calls. If the capital has not been all called up, he may have the benefit, or he may come into the concern at the time that it is absolutely insolvent; for that there is no help. But this deed has a particular provision, that the man selling shall be absolved from future liability, but that he shall be still liable for losses already incurred. Now that introduces the question which is now before me. After giving certain directions authorising transfers, clause 26 declares that whenever any share is transferred, the man who makes the transfer shall be "relieved from all subsequent claims, demands, and obligations in respect of the same shares, and from all future observance and performance of the covenants," and so on in the deed of settlement. If it had stopped there those future liabilities would have extended to all prior obligations then existing, and ascertained insolvent transactions, because if there were bills running, and the men were insolvent, there would have been engagements actually entered into. But then come the words "Provided nevertheless, that nothing in this article contained shall extend or be construed to extend to relieve the previous holder of shares so forfeited or transferred as aforesaid from his proportion of the losses (if any) sustained by the company up to the period of his ceasing to be such holder." Now if the ascertainment of those losses is provided for by the deed of settlement, then that clause may be a sensible one, because in that case the party buying would know the state of the concern; the party selling would know to what he was still liable; and the company would have, what is contended the true construction, the continuing liability of the outgoing partner in respect of the losses referred to; and it is contended on both sides, upon which I give no opinion, that the purchaser is liable to the whole extent of the liability of any partner, that is, as well to future as to past transactions, and that this clause only deems the transferror, that is, the seller of the shares, liable to past losses, as a surety only for the purchaser of the shares. Now I have been very much pressed in argument what the meaning of this expression is: "The losses (if any) sustained by the company up to the period of his ceasing to be such holder." It was argued very strongly and very well, that that could not apply to anything, except what was a loss beyond the whole capital, and whilst any portion of the capital remained uncalled up, there could be no loss within the meaning of that proviso, for that the loss which had enured at any given moment before the capital was called up, affected the purchaser, and no doubt every one knows it affects the market value of the property. The state of the concern may not be accurately known. The shares fluctuate, and why? Because the concern is considered either to be going down or going up; the shares, therefore, fluctuate, and accordingly, become either reduced in price, or they become advanced to a premium. I do not think it necessary to decide that question. I am not now called upon to decide it: it is one of great difficulty: but the question which now calls for decision is, whether there was any ascertained loss within this clause for which Mr. Holme was still liable? Now that, I think, depends upon the true construction of this deed. The case of Ex parte Hawthorn, which was quoted for the guidance of the Court, has no bearing upon this case; that case turned entirely upon the party going out being still liable to creditors under the General Acts. "Three years had not elapsed, he was therefore clearly liable in respect of past losses to creditors, and consequently he was properly placed as a contributory on the list under the Winding-up Acts." That case did not decide to what extent he was liable, or for what he was liable, but merely that he was a contributory, and was liable as such; I think that case was rightly decided, but I do not think it has any bearing upon this. This deed provides first, that the directors shall keep proper books of account, and that they shall enter in those books "fair, explicit, and true entries of all receipts, payments, transactions, and dealings, by or on behalf of the company, and of all profits, gains, and losses arising therefrom, and also an account of all dealings," and so on; "and shall make, or cause to be made out, a full, true, and explicit statement and balance-sheet, exhibiting the debts and credits of the company, and the amount and nature of the capital and property thereof, and the then fair value of the same, estimated by the directors as nearly as may be, and to the best of their judgment, and the amount of the company's negociable securities then in circulation, and the profits and losses of the company, and all other matters and things requisite for fully, truly, and explicitly manifesting the state of the affairs of the company." Now this clause admits of no doubt: there is no necessity to strain the words to give to them their natural interpretation; nothing can be better framed, and nothing can be more plain; they are to keep a true account of their transactions, both of gains and losses arising from carrying on the concern, and they are to exhibit them and to estimate their actual value. If the directors had done their duty in this respect, no question could have arisen, because under section 26, the liability continues for past losses to the person transferring; that is beyond all question: the deed says so, and nobody can mistake it. But the deed also says the loss shall be shewn upon the face of the account, and if the directors had done their duty, which they entirely neglected, it would then have appeared what the actual losses were, and no difficulty would have arisen. Now in another section, which embodies the section which I have just read, there is this further direction, "At every half-yearly general meeting the directors shall exhibit to the shareholders assembled such a balance-sheet as they are required to prepare by the 69th article." There is no doubt that this is cumulative; besides giving such a balance-sheet as is directed by the 69th article, they are directed to do this; to furnish such a statement of the probable amount of the losses to be apprehended from the subsisting accounts and engagements of or with the company, and generally of the state and progress of the affairs of the company up to the 30th day of June and the 31st day of December, immediately preceding such meeting as the directors shall deem expedient for the interest of the company to be made public. Therefore there is an additional duty here thrown on them, and it is a duty which is discretionary. These sections taken together are imperative. The directors were to make out accounts shewing the actual loss, and those accounts were to contain a true statement of the value of the concern: by this section, which although it comes before the other, refers to the later one, into which it is embodied, the directors are to make such a statement of the probable losses, and of the state of the concern, as they may deem necessary and proper to be publicly known. Well, that was really a precaution. The directors were not only to state the thing as it actually existed, but to state what the probable effect of pending transactions might be on the concern—they were to have such a discretion as would not throw on the public unnecessarily a statement of probabilities which might never come to pass. Then come these words, which I believe were not read on either side. "And every such balance-sheet shall be binding and conclusive on all the shareholders, their executors, administrators, and assigns, unless some error shall be discovered therein respectively before the next half-yearly general meeting, and in that case such error only shall be rectified." By this clause, therefore, I consider the balance-sheet, as rendered by the directors, on whom the duties devolved, was actually binding on all the partners in this concern, unless errors were produced. Now the partners entering into this concern certainly chose to have as little power over it as it was possible for men to have, and they have chosen implicitly to trust in their directors, for by the 16th section it is expressly provided, "that no shareholder, not being a director or an auditor, his executors," and so on—the largest words to include every one claiming under him, that none of them "shall be entitled or allowed under any pretence whatsoever, to inspect or have in equity a discovery of all or any of the books, accounts, documents, or writings, of the company, except such as may be produced for his inspection at any meeting of the company, and except the deed of settlement." So that except what was produced at the general meeting, no shareholder had, by the express terms of the deed of partnership, the power to call for, nor could he inspect the documents. The shareholders therefore must take the accounts just as they find them Now it is said, that in point of fact Mr. Holme knew, and that the shareholders generally knew, that these accounts, which I should call fraudulent accounts—fraudulent in the sense of being made up contrary to the truth were made to represent profits with the capital continuing, when, in point of fact, the profits were none, the losses heavily outweighed them by several hundred thousand pounds, and the accounts were, in the view I take of such matters, what I should term fraudulent accounts, and it is said the partners were aware of it. I think that tells against the party who makes use of that argument, because if all the partners were aware that those were not true accounts, but chose to go on deceiving themselves and the public, they cannot afterwards say that those accounts are not afterwards to be binding between themselves in transactions which have been founded on those accounts. now it is sworn, and not denied, that during the whole time this company was carried on, in no one instance has any transferror of shares been called upon to contribute for past losses, although those losses had been to an enormous amount; nor upon the occasion of any one transfer —and no transfer took place without the consent of the directors—was an account taken to ascertain what the actual losses were, therefore all the partners chose to deal with the accounts as they were furnished, and dealing with those accounts they were necessarily bound by them as between themselves. There are some clauses of great particularity in this deed, particularly clause 15, which makes the share of a shareholder "liable to any debt which he owes to the partnership,"—the result of dealings between himself and the partnership—but there is an express proviso "that such charge or lien upon the share of shareholder shall be wholly discharged upon the transfer thereof by him, with the consent in that behalf prescribed in the 22nd article" in this deed, so that after he transferred his interest that liability was given up by the company in favour of the purchaser. Now it is material to consider how the transfers were to be carried into effect; in the first place, the company guarded, as they generally do, against any shareholder escaping from the company by making a transfer while any calls remained unpaid, and therefore by clause 21, it is provided "That no shareholder shall be allowed to vote at any meeting of the company, or to exercise any other right or privilege under or by virtue of the deed of settlement, until the amount of every call which shall have been made in respect of his shares, together with interest thereon as aforesaid, shall have been fully paid and satisfied." Then comes the 22nd clause; and that clause is of very great importance in this respect. It directs what I do not remember ever to have seen before—"That once in every half-year the directors shall set a value upon the shares, and such value shall for the purposes of these presents be deemed the true and actual value thereof for the time being." Now if it stopped there no man could sell a share until a value had been put upon it by the directors, and that value was declared by the deed to be "the true and actual value thereof for the time being." How can it therefore be said that if it fixes a value of 3*l*. on the shares in question that that was not the actual value for the time being? Now "actual value" there must mean actual value with reference to the actual state of the concern. I think we may take it for granted that nobody knew it properly but the directors; they had the means of knowledge; it was their duty to put a value on it. They must have put the value according to what they considered to be the actual state of the concern. For one very good reason, to which I shall presently allude, the directors were bound to purchase at that value, and therefore in the execution of their duty, what they ought to have done would have been fairly to value them, and at the price they valued them they were bound to purchase, and the value put on the shares must be with reference to the whole state of the concern at the time the sale was effected. Then it goes on, "that it shall be lawful for the shareholders, with the consent of the directors, to sell;" and then comes the clause that "for the purpose of obtaining such consent the holder of the shares proposed to be transferred shall give notice to the directors," and so on of the proposed purchase. Then there is a proviso "that before any shares shall be sold the same shall be first offered to the directors, on behalf of the company, at the lowest price the holder thereof shall agree to take for the same; provided also, in case the directors shall refuse their consent to any transfer of shares, they shall, on the request of the holder thereof, be obliged to purchase the same out of the funds, and on behalf of the company, at the value thereof for the time being set upon them as aforesaid." The directors are therefore to value, and unless they consent to a sale, purchase at the value which they themselves fix. There can be no transfer, therefore, without the consent of the directors, or they themselves become the purchasers at the value. Suppose they had become the purchasers at the value in this case, and that must be supposed in every case, because they would have them forced upon them if they had not consented to the sale; can anybody say that any obligation remained then in that state of the account of the company? The purchase would have been then by the directors, the directors representing the company. The directors made out the balance-sheets, could the purchasers, having set a value on those shares on the 1st of January, and bought the shares at that value under the compulsory power of this deed, turn round on the seller and say, "We call upon you now to make good losses to the amount of 100,000*l*. which had accrued at that time, but which we never mentioned to you before?" Of course they could not, and if they could not it is clear by a very easy course of reasoning, that an indifferent purchaser could not, because an indifferent purchaser stands only in the place in which the directors would have stood if they had purchased. Then comes the clause which I said was here, that "no shares shall be transferred after the time appointed for payment of any instalment called for by the directors until the amount of such instalment in respect of the same shares, with interest as aforesaid, shall have been paid." The object of that being to allow no man to escape until he had paid up all the existing obligations. Then they have the whole power of regulating the transfer of shares, and there are other clauses to which I think I need not call attention. Then the real question upon the whole of this deed is, whether this gentleman is liable upon the accounts which have been made out, and which in no one instance shew any loss which has not been provided for; speaking of the early one as well as the later ones, no one account shews any loss upon the face of the accounts which were made out by the directors, and produced at the general meetings, and acted upon, and approved of, and received by those meetings. No one account shews any loss, and therefore I am to inquire where I am to find any evidence of the loss to which this gentleman is liable when he sold his shares under section 26? I can nowhere find any such loss. There are accounts sworn to no doubt by Mr. Hedley. It was Mr. Hedley who kept those accounts. What he says may undoubtedly be perfectly true. I do not disbelieve him. I do not discredit him, but his evidence has no weight; from time to time he assisted most improperly in preparing those accounts, and at those meetings, no doubt, there was a great body of persons for whom he was bound to act faithfully and honestly, but he now comes forward and tells the Court that from the first moment he knew the growing insolvent state of this company, and always assisted in concealing it, but that act of concealment leads to the impossibility of charging this gentleman, because at this moment there is not a particle of evidence before me to shew that there was at the time when Mr. Holme sold these shares any loss sustained upon which I can possibly act. Of course, if there was a loss, the deed would undoubtedly bind him to that loss—that is clear, and admits of no doubt; but I can find no such loss, and I am of opinion that under the provisions of the deed the losses for which it was intended an outgoing shareholder should continue liable, were intended to appear on the balance-sheet so as to lead to no possible difficulty. If the directions of the deed had been observed, there would have been no difficulty; I should then only have had to open the particular account at the time of the transfer; I should have seen what the amount of the loss was, and have bound this gentleman by the amount of that loss. I look into the balance-sheets, and see a prosperous state of affairs on the very face of them,—no loss, but gains and profits divided; therefore I am clearly of opinion that this gentleman is not liable in respect of any loss, for none is shewn to me; and looking at the dealings, I am of opinion none can be shewn; and therefore, without any reservation of any sort or kind, I think he is not a contributory, and I dismiss this appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed, with costs.

Practice—Administration—One decree in two suits—Claim—Carriage of decree—Priority—Tenant for life—Residuary legatee.

The tenant for life of the real and personal estate of a testator, who was also executrix of the will, with a power of appointing part of the personal estate, filed a claim for the administration of the real and personal estate. The residuary devisee and legatee subsequently filed a claim for administration of both estates. The first claim was first set down for hearing, but both having come on to be heard together:

Held, that one decree should be made in both suits; but that the residuary devisee and legatee should have the carriage of it, as having the greatest interest, though the tenant for life had priority both in filing the claim and setting it down for hearing.

In this case two claims were filed for the administration of the real and personal estate of one Timothy Barrow. The first was filed by the executrix of the testator's will, who was also tenant for life of the real and personal estate, and had a power thereby given to her of appointing 300*l*. part of the personal estate. Subsequently the residuary devisee and legatee entitled in remainder to the real and personal estate under the will filed a second claim for the administration thereof. The claim by the executrix was not only the first filed, but was also the first set down for hearing; but both claims came on to be heard together. It was admitted that one decree ought to be made in both suits; but the plaintiffs each claimed the carriage and prosecution of it—the executrix as having priority both in filing and setting down, and the remainder-man as having a greater interest in the due administration of the estate, and keeping down unnecessary costs and expenses.

H. C. Jones, for the plaintiff in the first suit and the defendant in the second.

Field, for the defendant in the first and the plaintiff in the second suit.

The Master of the Rolls declined, however, to give any particular direction with reference to the carriage of the decree, stating that it must be drawn up according to the ordinary practice; and he directed the registrar to ascertain what the practice was.

The parties having gone into the registrar's office, the registrar, acting upon the authority of Miller v. Powell, decided by Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce, on the 14th July, 1849, but not reported, drew up the minutes staying proceedings in the first suit, and making the order for administration in the second; but he gave the plaintiff in the first suit her costs thereof to be paid out of the estate.

Wednesday, May 26.—H. C. Jones brought the matter before the Court again, and contended that the minutes, as drawn up by the registrar, were not authorised by the decree or directions of the Court at the hearing.

The Master of the Rolls, after some conversation with the registrar, observed:—Mr. Bedwell's account of what took place at the hearing agrees exactly with what you, Mr. Jones, have just stated to me, and I now fully remember the circumstances of the case. I declined to give any direction as to who should have the carriage or prosecution of the decree, and I desired Mr. Bedwell to inquire and ascertain the practice in the registrar's office. Mr. Bedwell informs me that the practice now is, that where there are two suits for administration, one by the executor, and the other by the residuary legatee, and the two suits came on to be heard together, the proceedings in the suit by the executor are stayed; and he has shewn me a decree made by Lord Justice Knight Bruce when Vice-Chancellor, in which that course was taken. I think it right to follow this practice, which seems to me a wholesome one, inasmuch as the residuary legatee has the greatest interest in duly carrying on the suit in such a manner as to cause no unnecessary expense. I think, therefore, that the minutes ought to stand as drawn up by Mr. Bedwell.

Will, construction of—Gift to parties and other children.

A testatrix gave "all the residue of her property to be equally divided between her nieces J. D. and M. D. and confirmed the legacies thereinbefore mentioned to be given to J. D. and M. D. and their children without comprehending their husbands, unless the said J. D. and M. D. or either of them should die without issue:"

Held, that this amounted to a gift to J. D. and M. D. equally for life for their separate use, and after their deaths, to their children; and if no children, then to J. D. and M. D. absolutely.

This was a claim raising a question on the construction of a will. The testatrix, by her will, after making certain bequests, &c. thus proceeded:—"I give all the rest, residue, and remainder of my property, of what nature or kind soever, to be equally divided between my nieces, Jane Dawson and Mary Dawson, and I confirm my said legacies hereinbefore mentioned, to be given to my nieces, Jane Dawson and Mary Dawson, and their children, without comprehending their husbands, unless they, my said last-mentioned nieces, or either of them should die without issue." The question was as to the proper construction of this will.

C. P. Cooper and Nichols contended that the nieces took absolute interests. They cited Wild's case, 6 Co. 16; Stokes v. Heron, 12 Cl. and Fin. 161; and 2 Dr. and War. 107.

Southgate, contrà, was not heard.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—I am of opinion that the only way to give effect to these words is to give the residue between the nieces equally, for their separate use for life, and after their deaths, to their children; and if no children, then to the nieces absolutely.

In this case a fund had been paid into court under the Trustee Indemnity Act, and a petition was now presented by the tenant for life for an order for payment. The question was, whether the costs of this petition ought to be paid out of the corpus or the income of the fund.

C. P. Phillips, in support of the petition, cited Re Ross, 15 Jur. 211.

W. W. Cooper, for the remainderman, contended that the costs of a proceeding for the sole benefit of the tenant for life, ought to be paid out of his share in the fund.

IN LUNACY.

Ex parte RICHARDS, re RICHARDS.

Inquisition of lunacy—Leave to attend at.

An infant, interested under a settlement, executed by the alleged lunatic ten years back, allowed to attend by counsel at the inquisition, the object of which was to carry back the lunacy for thirty-five years, an undertaking being given to abide by any order the Court might make as to the costs so far as they might be incurred by attendance at the inquisition.

This was a petition presented by an infant by his next friend praying for leave to attend the execution of a commission de lunatico inquirendo, alleging a lunacy of thirty-five years, issued against his cousin. The infant, it appeared, was, subject to the life interest of the alleged lunatic, entitled to a life interest in certain property under a settlement executed by the alleged lunatic on the 14th January, 1842.

The petition alleged that the petitioner had no notice of the issuing of the commission under which the inquisition was to be held, on the 1st of April then instant, except accidentally three days before making this application; and that the petitioner found that great injury would result to him, unless he were allowed to be represented at that inquisition.

Sir W. Page Wood and Locock Webb, for the petitioner, cited Re Nesbitt, 2 Ph. 245, where a similar order to the one now asked for was made.

Karslake, in opposition to the petition, contended that as according to the very terms of the petition the leave to attend, was asked for, not for the benefit of the lunatic, but because the petitioner feared "that great injury would result to the petitioner if the execution of the commission was not attended on his behalf," the application ought to be refused. (Ex parte Snook, re Watts, 1 Ph. 512.)

Lord Justice KNIGHT BRUCE.—Speaking for myself alone I should have been disposed, without the authorities cited in support of the petition, to grant the prayer. My impression is, that as counsel, I have been engaged to attend the execution of an inquisition for the sole purpose of seeing that the lunacy was not carried back beyond a certain date, my clients being no further interested than in that fact. Here the purpose for which the attendance is sought is plain. If the petitioners will undertake to abide by any order the Court may make as to costs—not only their own costs, but the costs so far as they may be increased by the attendance at the inquisition,—I am disposed to give leave to the infant, by his next friend, to attend. I do not say I should not have acted upon the reasons given in the petition, but the fact that the lunacy is said to have existed for thirty-five years, is quite sufficient for me.

Lord Justice Lord CRANWORTH concurred; whereupon the undertaking being given, the order was made accordingly.

Will—Construction—"Respective"—"Respectively."

A fund was bequeathed to trustees in trust for the testatrix's two daughters for their lives, and at the decease of them respectively upon trusts for their children, and after the decease and failure of issue of her said daughters, the trustees were to continue the payments to any husband her daughters might respectively leave for their lives, and after the decease of the respective husbands the fund to be in trust for A. and B. absolutely. One of the daughters died without leaving any husband or issue in the lifetime of the other:

Held, that her share went over to A. and B. in equal shares, and did not survive to the other daughter for her life.

The testatrix by her will, dated in 1815, devised and bequeathed her real and personal estate to her two nephews upon trust for sale and absolute conversion into money, and for investment in their names in stock; and she directed that her trustees should pay the dividends to her two daughters for their lives, and at the decease of them respectively in trust to apply the dividends of the share of the one so dying to the maintenance of her children. And she declared that if either of her said two daughters should attempt to sell they should forfeit all claim on her estate, and in that case she gave to her two nephews all the dividends which the daughters would have been entitled to. The will then proceeded thus: "And after the decease and failure of issue of my said daughters, my said trustees shall continue the payments to any husband that my said daughters may respectively have during the life of such husband, and after the decease of the respective husbands of my said daughters, I give and bequeath the whole of the said trust estate, and all interest therein, to my said nephews, for their absolute use and benefit."

The testatrix died soon after the date of her will. One of the daughters, Mrs. Wheeler, died without leaving any husband or issue, but having been married. One of the nephews was then dead. The surviving daughter, Mrs. Phillips, claimed the whole fund. On the other hand, the surviving nephew and the personal representative of the other claimed a transfer of the capital of Mrs. Wheeler's share. Upon this the executrix of the testatrix filed the claim, to have the question decided.

For the surviving daughter, Mrs. Phillips, it was argued that she was entitled to the whole absolutely, or, if not so, at least for life, for that the words "respective" and "respectively" were not sufficient, used as they were within the will, to prevent cross remainders, whether for life or in tail. (Malcolm v. Martin, 3 B.C.C. 49; Green v. Stephens, 12 Ves. 72; 17 Ibid. 419; Ashley v. Ashley, 6 Sim. 358; Pierce v. Edmeads, 2 Y. & C 246; and 2 Jarman on Wills, 165, and the cases there collected.)

Greene, Shapter, Terrell, Bevir, and Karslake, for the several parties.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—This claim does not seek to deal with, or in any manner affect, the real estate of the testatrix. On the construction of the will I am inclined to think that the nephews take on the death of Mrs. Wheeler, according to the intention which appears on the whole will. It is impossible to argue from the cases which have been cited, because here the fund appears to be divided into two parts, dealt with by the same clause. Thus, on the decease of one of the daughters, leaving issue, the testatrix directs the dividends of the share of the one so dying to be applied towards the maintenance of her children,—implying that the testatrix intended two separate interests in her two daughters; and then the will proceeds to direct that on the children of the daughter so dying attaining twenty-one, the fund in which their parent was interested shall be divided among them. There, again, the testatrix is evidently dealing with two funds. And so in case either daughter should attempt to sell, although the words are not quite so forcible. The forfeiture would only operate upon the interest of the daughter attempting to sell. Then comes the clause upon which the present claim is filed, namely, that the trustees, after the death or failure of issue, "are to continue the payments to any husband that my said daughters may respectively leave during the life of such husband, and after the decease of the respective husbands of my said daughters, I give and bequeath the whole of the said trust estate, and all interest therein, to my said nephews, for their absolute use and benefit." There, again, the testatrix contemplates a distinct gift on the decease of either daughter without issue, but leaving a husband; to that husband of the interest of that fund which the daughter took. There certainly does occur the word "whole" in the gift to the nephews; but it is clear what this means, because it is given at the decease of the respective husbands, and this ulterior bequest to the nephews clearly shews the intent, which, indeed, I think is the only meaning consistent with every clause of the will. Therefore, I must now declare that the two nephews, or their personal representatives, are entitled from the decease of Mrs. Wheeler, each to one-half of the moiety in which she had a life interest.

AMOTT v. HOLDEN.

Annuity bond—Action against surety—Statute of Limitations—Bankruptcy.

In an action by the grantee of an annuity upon a joint and several bond, conditioned for the payment of the annuity, but executed by the defendant only as a surety for the grantor, the bankruptcy and certificate of the defendant are no bar, although the bond was forfeited before the bankruptcy, and although, by the terms of the bond, the principal and surety were co-equally bound:

So held by Lord Campbell, C.J. and Erle, J.: Wightman, J. dissentiente.

In an action on a money bond alleging a single breach, if the Statute of Limitations is pleaded, and issue taken thereon, the plaintiff is entitled to a verdict on that issue if he proves a breach within the twenty years, although there may have been an earlier breach beyond the twenty years.

This was an action of debt on a money bond, conditioned for the payment of an annuity. The declaration alleged a single breach by non-payment. The defendant pleaded,—1st, The Statute of Limitations; 2nd, The bankruptcy of the defendant after forfeiture of the bond.

The condition of the bond recited an agreement between the plaintiff and one Mather, for the sale of an annuity of 20*l.* to be paid yearly during the joint and several lives of the plaintiff, his wife, and the survivor of them; that Mather had requested Holden, the defendant, to join in the above bond for securing the payment of the annuity, and that he had at such request joined in the bond as surety for Mather, but the condition itself was for payment by Mather and the defendant co-equally; not that in case of default by Mather, then the defendant should pay. It was proved at the trial, that the instalments of the annuity were never paid on the day; but for several years they were paid after the day. Several breaches had consequently occurred more than twenty years before the action was brought, and also before the bankruptcy of defendant; but the plaintiff also proved breaches by non-payment of several instalments within the twenty years. A verdict having been found for the plaintiff on both pleas, a rule was obtained to set aside that verdict and enter it for the defendant.

Thursday, May 6.—M. Chambers, Bramwell, and T. Chitty shewed cause. 1. As to the plea of bankruptcy, although it may be perfectly true that as soon as one instalment of the annuity was in arrear the penalty was forfeited, yet the cases establish that the penalty was not a debt proveable under the bankruptcy of the surety. The value of the debt cannot be estimated, because it depends upon the solvency or insolvency of the grantor of the annuity, the principal. (The Overseers of St. Martin's v. Warren, 1 B. & Ald. 491; Vanderheyden v. De Paiba, 3 Wils. 270; Thompson v. Thompson, 2 Bing. N.C. 168.) In The Skinners' Company v. Jones, 3 Bing. N.C. 481, the form of the bond was different. 2. As to the Statute of Limitations, it is enough that the plaintiffs shew a breach within twenty years. The obligee is not bound to sue upon the first breach; he may waive the first, and sue upon any subsequent breach, and then the cause of action arises when that breach is committed. (Sanders v. Coward, 13 M. & W. 18; Tuckey v. Hawkins, 4 C. B. 655; Blair v. Ormond, 20 L. J. 444, Q. B.)

Knowles, Henderson, and Milward contrà. 1. As to the bankruptcy, if the debt cannot be valued, it cannot be proved; but that is not so in this case; because here, as far as the plaintiff is concerned the defendant and the grantor stand precisely in the same position. The grantee had a right of action against both or either at his option; and the Commissioners therefore could not deprive him of his right to prove against either. In Thompson v. Thompson, the case was different. They also referred to Thompson v. Whatley, 20 L. J. 86, Q.B.; Perkins v. Kempsland, 2 Bl. 1106; Addison v. Gibson 10 Q. B. 106; Caldwell v. Becke, 2 Ex. Rep. 318; Wyllie v. Wilkes, 2 Doug. 519; Winter v. Mouseley, 2 B. & Ald. 802; Re Willis, 4 Ex. 530; Arch. Bankruptcy, 106; Ex parte Thompson, 2 Deac. & Chit. 126; and stat. 6 Geo. 4, c. 16, ss. 54, 55.

2. With regard to the Statute of Limitations, as this record is framed, the plea means that the bond was forfeited more than twenty years ago; and that is shewn by evidence of a breach committed at that time. If the plaintiff meant to rely upon some subsequent breach waiving the earlier breaches, he should have new assigned.

Lord CAMPBELL, C.J.—With regard to the plea of the Statute of Limitations we entertain no doubt. Mr. Knowles is obliged to admit, after the cases of Sanders v. Coward, and Blair v. Ormond, that where a bond is conditioned for the performance of acts to be done successively in a series of years, though there may be a breach and forfeiture by not doing the first act, still a new cause of action arises with each fresh omission to do the act required at the proper time; and if it were not so, the principal might be discharged from paying the annuity, though he had gone on paying for twenty years, each time one day too late; but reliance is placed on the form of this record; and it appears to me that upon the issue taken upon the plea to this declaration, the plaintiff has entitled himself to a verdict by proving a breach of the condition within twenty years. That must be presumed to be the cause of action stated in the declaration; and I think that no new assignment was necessary. Tuckey v. Hawkins is in point. Upon the other point we will take time to consider.

WIGHTMAN and ERLE, JJ. concurred in the opinion that the rule ought to be discharged so far as it applied to the plea of the Statute of Limitations. As to the plea of bankruptcy,

Cur. adv. vult.

JUDGMENT.

ERLE, J.—This is a question raised whether the grantee of an annuity secured by a joint and several bond of the grantor, and the surety can, under the bankruptcy of the surety, prove for the value of the annuity. In 1821 an annuity of 20*l.* payable half-yearly, was granted by Mather and the defendant Holden. They joined in a bond, which recited this grant and the defendant's consent to become surety, and was conditioned to be void, if either the grantor or the surety should pay at the proper days the annuity. The annuity was paid by Mather half-yearly, but never at the proper day, so that the bond had become forfeited before the bankruptcy. Holden had become bankrupt in 1836. It has not been stated, nor is it material to inquire, whether there was any arrear at the time of the bankruptcy, because the annuity was afterwards paid from time to time by Mather down to 1848. The present action is brought for the arrears left unpaid after that time The law is clear that the liability of a surety for the grantor of an annuity is not a debt payable upon a contingency, provable under the bankruptcy of the surety by virtue of sec. 164 of the Bankruptcy Law Consolidation Act, the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106; Ex parte Thompson, 2 Deac. & Ch. 126, and Thompson v. Thompson, 2 Bing. New Cas. 168, are express on the point, the impossibility of calculating the solvency of grantors of annuities being there relied upon. I have also referred to the elaborate and able judgments of Mr. Merivale, Mr. Fonblanque, and Mr. Holroyd, upon the question of proving upon an indemnity bond, in Ex parte Marshall, 1 Montague & Ayrton, p. 2, in support of the same view. It is there shewn that the power of proving for future contingent debts is created by the statute, and has been gradually introduced by successive provisions, which are now embodied in sections from 173 to 177 of the Consolidation Act. If the whole of those are taken together it would appear that certain debts payable on a contingency are specifically provided for, in the sections preceding the general enactment, and among those so specifically provided for there are annuities in respect of which, upon the bankruptcy of the grantor, proof must be made in the required form before resort can be had to the surety, whose liability is deferred; and as no provision is made for proof on the bankruptcy of the surety, the grantor being solvent, it may be presumed both from the silence of the Legislature and the nature of the liability that no power for such proof was intended to be given. But though this might be true where a surety contracted expressly to pay on default of the grantor, the defendant contended that the form of the present bond created a simultaneous instead of a successive liability, and that the grantee might have treated either obligor at his option as the grantor, and so might have proved against the defendant Holden as grantor of the annuity. I am, however, of opinion that this ground cannot be maintained. The bond shews that the annuity had been already granted, and the relation of grantor and grantee created. The bond is an instrument beyond the grant, with the additional security of the defendant; the two are jointly bound, but the one is described as grantor and the other as surety. Whatever might be the effect of the present form of the bond in respect of pleading, in bankruptcy, where the true substance is ascertained without pleading, the present form creates the same liability as the form in Thompson's case. If the grantor pays, the surety is free, if he makes default the surety is liable. It would have been inconvenient to allow a plaintiff to prove against a surety in 1836, the entire value of his annuity, which has been paid by the principal for twelve years after, and may be paid in full by him; and the plaintiff could not allege or prove that the defendant had granted the annuity. Where the defendant was surety for a grantor, and had joined the grantor in a bond to secure an annuity on which judgment had been entered up before default, and afterwards the grantor made default, it was held that the grantee could not prove for the annuity under the bankruptcy of the surety, and that though there was a judgment to secure the annuity, the plaintiff was not the annuity creditor of the surety. (Johnson v. Compton, 4 Sim. Rep. 37.) So also where a grantor and a surety covenanted jointly and severally for the payment of an annuity, it was held that the grantee could not prove under the bankruptcy of the surety, the absolute covenant in one part of the deed was controlled by the other part shewing that the covenantee stood in the relation of surety. (See Ex parte Marks, 3 M. & Ayr. 521.) The defendants further contended that as the bond had been forfeited by omission to pay at the day, that the penalty had become a legal debt, and so the plaintiff might have proved for the whole of the annuity with the amount of the bond, according to Ex parte Thistlewood, 19 Ves. 245; Perkins v. Kempland, 2 Black, 1106; and other cases cited in Ex parte Marks, 3 M. & Ayr. 530. But, as there observed by the chief judge, those were all cases of bankrupt grantors, and there is no instance to be found of a grantee having ever been admitted to prove the value of the annuity against the estate of the bankrupt surety, even upon a bond forfeited. I would further observe, that it would be contrary to the system of bankruptcy to allow proof for a penalty in all cases of bonds for the payment of premiums, when there has been a nominal breach, but nothing due, and to make the assignee liable indefinitely to a claim for a dividend, in case of a future breach. It would have been unjust to the creditors of Holden, in 1836, to have retained the dividend for the penalty of the bond on which a dividend from time to time might have been paid, proportionate to the instalment or part of the instalment, left in arrear by Mather, and inconvenient to the assignees to require the accounts to be unsettled during the lives for which the annuity was granted. I am therefore of opinion that the plaintiff could not have proved for the penalty of the bond under the bankruptcy of Holden, so that the defence under the plea of bankruptcy fails and judgment ought to be for the plaintiff.

WIGHTMAN, J.—I feel very great distrust of the opinion I have formed on this case, in consequence of its differing from those of my Lord Chief Justice and my brother Erle; but such as it is I have not formed it without deliberate consideration. This was an action of debt on a joint and several bond by the defendant and one Mather. The declaration stated the obligatory part of the bond merely, and did not shew the condition; the defendant pleaded the plea of bankruptcy which was found for him, and the question is whether, at the time of the bankruptcy, the obligor of the bond could be admitted a creditor, and had a provable debt under the commission as an annuity creditor under the 54th section of the 6 Geo. 4, c. 16, the statute in force at the time of the bankruptcy? The condition of the bond recited that Mather had agreed with the plaintiff for the sale to him of an annuity of 20*l.* for the joint and several lives of himself and wife and the survivor, for the sum of 120*l.* and that Mather had requested the defendant to join in and execute the bond which he had consented to do for the securing the due and regular payment of the annuity; and that Amott the grantee had paid 150*l.* the purchase-money, to Mather. It was then conditioned, for the bond being void, if either Mather or the defendant paid the annuity half-yearly upon the specified days. It does not appear that there was any other grant of or security for the annuity than the bond, which appears to have been executed in the year 1828. The defendant became bankrupt in 1836, and at that time the bond had been forfeited by the omission to pay the annuity exactly at the specific days; but there were very trifling or no arrears, and it appeared that the annuity was paid by Mather down to the year 1848, and no attempt was made by the plaintiff to be admitted to prove under the commission against the defendant as an annuity creditor under the Act 6 Geo. 4, c. 16, s. 54. It was contended for the plaintiff, that the defendant's bankruptcy and certificate was no bar to the action, as he could not have come in as an annuity creditor under the fiat, the defendant being surety merely, and he cited several cases in which it had been decided that the contingent liability of the surety could not be the subject of proof under a commission against him. This was hardly disputed; but it was alleged, on the other side, that the defendant was not the surety but the principal, that his liability was not collateral but direct, and the grantee of the annuity had precisely the same legal rights against him upon the bond as he had against Mather. In the cases of Thompson v. Thompson, 2 Bing. New Cases, 168; Ex parte Thompson, 2 Deacon and Chitty, 126; and Johnson v. Compton, 4 Simons, 37, the bankrupts were all sureties in the strict legal sense, and their liability only collateral by the terms of the instrument by which they were bound, upon default made by their principals, and not until then; and it was said that those cases were upon that ground clearly distinguishable from the present. The question then is whether the defendant is in contemplation of law a principal or a surety? If he is a principal the grantee of the annuity might have come in as an annuity creditor under the commission against his estate, as he might if the commission had been against Mather, when it is admitted he might prove. There is no other grant of an annuity or security for it than the bond itself. The recital shews that Mather had agreed to grant the annuity and had received the consideration money, and had requested Holden to join him in a bond for securing the payment of the annuity, which he accordingly does in terms which make him as much a principal, and bind him as directly as they do Mather. If the bond be the instrument by which the annuity is granted, and there is none other, Holden is as much the grantor as Mather, and as directly liable to pay, although the original agreement for the grant was by Mather, and he only had the benefit of the consideration. The bond is both by Mather and Holden, conditioned to be void if either of them should pay the annuity within the specified time. In Guy v. Newson, 2 C. & M. 140, it was held a covenant by a defendant with two others, to pay, or that some or one of them would pay a sum of money to the plaintiffs by instalments on future dates was held to be an absolute, and not a collateral covenant by the defendant, though it appeared the defendant had no interest in the consideration, and had entered into the covenant for the benefit of the other covenantors, and to secure the payment of the money owing by them, and that the discharge of the defendant under the Insolvent Debtors Act (7 Geo. 4, c. 57, s. 46, was a bar to the action, which it would not have been had he been a surety only. In Baxter v Nicholls, 4 Taunt. 90, the bankruptcy and certificate of one of several joint covenantors for payment of an annuity, was held to discharge him, though it appeared that he was only surety, the covenant for payment being absolute and not collateral. The authority of this case is recognised by the Court in Brown v. Lee, 6 B. & C. 689, and Ex parte Marks, 3 M. & Ayr. 521; but is distinguished from this. In the present case the defendant was in one sense a surety, as he entered into the bond at the request of Mather, jointly with him, to secure the payment of the annuity which Mather had agreed to grant, and for which he alone received the purchase-money; but in law the defendant bound himself absolutely and not collaterally, and as between him and the grantee he is, as it seems to me, on the authority of the case to which I have referred, the principal as much as the grantor of the annuity. One of the leading cases upon the point, and in many of its circumstances nearly resembling the present, is that of Ex parte Marks and Another, 3 M. & Ayr. 521. It appeared in that case, that by an indenture reciting that one Courdet had agreed with one Galloway for the sale to him of an annuity of 100*l.* it was witnessed, that in consideration of 1,000*l.* paid to Courdet, he, Courdet, granted an annuity of 100*l.* a year to Galloway, and Courdet, and Colnaghi jointly, and severally covenanted with Galloway that they, or one of them, should pay the annuity at the time specified in the deed. If the deed had stopped there, and there had been no qualification of the covenant, the case on the bankruptcy of Colnaghi, would have exactly resembled the present, and it would appear from the judgment of the Court, that the grantee of the annuity would have been entitled to prove as an annuity creditor under the 54th section of the 6 Geo. 4 against the estate of Colnaghi, though the latter only entered into the covenant to secure the payment without any benefit to himself. The deed, however, contains a proviso at the end of the covenant, that in case Courdet made default in the payment of the annuity, Galloway would give a notice in writing, and demand payment of Colnaghi twenty-one days before adopting any measure to compel performance of the covenant by Colnaghi. The Court held, that this proviso controlled and limited the covenant, and made it a conditional and collateral instead of an absolute covenant, and in effect a covenant of a surety only, and upon that ground decided that the grantee of the annuity was not entitled to prove under the commission against Colnaghi. The case of Ex parte Marshall, 1 Mont. & Ayr. does not appear to me to apply to the present case; the bond in that case was not forfeited at the time of the bankruptcy, and therefore could not be proved. I have been wholly unable to discover any case in which such an obligation as that into which the present defendant entered has been held to make him a surety, his engagement being that of a principal, binding himself to the performance of the acts by himself and another, and covenanting at a request from that other to secure a payment originally contracted for by him. In all the cases cited for the plaintiff, the bankrupt was a surety in the legal sense, and collaterally liable only; and those cases, therefore, are clearly distinguishable from this. In point of law, Holden, the defendant, was directly liable to the other; and if the grantee would have been an annuity creditor, by virtue of the bond having been forfeited, under a commision against Mather, I think he would have been entitled to come in as an annuity creditor under the commission against Holden, and the certificate would bar. I may remark, that if Mather had become a bankrupt, Holden would not have been entitled to any benefit given to sureties for the payment of annuities by the 56th section of the Act of Parliament, which applies only to persons who may be collateral sureties for the payment of annuities, which Holden is not, as he is not collaterally but directly liable; he is not, therefore, a surety within the meaning of the Act. Other points were taken on the argument of the case, particularly one as to the Statute of Limitations, which the Court entertain no doubt upon, and they decided against the defendant on these points at the time they were taken, and it is unnecessary now to advert to them. In my opinion, therefore, the rule for a new trial should be made absolute.

Lord CAMPBELL, C.J.—In this case I entirely agree with the opinion expressed by my brother Erle. Relying upon the reasons and authorities which he has adduced, I have very little to add. The defendant admits that the value of this annuity could not have been proved under the bankruptcy, unless by virtue of some special enactment of the Legislature, and that the 54th section of the 6 Geo. 4, c. 16, is the only one of which he can avail himself. It is further admitted that this does not apply to the case of a surety, and that if the defendant is to be regarded as a surety for Mather, he is still liable. With the most sincere deference for the opinion of my brother Wightman, I have not been able to bring myself to entertain any doubt that in this transaction the defendant is to be regarded as a surety. A surety is a person who makes himself liable for the debt of another, and he is still a surety though he may be called on for payment at the same moment as the principal. If he has no interest in the transaction, except as surety, and this is fully known to the creditor who accepts him in the relation of surety, his contract with the creditor must be attended with all the incidents of suretyship. Here it is stated in the condition of the bond that Mather was the sole grantor of the annuity; that Mather had received 150*l*. for his own benefit, and that the defendant had been requested to join in the bond, which he had consented to do, for securing the due and regular payment of the annuity. I confess I do not see how he was less a surety by the form of the condition which says the bond shall be void if either Mather or the defendant paid the annuity half-yearly at the time specified. What would have been the effect if the language had been if either the grantor or his surety pay the annuity? After the recital that Mather was the grantor and Holden the surety, these two names indicated grantor and surety, and there is nothing to turn the surety into principal. If upon the face of a written document two appear as joint debtors, and there is nothing to indicate that one of them is only surety, the rights of the creditor cannot be affected by any part of the transaction between them to which he is a stranger. But the obligee of this bond knew well that the defendant was only surety, and that he had received no part of the consideration for the grant of the annuity that he was compelled to pay, although at the very day when the annuity became payable there would have been an action against Mather, as the principal debtor, to recover the amount. If, upon the defendant's bankruptcy, Mather being still solvent, the grantee of the annuity had offered to prove, would not the truth of the transaction have been taken from the recitals in the conditions of the bond, and as against Holden, the creditor, had proof been admitted, could it in justice have been for more than the contingency of Mather becoming insolvent during the lives of the obligee and his wife? In the course of the argument the counsel for the defendant were asked, but could not tell, on what principle the proof was to take place, or what was to be done as to the amount, which depends upon the time at which the contingency of the insolvency of the grantor, or the value of the annuity for the joint lives of the grantees, was to be estimated, or what remedy the assignees of the surety would have had against Mather, the solvent principal. It cannot be questioned here that as between Mather and the defendant the relation of principal and surety subsisted, and all the reasons seem to me to apply which induced the Court to hold, in Thompson v. Thompson, and various other cases, to the same effect, that however great hardship it may be upon the surety that he should remain liable after he has surrendered all his effects upon the bankruptcy, the Legislature has provided no relief for him; and it has confined the discharge of the bankrupt to debts and liabilities which may be proved, and for which a dividend may be obtained under the bankruptcy, and no machinery has yet provided for proof under the bankruptcy of a surety for a solvent principal. I regret exceedingly that the question is not upon the record, so that the defendant might have had an opportunity of taking the opinion of a Court of Error upon it; but we can only direct that the verdict on the plea of bankruptcy shall stand for the plaintiff. Having before unanimously expressed our opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to retain the verdict on the plea of the Statute of Limitations, the rule obtained by Mr. Knowles must be discharged. Rule discharged.

REG. v. JUSTICES OF MIDDLESEX.

Poor—Lunatic—Expenses of maintenance.

The expense of an Irish pauper lunatic who has no known settlement, but who, for five years previously had resided in parish C. in W. union, is cast by the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 103, s. 5, upon the union, and not the county.

This was a motion for a certiorari to remove into this Court two orders made by T. J. Arnold, esq. a magistrate of one of the police courts within the Metropolitan Police District, for the purpose of quashing the same for the insufficiency thereof.

An order was first obtained for the removal of the pauper to the Middlesex County Lunatic Asylum, at Hanwell, but that being full, he was conveyed to the Kent County Lunatic Asylum, at the charge of the common fund of the Whitechapel union.

The other material facts appeared on the face of the orders.

The first order of the magistrate directed to the guardians of the poor of the Whitechapel union, in Middlesex, and to H. E. the clerk of the peace for the said county, recited a complaint that Luke Cone, a poor person chargeable to the common fund of the Whitechapel union, was then legally confined in the Kent County Lunatic Asylum, at the cost and expense of the common fund of the said union, and that the said pauper lunatic was not legally settled in any parish in the said union, and had not acquired a settlement in any parish or place in England, and that he, the said L. C. such lunatic, was an Irishman, and while resident in the parish of Christchurch, in the W. union, became chargeable to the said parish for one day, but was afterwards made chargeable to the common fund of the Whitechapel union, by reason of his having resided for five years previously in the said parish, and was sent to the said asylum from the said W. union on the 28th day of May, 1851, and hath ever since been confined in the said asylum; and that at the time when he was so sent to the said asylum, he had resided in the parish of Christchurch for five years and upwards, and would, if not lunatic, have been exempt from removal out of the said parish, if he had been chargeable thereto, by reason of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, if such statute be applicable to the case of an Irishman residing in a parish in England, and who has not gained any English settlement. The order then proceeded: "Now therefore I, the said magistrate, upon the evidence, &c. do adjudge the premises aforesaid to be severally true, and do also adjudge the said Luke Cone to be chargeable to the said county of Middlesex," &c. By another order of the 3rd February, 1852, the treasurer of the county of Middlesex was directed to pay to the treasurer of the Whitechapel union, 2*l*. 12*s*. 6*d*. the expenses of the examination of the said lunatic, and his conveyance to the said asylum, and also 17*l*. 19*s*. 5*d*. for moneys paid by the said guardians for lodging, &c. incurred within twelve calendar months previous to the date of the order; and also to pay weekly to the treasurer of the said asylum 10*s*. 5*d*. the sum agreed to be charged.

Pashley, in support of the motion.—By the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 117, an Irish pauper chargeable to any parish may be removed to Ireland. And sec. 7 of that statute enacts that the 4 & 5 Wm. 4, c. 76, "for the amendment and better administration of the laws relating to the poor in England and Wales," and all Acts to amend and extend the same, and the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 117, shall be construed as one Act. Then the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, "An Act to amend the Laws relating to the Removal of the Poor," provides that no person shall be removed from any parish in which such person shall have resided for five years next before the application for the warrant of removal. The 10 & 11 Vict. c. 110, next provides that the expenditure incurred by any parish forming part of a union, for the relief, &c. of any person who, within one year before the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, had been in receipt of relief from any other parish, and who was exempted from removal by the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, should, so long as such person should continue to be so exempted, be charged to the common fund of such union. A question might have been raised, whether the last-mentioned provision was applicable to the case of a pauper lunatic, but that is made quite clear by the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 103, s. 3, which enacts that "the expenses of obtaining any order for the removal and maintenance of a lunatic pauper removed thereby to any asylum, and who, if not a lunatic, would have been exempt from removal by the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, shall be borne by the common fund of the union, comprising the parish wherein such pauper lunatic was resident at the time when so removed to such asylum, notwithstanding the order for the payment thereof shall have been made upon the overseers of such parish." The following authorities were then cited:—Reg. v. Wigton, 4 New Sess. Cas. 476, and Reg. v. Sutton, ibid. 684.

Bodkin shewed cause in the first instance.—The question is whether an Irish pauper is irremovable in the same way as an English pauper. The pauper in this case has no known settlement in England. The 8 & 9 Vict. c. 126, "An Act to amend the Laws for the Provision and Regulation of Lunatic Asylums for Counties and Boroughs, and for the Maintenance and Care of Pauper Lunatics in England," by sec. 59, provides "that if any pauper lunatic shall not be settled in the parish by which he shall be sent to any asylum, and it cannot be ascertained in what parish he is settled, such pauper lunatic may be adjudged chargeable to the county in which he is found." There is no allusion in the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, to those persons who have no known settlement, and it has been held that a pauper lunatic may be removed, that being an exception to the general enactment of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66. The 10 & 11 Vict. c. 110, still left untouched the case of a lunatic pauper, who had resided for five years in a parish, and whose settlement was not known. But it is said that the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 103, which was intended to release the county and to make the common fund of the union liable, includes the case of lunatic paupers. There is, however, no allusion in it to that class of persons who have no known settlement; and sec. 3 enacts that the chargeability of any person to the common fund of a union shall have the same effect, and be attended with the same consequences as the chargeability of any poor person to a parish under the statutes for the removal of pauper lunatics to asylums; so that the union may proceed under these Acts in the same way as the parish might have done.

Pashley, in reply. The construction contended for by the other side is, that the 5th section of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 103, is to be read as if the words "who has a settlement in England" were introduced into it. But there is no reason for that argument. Sec. 3 was passed for the purpose of enabling the overseers to take proceedings in the same way as the parish could have done previously. The 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, can only exempt from removal a person who has a place of settlement to which he would otherwise have been removable. An Irishman may be removed. The concluding words of sec. 5, of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 103, "notwithstanding the order of payment thereof shall have been made upon the overseers of such parish, or the parish of the settlement, or upon the treasurer or guardians of the Union in which either parish shall be comprised," have reference to expenses incurred since the 25th day of March mentioned in the beginning of the section. Cur. adv. vult.

JUDGMENT.

Friday, June 18.—Lord CAMPBELL, C.J.—In this case the question was raised whether the expense of maintaining a pauper lunatic, who had been sent from the union after five years' residence, and who is without a settlement in England, being Irish, is to be borne by the union or the county; and we are of opinion that it is cast upon the former, by the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 103, s. 5, enacting that the costs of an order for removal and the maintenance in the case of a lunatic pauper so removed shall be borne by the union. This is admitted to be the case where the lunatic pauper has a settlement; and if full effect is given to the words, they will also apply to a lunatic pauper without a settlement. In the first case, they transfer the burthen from the parish of settlement to the union, within which the five years' inhabitancy took place, upon the principle that such inhabitancy has every property of a settlement, and we see no reason why the Legislature should not have intended to make a transfer from th county to the union in the latter case, as it uses w ds wide enough so to operate as a reason for the transfer of the liability.

AUSTIN and ANOTHER v. THE MANCHESTER, SHEFFIELD, AND LINCOLNSHIRE RAILWAY COMPANY.

Effect of ticket restraining the liability of railway companies as common carriers.

Plaintiff sends horses by railway, and signs a ticket issued by the company in this form:—

"Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway, Lincolnshire Division. Ticket for horses, cattle, sheep, pigs, dogs, and live stock of every description. Date, February 22, 1849. No. 28.

3 trucks horses, at 7l. 10s.—22l. 10s. 0d.

"This ticket is issued subject to the owner's undertaking to bear all the risk of injury by conveyance and other contingencies, and the owner is required to see to the efficiency of the carriage before he allows his horses or live stock to be placed therein, the charge being for the use of the railway carriages and locomotive power only, the company will not be responsible for any alleged defects in their carriages or trucks unless complaint be made at the time of booking, or before the same leave the station, nor for any damages, however caused, to horses, cattle, or live stock of any description travelling upon their railway or in their vehicles.

'I have examined the carriages and am satisfied with their sufficiency and safety.

(Signed) Austin, { Owner, or on the owner's behalf."

During the journey the axle of one of the carriages, in consequence of the company's servants omitting to grease the wheels, breaks, and one of the horses is killed:

Held, that the special contract expressed in the words of the ticket relieved the company from all liability, even where the jury found the loss to have been occasioned by the gross negligence of their servants.

On 22nd February, 1849, the plaintiffs having booked a number of horses at the New Holland station of the defendants' railway, for conveyance to London, and paid the fare demanded, signed a ticket, as set out in the head-note. On the journey, the men sent with the horses discovered that the wheels of the carriages were smoking, and made many complaints to the servants of the company of their omitting to grease the wheels, and even attempted to grease them themselves, but were prevented from doing so. Soon after passing the Whittlesea station the wheel of the carriage in which was a valuable mare came off, and the mare's back was broken. She was afterwards put to death, and her skin sold. The case was tried at Guildhall, before Jervis, C.J. and a special jury, and a verdict was found for the plaintiffs, damages 60l.

The declaration was in case, and alleged that the defendants were the owners of a railway, and of certain carriages and trucks used by them for the conveyance of passengers and horses, &c. along their line from New Holland to Shoreditch station, for hire, and exercised and carried on the business of common carriers for hire, according to the usual and known course of business as carried on by them and others, and that it was the duty of defendants to cause due and proper care to be taken, and proper and reasonably sufficient provision to be made from time to time during the journey, in order to guard and provide against friction of the wheels and axles of the trucks and carriages, &c. and that the persons employing them had no power or control over the management of the trucks or carriages for the purpose of guarding against friction, &c. and were not permitted so to guard, &c. and that without certain reasonable and proper provisions being taken against friction, &c. the passengers, horses, &c. could not be safely carried, and that the plaintiffs, whilst the defendants were such carriers, &c. delivered to the defendants, at the New Holland station, divers horses to be carried and conveyed for hire and reward to the Shoreditch station, according to the usual and known course of business so practised and observed as aforesaid, except so far as the same was altered or qualified by the terms of a certain note or ticket, and that in and by the said note or ticket it was expressed that (ticket set out); and that the defendants received from the plaintiffs the said horses, to be carried, &c. according to the course of business then practised and observed, except as varied or qualified as aforesaid, and that although, &c. and the plaintiffs saw to the efficiency of the trucks and carriages before they left the station, yet (first breach) the defendants did not, nor would, during the said journey cause due and proper care, or proper or reasonably sufficient provision to be taken or made in order to provide against the friction of the wheels, &c. but grossly and culpably neglected and omitted so to do, by reason whereof one of the axles of, &c. and the wheel connected therewith, became heated, &c. and the carriage became dangerous and unfit for the proper carriage and conveyance of the said horses, of all which the defendants then had notice, and were requested to cause to be made proper provisions, &c. or else to convey the horses in some other carriage, &c. which the defendants refused to do; and that (2nd breach) afterwards the defendants continued to carry, &c. until, by and through the gross and culpable negligence, and grossly improper conduct of the defendants, the axletree broke and the mare was killed, &c. and that the said injury was occasioned by the gross negligence and misconduct of the defendants, and not by any insufficiency or defects existing in the said truck or carriage when the same left the station, nor by any injury or risk of injury by conveyance or other contingencies. Second count in trover.

1st Plea—Not guilty. 2nd, That the said alleged injury in the said first count mentioned was an injury occasioned by conveyance and other contingencies, within the true intent, meaning, and effect of the said note or ticket, and not by the negligence or misconduct of the defendants in that behalf. 3rd, That the said damages and injury were occasioned and caused by the insufficiency of and defects existing in the said truck or carriage at the time when the said horse, &c. were placed therein.

At the trial the jury found that the injury had been occasioned by the gross negligence of the company's servants, and returned a verdict for the plaintiffs.

Macaulay, Q.C. Rea, and West shewed cause against a rule nisi which had been obtained on a previous day by Watson, Q.C. for a new trial or arrest of judgment. There is some obligation imposed upon the company by this agreement, and part of that obligation is, that they should grease the wheels. The words "danger however caused" will not protect them from liability in consequence of gross negligence in that particular. The ticket is only a part of the contract. The duty of taking ordinary care is one which is imposed upon them as carriers, and is one which the law will import into the contract as expressed. The decided before the Carriers' Act shew that as the law then stood, the carrier could not relieve himself by notice from liability for negligence. (Garnet v. Wilson, 5 B. & Ald. 53; Smith v. Horn, Moore, 18, Q.B.; Beck v. Evan, 16 East, 247; Lyon v. Wells, 5 East, 427.) The effect of which cases fully appears from the discussion of them in Wild v. Pickford, 8 M. & W. 443; and Hinton v. Dibbin, 2 Q.B. 646. The cases in the Q.B. Shaw v. York and North Midland Railway Company, 13 Q.B. 347; and Austin v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Company, 20 L.J. 410, Q.B. were decided on the pleadings. Chippendale v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company, 21 L.J. 22, Q.B differs from this, and does not bind this Court. You cannot undertake to do a thing, and then say, but if I do not, I will not be liable. The proviso will be repugnant and inoperative. (Furnivall v. Coombes, 5 M. & G. 736.) So the company here, in agreeing to carry, agree to carry with ordinary care, and cannot say afterwards, "But if we do not carry with ordinary care, and an accident happens, we will not be liable." There is plenty for the proviso to operate upon, as pure accidents, and it must be confined to these. Story on Bailments, and 1 Smith's L.C. 102, were also cited.

Watson, Q.C. and Hawkins, in support of the rule. The question is, what is the meaning of the parties to the contract? It is a special contract, by which it is perfectly lawful for the company to stipulate that they will not be liable for any damage, even though it may have been caused by the negligence of their servants. Ninety-nine out of every hundred railway accidents arise out of the negligence of the company's servants. The number of servants is very great, and the utmost care in selecting them will not prevent some cases of negligence. It is against liability in these cases which the company in this agreement seeks to provide. And there is no hardship to the public. The railway companies will take all the care they can, for their own sakes, to prevent accidents. And it is to the probability of their doing this that parties who send goods by them trust. They undertake to provide carriages and locomotive power, and that is all. The parties must trust to their taking proper care. [CRESSWELL, J.—Do you contend that you are protected by the first or latter part of the notice?] I do not think we want the latter, but, if so, "damages, however caused," is wide enough to include everything.

Saturday, May 8.—The judgment of the Court was delivered by CRESSWELL, J.—After stating the effect of the declaration, his lordship continued: The only material plea was that of the general issue. At the trial, the jury found that due care had not been taken, and returned a verdict for the plaintiffs. We are of opinion that the rule for arrest of judgment must be made absolute. The plaintiffs, in their declaration, are obliged to aver that the horses were delivered on the usual terms, except as qualified by the contract. At one time the Courts were disposed to hold, that carriers could not limit their liability, but now their right to do so is well established. (See Story on Bailments.) The charge in the declaration is gross and culpable negligence, and if the terms of the contract were not sufficient to exempt the defendants from this, judgment could not be arrested. The epithets, however, of gross and culpable, cannot alter the character of the conduct imputed, nor exaggerate it into a misfeasance. At all events, whatever may be the nature of the conduct here charged, we think it is covered by the terms of the contract, and this appearing on the face of the declaration, no cause of action is disclosed, and consequently judgment must be arrested.

[NOTE. By this decision and that of the Court of Ex. dissentiente, Platt, B. in Carr v. The Lancashire, &c. Railway Company, 19 Law T. Rep. 124, supporting the cases in Q.B. the question as to the power of carriers to limit their liability, is settled in favour of the carriers; and the cases prior to the Carriers' Act, when, as yet, a simple notice was as binding on the public as a special agreement (that Act leaving special agreements as it found them, and merely declaring notices not to be binding), in which it was held that carriers could not, by a notice, relieve themselves from responsibility in cases of negligence, are overruled.]

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Saturday, June 12.

HORTON v. THE WESTMINSTER IMPROVEMENT COMMISSIONERS.

Judge's order for change of venue on payment of costs, whether conditional or obligatory.

Where an order is made for changing the venue on payment of costs, and other terms are included in it, it does not of necessity follow that the payment of costs is conditional to the change of venue, it may appear by the facts of the case that such payment is obligatory.

Distinguished from Pugh v. Kerr, 5 M. & W. 164.

In this case a rule had been obtained, calling on the defendants to shew cause why they should not pay to the plaintiffs certain costs in the action pursuant to an order made by Pollock, C.B. on the 18th of March last, and also the costs of this application.

It appeared that the venue in the action was originally laid in Surrey, that notice of trial was given for the Spring Assizes, the commission day being the 22nd March. On the 17th March, a summons was taken out by the defendants to change the venue, upon which an order dated the 18th was made by Pollock, C.B. in the following terms:—"Venue to be changed to Middlesex on payment of costs to be taxed; plaintiff to be at liberty to demur generally to any of the pleas, and time for inspection under former order to be extended for ten days."

This order was drawn up by the defendants and served on the 19th March, the plaintiff having threatened that if they did not do so, he would take out a summons to compel them. The costs were taxed by the plaintiff on the 25th, defendants attending the taxation under protest. The plaintiff then delivered his demurrer books with the venue Middlesex inserted in the margin, and the defendants delivered their demurrer books in the same form.

Bramwell, Q.C. (Honyman with him), now shewed cause. This was a mere conditional order, which the defendant has a right to waive the benefit of, if he do not choose to comply with the condition. In Fricker v. Eastman, 11 East, 319, a judge's order that upon payment of costs by a certain day all proceedings should be stayed, was held to be only conditional on the defendant, and that he might abandon it. They also cited Rose v. Fenn, 2 Dowl. P.C. 182; Price v. Philcox, 7 Dowl. 559; Pugh v. Kerr, 5 M. & W. 164; Field v. Sawyer, 5 C.B. 71.

Garth, in support.—If the defendants can be shewn, by their subsequent conduct, to have adopted this order, they are bound by it. In the case of Pugh v. Kerr, Parke, B. said—"What are ordinarily words of condition may be made words of contract and obligation." And further on in his judgment—

"The words used in this rule no doubt ordinarily import a condition only; but if I were satisfied that it was meant here that the venue was immediately to be changed I should have thought they were a matter of contract, and that their grammatical construction should be limited." Having regard to the facts of this case, and the circumstances under which this order was made, and the further terms introduced into it, the payment of costs must be considered as a matter of contract and obligation, and not simply conditional.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I am of opinion that the terms of this order prove it to have been absolute—which is sufficient to distinguish this case from those which have been referred to; and the proximity of the commission day for Surrey, at the time the order was made, is an additional reason in favour of this view.

PARKE, B.—I am of the same opinion. I quite agree with the principle laid down in the several cases cited by Mr. Bramwell; but in the present instance the case has arisen which I pointed out in Pugh v. Kerr, that in an order of this nature what are usually words of condition may be made words of contract and obligation; and that where it is intended that the venue should be immediately changed, they become words of contract. This, in my opinion, is the fair construction of the order now before the Court, and this rule for the payment of the costs should, therefore, be made absolute.

ALDERSON and PLATT, BB. concurred.

Rule absolute.

HICKIE and ANOTHER v. SALAMO.

County Court—Costs—9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, ss. 128, 129; 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61, s. 17.

In an action by two plaintiffs, where one of them resides within and the other beyond twenty miles of the defendant, the Superior Courts have concurrent jurisdiction with the County Courts.

In this case the plaintiffs having brought this action in the Superior Court, obtained a verdict for 8*l*. 12s. 8d.

J. Gray now moved for a rule calling on the defendant to shew cause why the plaintiff should not, notwithstanding the amount of the verdict, recover his costs. It appeared that one of the plaintiffs resided at a distance greater and the other at a distance less than twenty miles from the defendant, and the question was whether such a case came within the concurrent jurisdiction clause of the County Courts Act (9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, s. 128).

Petersdorff shewed cause in the first instance, and contended that this case was not within the 128th section, and that the onus was on the plaintiff to establish his right; the Act had taken away the apparent right to costs, and shewn the burden of establishing such right in the plaintiff by the 129th section of the Act, and, looking to the interpretation clause, it could not be said that they dwelt more than twenty miles from the defendant. As in any case they dwelt as much within as beyond that distance. He also referred to the cases in which it has been held, that when one plaintiff resides within the jurisdiction, the Court will not require security for costs.

J. Gray, contrà, cited Parry v. Davis and Ux. 1 L. M. & P. 379; Doyle v. Lawrence, 2 L. M. & P. 368. Cur. adv. vult.

JUDGMENT.

PLATT, B.—The plaintiffs having recovered in this Court a verdict for a sum recoverable in a County Court, moved for costs, on the ground that one of the plaintiffs lived at a distance greater, and the other at a distance less, than twenty miles from the defendant. On shewing cause, counsel for the defendant objected that the plaintiffs did not bring themselves within the predicament prescribed by the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, s. 128, for if they were considered as constituting one plaintiff, then, according to the interpretation clause (142), as being two plaintiffs, it could not be predicated of them that they dwelt more than a distance of twenty miles from the defendant, as in either case they dwelt as much within as beyond the distance; that this might be a casus omissus, but unless they came within the language of the 128th section, the Court have no jurisdiction to grant costs. By the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, s. 128, it is enacted that "All actions which before the passing of that Act might have been brought in one of her Majesty's Superior Courts of Record, where the plaintiff dwelt more than twenty miles from the defendant might be brought and defended in any such Superior Court at the election of the party as if this Act had not been passed." Under this Act the defendant in practice applied to the Court under the 129th section in order to deprive the plaintiff of his costs; and it was upon an affidavit stating, amongst other things, that he and the plaintiff dwelt within the prescribed distance from each other. This practice was changed by the 17th section of the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61, which deprived the plaintiff of his costs if the cause of action should be within the jurisdiction of the County Court, unless the judge who tried the cause should certify under the 12th section, or the plaintiff should, in pursuance of the 15th section of the Act, make it appear to the satisfaction of the Court in which such action was brought, or to the satisfaction of a judge at chambers on a summons, that the said action was brought for a cause of action, in which concurrent jurisdiction is given to the Superior Courts by the 128th section of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, in which case the Court in which the action is brought, or a judge at chambers, may by rule or order direct the plaintiff shall recover his costs. Under the 17th section 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61, therefore, the plaintiff was applying to obtain his costs; but surely the facts which would enable him to resist successfully the defendant's application to deprive him of his costs under the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, would, under the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61, suffice to establish his right to recover them. The cases in which that right is to attach are not changed, they are still those in which concurrent jurisdiction is given to the Superior Courts by the 128th section, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. The same state of facts, therefore, that would have entitled the plaintiff to his costs before the passing of the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61, would, providing he satisfied the Court or a judge of their existence, equally entitle him to costs now. (Parry v. Davis and Wife, 1 L. M. & P. 379.) There the affidavit on the part of the defendant omitted to state that more than one of them resided within twenty miles of the plaintiff, and Lord Cranworth, then Baron Rolfe, held, that as the 128th sec. of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, gave to the Superior Courts a concurrent jurisdiction, the plaintiff was entitled to his costs. In Doyle v. Lawrence, in the second vol. of the same reports, 368, the Court of C. B. adopted Lord Cranworth's decision, and held that the residence of one of the defendants more than twenty miles from the plaintiff made the case one of concurrent jurisdiction within the section. The same principle applies to a plurality of plaintiffs. We therefore think that as one of the plaintiffs in this case resided more than twenty miles from the defendant, the jurisdiction was concurrent, and the plaintiffs are entitled to the costs. The rule must be absolute.

Rule absolute.

THE PRUDENTIAL MUTUAL ASSURANCE COMPANY v. CURZON.

Bond—Policy of insurance—Stamp—13 & 14 Vict. c. 97, s. 14.

A bond conditioned that if A. should pay to B. 300l. in manner provided, and the interest and premiums due on certain policies of assurance effected as a collateral security, that then the bond should be void. It further contained a proviso that in case of default in payment of the interest, or omission to pay the premiums regularly, the bond should become forfeited, and the principal sum of 300l. should be forthwith recoverable:

Held (Parke, B. dissentiente), well stamped as a bond "exceeding 200l. and not exceeding 300l.

This was an action upon a bond, dated 12th October, 1849, for securing the sum of 300*l*. The condition of the bond was, that if the defendant should pay or cause to be paid to the plaintiffs the sum of 300*l*. in manner therein provided, and the interest and premiums due on certain policies of assurance effected as a collateral security, then the bond should become void; there was also a proviso that in case of default in payment of the interest, or omission to pay the premiums regularly, the bond should become forfeited, and the principal sum of 300*l*. should be forthwith recoverable. The bond was impressed with a 3*l*. stamp. The cause was tried before Parke, B. in Middlesex, on the 25th of May, when it was objected, on the part of the defendant, that the stamp was insufficient, the bond requiring a stamp for an unlimited sum, or requiring two stamps, one in respect of the principal sum thereby secured, and the other for the premiums payable on the policy. The plaintiffs were thereupon nonsuited, liberty being reserved to them to move to set aside the nonsuit, and enter a verdict for the amount sought to be recovered.

Jos. Brown having obtained a rule accordingly (May 29),

Spinks now shewed cause.—In this case the plaintiffs seek to recover a sum of 323*l*. 14s. 7d. being 300*l*. plus one year's premium; that alone is sufficient to shew that the sum secured by the bond is more than the amount covered by this stamp. [POLLOCK, C.B.—I doubt whether the premium is recoverable; the premium for the first year is paid in advance, and if the premiums are not regularly kept up, then the defendant is at once liable to be sued for the whole amount.] This is a provision introduced for the benefit of the plaintiffs, and there is an annual sum of 23*l*. 14s. 7d. payable in addition to the 300*l*. [PARKE, B.—In my view certainly this bond secures more than 300*l*. I think the bond secures the principal, the interest, and the annual premiums.] The case of Annandale v. Pattison, 9 B. & C. 919, relied on by the other side, does not apply; there there was only an implied undertaking annexed to the original liability. In the case of Dearden v. Binns, 1 Man. & Ry. 130, also cited when this rule was obtained, it does not appear what the collateral matter secured was. I rely on the language of the bond itself, which is, that it is sufficient to enable the plaintiffs to recover 223*l*. 14s. 7d. In the breach assigned it is set out that the defendant did not pay 23*l*. 14s. 7d. and on his default to pay the premium, 323*l*. 14s. 7d. become due.

Jos. Brown, in support of the rule, said, that since the trial the plaintiffs had, under the 14th section of the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 97, laid the bond before the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, by whom it had been stamped, shewing that the right amount of duty had been paid. [POLLOCK, C.B.—I do not think you can make any use of that. How do we know anything of this? How do we know even that this is the bond in question? We can only look to the record.] Then we ought to have an opportunity of pleading this puis darrein continuance. [PARKE, B.—We are only now considering whether the bond produced before me at the trial was properly stamped.] The Act says that, whether right or wrong, this stamp, by way of certificate from the commissioners, shall be binding. [PARKE, B.—That is clearly only prospective. ALDERSON, B.—The Act clearly means that when the suit is commenced before the instrument has received this additional stamp, that if it is so stamped before the trial it shall be sufficient.] Then as to the construction of the bond and the Stamp Act. This bond is substantially given to secure 300*l*. only, the policy of insurance is a mere collateral security. The words of the Act are, "bond in England and personal bond in Scotland, given as a security for the payment of any definitive and certain sum of money." "Exceeding 200*l*. and not exceeding 300*l*.—3*l*." That is precisely the present case. [PARKE, B.—The difficulty I feel is, whether the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover 300*l*. plus the interest and premiums in arrear. ALDERSON, B.—These premiums can never become debts when the policy of insurance is avoided. There is nothing due to the company but the principal sum and interest.] Just so; the policy is merely a collateral security, and the bond is therefore well stamped. Cur. adv. vult.

JUDGMENT.

ALDERSON, B.—This was a motion for entering the verdict for the plaintiffs, Parke, B. who tried the case, having at the trial nonsuited the plaintiffs, with liberty reserved to the plaintiffs to move to enter the verdict. The question arises simply on this,—whether or not there was a sufficient stamp upon a bond, the subject of the plaintiff's claim. The bond was stamped with a sufficient stamp for the amount of 300*l*. The learned judge at the trial was of opinion, and I believe at present retains his conviction, that the stamp was not sufficient, inasmuch as the bond, as he thought, secured not merely the sum of 300*l*. but an unlimited amount of premiums which were to be paid, it being a bond given for the purpose, as would appear, of securing the payment of the premiums on certain policies of insurance, besides the principal-money advanced. But the majority of the Court, the Lord Chief Baron, myself, and my brother Platt, are of opinion that the stamp is sufficient. The condition of the bond is, if the person who is bound shall well and truly pay, or cause to be paid, to the present plaintiffs the sum of 300*l*. which has been lent to him out of the funds of the association (and in order to secure the repayment of which the policies of insurance were effected as a collateral security) in certain amounts, in certain sums of 100*l*.; and if he shall pay the interest and premiums due on the policies of insurance, then the bond is to become void; but there is a proviso, if there be any default in the payment of interest, or omission to pay the premiums regularly, the bond shall become forfeited, and the 300*l*. shall be forthwith recovered. We think this is not a bond for the payment of the premiums, but only for the payment of 300*l*. the 300*l*. being demandable as soon as there is a deficiency in the payment of interest or premiums; but when it becomes forfeited by the omission to do that, all that can be recovered under it is the amount of the 300*l*. and not anything else. That is the view the majority of the Court take. It is perfectly clear the stamp is a very good stamp now, for it has passed through the Stamp Office, and has been stamped with one security stamp, they having examined into it, and seen that a 300*l*. stamp is quite sufficient. We entertain no doubt about the thing, and the verdict should be entered for the plaintiffs, the amount of the stamp being, in the judgment of the majority of the Court, quite sufficient.

PLATT, B.—We should not differ from my brother Parke, whose experience as a lawyer has great weight, without giving some reason for that differing, and for that reason it is I wish to add a few words to what has been said by my learned brother Alderson. Now the bond in question was stamped for 300*l*.

The words of the Stamp Act are these: "A bond given as security for payment of any definite sum of money." It then goes on to state the sums for which each particular stamp is to be. Well, and what is this bond? 300*l.* are borrowed, and interest is payable on that sum. The bond is to secure payment of that; but, for the purpose of having a collateral security, the condition goes on to stipulate that an insurance shall be effected with the company for that purpose, and in the event of the death of the borrower, that the company may have a fund, out of which the money is to be paid. How is that taking more than 300*l.*? Now let us consider what this is. Here is a bond for 300*l.* payable by annual instalments in three instalments. The bond is dated the 12th of October, 1849, and the three instalments by which the 300*l.* are to be repaid are, respectively, 100*l.* on the 12th of October, 1850; 100*l.* on the same day in 1851, and 100*l.* on the same day in 1852; and upon default of any one of the payments, the bond may be put in suit; upon default, also, to pay the premiums of insurance, the bond may be put in suit. Now, suppose the party was to die, the premium does not go into their pockets in addition to the interest. There is a burthen assumed by the company and which is bought by the premiums; so if the party was to die in the first year, the account would stand thus:—the interest is payable beforehand by the bond, 15*l.* are paid at the beginning, and 23*l.* 14s. 7d.; that is in the whole 38*l.* 14s. 7d.; and if the borrower was to die within a year the company would have to pay 299*l.* and secure the loss of 261*l.* That would be the result of the whole transaction: at the end of the second year they would secure a loss of 223*l.*; and at the end of the third, they would secure a loss of 185*l.* How can this be said to secure any more money than the interest? It seems that when one considers the premiums fairly and properly as being the purchase of an interest or obligation on the part of the company, which may be kept up after the loan has been repaid, you cannot consider that any additional sum is secured by the bond.

ALDERSON, B.—The premium is always paid in advance, and therefore the insurance fails if the premium is not paid: it is always for the future year, not for the past, and it is optional to keep it up.

Rule absolute.

ERROR FROM THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

TETLEY and ANOTHER v. TAYLOR.

Bankrupt—Deed of arrangement—12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, ss. 224, 225.

A deed of arrangement between a trader and his creditors, executed by six-sevenths in number and value of creditors whose debts amount to 10*l. and upwards, is not binding under the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act* (12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 224) upon creditors not parties to the deed, unless the deed provides for the distribution of the whole of the trader's estate amongst his creditors.

Drew v. Collins, 17 Law T. 158; 20 L.J. 369, Ex. affirmed.

Debt for goods sold and delivered, and on an account stated.

Second plea.—As to 43*l.* 11s. 10d. parcel, &c. that at the time of making the indenture hereinafter mentioned, the defendant was a trader liable to become bankrupt under the bankrupt laws, and was indebted to the parties of the third part to the said indenture, and to divers other persons, and was and would be unable to pay the same in full; that the defendant suspended payment, and by a certain indenture made after the passing and coming into operation of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, to wit, on, &c. (profert), and which said indenture was made between the defendant, of the first part, V. J. and P. of the second part, and the several persons whose names and seals were thereunto subscribed and set as hereinafter mentioned (being creditors of the defendant, or the authorised agents of such creditors), of the third part. After reciting, among other things, that the defendant was justly and truly indebted unto his said several creditors (parties to the said indenture of the third part) in the several sums of money set opposite to their respective names; and being unable to pay the same in full, he, the defendant, had proposed to pay unto each and every of such creditors a composition after the rate of 7s. 6d. in the pound, upon and in full satisfaction of their respective debts by three equal instalments, &c. &c. to which arrangement and proposal the said creditors, parties thereto, had consented and agreed; it was witnessed that, in consideration, &c. they, the said creditors of the defendant, executing the said indenture, did, &c. covenant, promise, and agree to and with the defendant, among other things, that they should and would accept the aforesaid composition, or sum of 7s. 6d. in the pound, in full satisfaction and discharge of the said several debts and sums of money due and owing to them by the defendant, as specified in a certain schedule to the said indenture; and also that they should, and would, at any time, or times, from and after full payment and satisfaction of the said composition, or sum of 7s. 6d. in the pound, at the request, costs, and charges of the defendant, his executors or administrators, make, do, and execute unto him, the defendant, his executors or administrators, any other act, deed, matter, or thing for the more effectually releasing him, the defendant, or his said executors or administrators, from the said debts and sums of money due and owing from the defendant to the same creditors respectively, as the said defendant, his executors, or administrators, or his or their counsel in the law should lawfully and reasonably advise or devise and require. The plea then set out the covenant not to sue, except for the composition, and the covenant by the defendant and V. J. and P. to pay the composition in the manner agreed upon. The plea then averred that the indenture was sealed by the defendant and divers, to wit, fifty of the creditors of the defendant, and was and is a deed of arrangement within the meaning of the said Act, and that the said creditors, by whom and on behalf of whom the said deed was so signed and executed as aforesaid, were more than six-sevenths, to wit, nine-tenths in number and value of the creditors of the defendant, within the meaning of the said Act, whose debts amounted to the sum of 10*l.* and upwards, accounting every creditor as a creditor in value in respect of such amount only as upon an account fairly stated, after allowing the value of mortgaged property and other such available securities or liens from the defendant, appeared to be the balance due to him, and that the said creditors by whom and on behalf of whom the said deed was so signed as aforesaid thereby assented to the said deed, and to be bound thereby. That the plaintiffs were creditors of the defendant at the time of the making of the deed in respect of the debt, in the introductory part of the plea mentioned, within the meaning of the said Act, and that the amount thereof did not accrue to the plaintiffs in respect of the said composition; that the plaintiffs had notice from the defendant of his, the defendant's, suspension of payment, and of the said deed of arrangement, and were then requested by the defendant to sign and execute the said deed; that three calendar months from such notice had expired before suit. Averment of performance of the deed by the defendant, and the parties thereto of the second part; that by reason of the premises, and by force of the statute aforesaid, the said deed (the same having been at all times from the making and entering into the same, and being still in force) became, and was, and is, as obligatory on the plaintiffs as if they had duly signed and executed the same, and by reason of the premises, the defendant before and at the time of suit became and was released and discharged from the said causes of action in the introductory part of the plea mentioned. Verification. Special demurrer to the plea.

The demurrer was argued in the Court of Q. B. in Michaelmas Term, 1851, when that Court pronounced judgment for the defendant. (21 L. J. 2, Q. B.)

Upon that judgment the plaintiffs brought a writ of error, which now came on for argument.

Willes, for the plaintiffs. The question is, whether a deed of arrangement, signed by six-sevenths of the 10*l.* creditors, which does not provide for the distribution of the whole or any part of the trader's estate among his creditors, but which simply provides for the discharge of the trader's debts upon the payment of a composition, is sufficient to bind the dissentient creditors, and all creditors under 10*l.* If the meaning of the 12th & 13th Vict. c. 106, s. 224, had been that put upon it by the Court of Q. B. it might have been expected to find some provisions in the Act for a consultation and general meeting of the creditors above 10*l.* before such an arrangement could be come to. The construction of the Court of Q. B. would enable the trader to procure the execution of such a deed by a kind of fraud, by going about among his favourable creditors first and leaving the hostile ones to the last, and it also excludes those creditors below 10*l.* from any voice in the matter. Sec. 224 provides for a case in which there is no meeting among the creditors, and yet it may be that one creditor may know that the trader has means which the others are ignorant of, and the debt due to another may have been fraudulently contracted, and there might be other circumstances, which, if known to the creditors, would induce them not to sign the deed. Surely, then, the Legislature must have contemplated in sec. 224, that the deed of arrangement, would provide for the distribution of the whole of the trader's estate among his creditors, for they have almost a natural right to have the property of their debtors applied in payment of their debts. There is no precedent for absolving a trader from his debts without giving up his property, or without the consent of all his creditors. The provisions of the 12th & 13th Vict. c. 106, applicable to this case, are class 34, being secs. 224 to 229 inclusive. Sec. 224 enacts, that every deed of arrangement between a trader and his creditors, signed by six-sevenths in number and value of creditors of 10*l.* and upwards, touching such trader's liabilities and his release therefrom, and the distribution, &c. and mode of winding up his estate, shall be as obligatory in all respects upon the creditors who have not signed such deed as if they had done so. And by sec. 229, if any creditor shall be desirous to shew that the administration of the estate of such trader has not been conducted in conformity with such deed of arrangement, he may apply to the Court, who are empowered to direct inquiry, and make such order thereon as the Court shall think just. In order to make the present deed valid, sec. 229 must be excluded, and then no superintending control is left in the Court at all over the estate. Sec. 228 enacts that creditors shall have the same rights as to set off, mutual credit, lien, and priority, and joint and separate assets shall be distributed in like manner, as in bankruptcy. The last clause of this section shews that a distribution of the trader's estate was contemplated, and the whole class of sections is consistent with a quasi bankruptcy of the trader out of Court. Sec. 228 also shews the propriety of giving creditors power to appeal to the Court; but if there is not to be any distribution of the estate, there can be no appeal to the Court, and then how can a creditor get the benefit of a case of mutual credit? Every person who is entitled to prove under a bankruptcy is a creditor within the meaning of the provisions as to arrangements by deed, and the effect given to a valid deed is to discharge the trader from all such debts as he would be discharged from in an ordinary bankruptcy. In Ex parte Serle, 16 Law T. 374, Mr. Commissioner Evans ruled that a deed of arrangement under sec. 224 must be consistent with the general scope of the statute, and not contain provisions that would lead to any other administration of assets than that which has always been provided for by the statutes relating to bankrupts. There is also an express decision of the Court of Ex. conflicting with that of the Court of Q. B. and in which the Ex. held that the deed of arrangement was not binding upon creditors who had not signed it unless provision was made for the distribution of the whole of the trader's estate amongst his creditors. (Drew v. Collins, 20 L. J. 369, Ex.)

Phipson, for the defendant. It is submitted that the judgment of the Court of Q.B. is correct, and must be affirmed. The policy of the provisions in question is to facilitate arrangements bonâ fide entered into between a trader and his creditors, so as to avoid a bankruptcy, and the wasting of the funds in the proceedings in the Court of Bankruptcy. To prevent this policy being defeated by a few dissentient creditors, sec. 224 gives six-sevenths of the creditors power to bind the whole, it being presumed that an arrangement agreed to by six-sevenths would not be an improvident one. A deed of arrangement is not invalid because the secs. 228 and 229 cannot be applied to it. If there was to be a distribution of the whole estate, there must be a trustee and an inspector appointed, and yet the provisions do not allude to any such persons. As to the hardship of the deed binding dissentient creditors, sec. 225 requires notice to be given to creditors, and enacts that the deed shall not be obligatory upon any dissentient creditor until after the expiration of three months from such notice, so that they have three months, at least, within which they may adopt steps either for recovering their debts or securing the distribution of the estate under the Court by proceedings in bankruptcy. The creditors do not necessarily get the distribution of the whole of the trader's estate in cases where the arrangement is made under the control of the Court, under the provisions in class 33 of the Act. And under sec. 230, nine-tenths of the creditors, at a meeting called for the purpose, may annul the adjudication of bankruptcy, and accept a composition. Hence many of the objections made to this deed of arrangement are also equally applicable to the above cases, but they are clearly untenable as regards them. And with respect to secs. 228 and 229, they were only intended to apply in cases where the deed provided for the distribution of the estate; but in this case they are inapplicable, because six-sevenths of the requisite creditors have agreed to the arrangement, without any provision for such distribution.

JERVIS, C.J.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Q. B. in this case must be reversed. The question turns principally on the 224th and subsequent sections, to the 230th; and though the construction of the 224th is aided by the preceding and subsequent sections, the question mainly depends upon the 224th section. It is not to be presumed that in an Act relating to bankrupts we should find a series of clauses taking away the distribution of the estate and assets of a debtor; and if such an intention had been contemplated, we should expect to find strong words to that effect; but the most that can be said in support of such a view upon sec. 224 is, that the words are doubtful. The clauses in question begin with the title, "of arrangements by deed." Arrangement is a new word, introduced into the Bankruptcy Act, and would at first sight appear to be something different from "composition." But we cannot be guided by its natural meaning, "setting in order," for that is applicable as well to a composition as to the distribution of the trader's estate among his creditors. The words of sec. 224 are, that every deed of arrangement signed by six-sevenths, &c. "touching such trader's liabilities and his release therefrom, and the distribution, inspection, conduct, management, and mode of winding up of his estate." Stopping there, it would seem that the deed of arrangement must be applicable both to his release from his liabilities, and the distribution, &c. of his estate; but the clause proceeds, "or all or any of such matters, or any matters having reference thereto." Now it is highly improbable, even on these words, that the Legislature intended that the six-sevenths of the creditors should have the power of binding the others to the arrangement, without securing the distribution of the trader's estate. But reading on, "shall (subject to the conditions hereafter mentioned) be as effectual and obligatory in all respects upon all the creditors who shall not have signed such deed, as if they had signed the same." As I read the section, the creditors are to have the security of the trader's estate, and the words "subject to the conditions hereafter mentioned" seem to me to engraft on sec. 224 what we find in the subsequent sections of the same series. Sec. 228 provides for cases of set-off, mutual credit, lien, and priority; but if the deed of arrangement provides only for a composition, no effect will be given to that section. A creditor cannot avail himself of a lien under such a deed, nor can a servant obtain a priority for his wages. So, also, with reference to the power, to apply to the Court under sec. 229, there is nothing in this deed for the Court to act upon. If, however, the meaning of sec. 224 were doubtful, it would require strong words to take away the rights of the creditor to the distribution of his debtor's estate. I am of opinion, therefore, that no such deed of arrangement is good that does not apply as well to the distribution of the trader's estate as to his liabilities and release therefrom.

PARKE, B.—I am of the same opinion. The true construction of sec. 224 appears to me to be that it applies only to cases where there is some arrangement as to the entire estate of the trader for the payment of his debts. The term "arrangement by deed" is ambiguous; and this is the first time that it has been introduced into the Bankrupt Act. I think that, were the question doubtful, it would require very strong words to shew that the Legislature intended to deprive a creditor of his right to the distribution of the debtor's estate, on being paid part only of his demand. The object of such arrangements appears to me to be that the trader's estate should be distributed by consent of the parties, and not that creditors should be satisfied on payment of part instead of the whole of their debts. In the case of compositions after bankruptcy by sec. 230 there are to be two meetings, and notice thereof to the creditors, and the concurrence of nine-tenths in number and value of the creditors, is requisite. And in the case of arrangements under the control of the Court by sec. 216, three-fifths in number and value have power to accept a resolution for payment of a composition which shall be binding upon all the creditors. But in both those cases the proceedings are by meetings of creditors, and subject to the control of the Court. Here there is no disclosure of the whole of the trader's estate, and I cannot think that it was intended that the rights of parties should be bound by receiving part of their debts instead of the whole. I concur with the Chief Justice in thinking that there are not words enough to shew that the Legislature intended to deprive a creditor of his rights to the distribution of his debtor's estate for the payment of his debt, and that the sole object of the provisions was that the estate might be administered at less expense, the mode of administration being subject to the control of the Court under sec. 229.

ALDERSON, B.—I am of the same opinion. All that the Legislature intended to do, in my opinion, was to permit six-sevenths in number and value of the creditors to release the trader from his liabilities, and to distribute the whole of his estate subject to the Bankrupt Laws.

The rest of the Court concurring.

ERROR FROM THE COURT OF COMMON BENCH.

Reported by T. D. EVANS, Esq. and R. V. WILLIAMS, Esq. Barristers-at-Law.

GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY v. HARRISON AND OTHERS.

June 16 and 17.

Covenant implied—Condition precedent—Pleading—Averment of readiness and willingness.

An indenture between the plaintiffs and the defendants below (a railway company), after reciting that the defendants were desirous of being supplied with 350,000 railway sleepers, and that the plaintiffs were willing to supply them, according to the terms of a specification and tender, contained a covenant by the plaintiffs that they would supply the sleepers within the time specified, "as and when, and in such quantities and in such manner" as the engineer of the company, by order in writing, "from time to time, or at any time within the period limited by the specification," should require. The specification stated that the number of sleepers required was 350,000; that one-half would have to be delivered in 1847, and the remainder by Midsummer 1848. The deed also contained provisoes that the engineer might vary the times of delivery; that the company should retain 2,000l. in their hands as security for the performance of the contract, and should pay it over within two months after all the sleepers had been delivered; and that the contract might be terminated upon default by the plaintiffs, or on their bankruptcy or insolvency:

Held, first, that a covenant was implied on the part of the company to take the whole number of the sleepers:

Secondly, that an order by the engineer to deliver was a condition precedent to delivery by the plaintiffs below:

Thirdly, that there was a duty in the company to cause the engineer to give such order within the period mentioned in the specification;

Fourthly, that the engineer, regard being had to the discretion reposed in him as to varying the time of delivery of the sleepers, and other parts of the contract, must be considered as an arbitrator between the parties; but, that as related to his duty to give the order of delivery of the sleepers, he was a mere agent of the company.

Held, also, that in a declaration upon such a deed, an averment of readiness and willingness to deliver the sleepers was unnecessary, and if pleaded would therefore be idle matter; the first duty being on the company to give the plaintiffs below an order to deliver.

Error from the judgment of the Court of C. P. given for the plaintiffs below on demurrer to certain pleas by the defendants, and on judgment non obstante veredicto for plaintiffs on the third plea. The pleadings and the deed, so far as they are material, are here set out.

Covenant.—The declararation recited an indenture of the 20th of February, 1847, between the Great Northern Railway Company (the defendants below), on the one part, and the plaintiffs below, as "contractors," on the other, as follows:—"That whereas the said company are desirous of being supplied with 350,000 sleepers, of Dantzic or Memel timber, the particular size and description whereof are set forth in the specification annexed, and in certain drawings therein referred to; and whereas in the same specification are also set forth the several times within which and the port at which the said sleepers will be required to be delivered; and whereas the plaintiffs are willing to supply the said company with the said 350,000 sleepers upon the terms mentioned in the said specification and in the tender of the plaintiffs, a copy of which is hereunder written, and to enter into the several covenants and agreements hereinafter contained;" and then proceeded—"Now this indenture witnesseth, that in consideration of the covenants and agreements hereinafter contained on the part of the said company to be observed and performed, they, the plaintiffs, do hereby jointly and severally covenant and contract with the Great Northern Railway Company in manner following:—that is to say, that they, the said contractors, shall and will, within the times and at the pace mentioned in the said specification, as, and when, and in such quantities and in such manner as Joseph Cubitt, esquire, or John Miller, esquire, or other the principal engineer or one of the principal engineers for the time being of the said company, shall, by order or requisition in writing under his hand from time to time, or at any time within the period limited in and by such specification, direct or require, furnish and supply the said company with 350,000 sleepers of Dantzic or Memel timber: that such sleepers shall be of such description, quality, manufacture, and size, and of such form and construction as are mentioned in the said specification, and to be equal in all respects to the specimens deposited with the said Joseph Cubitt: that in case any of the principal engineers of the company shall, at any time before the complete execution of this contract by the delivery of the whole of 350,000 sleepers, be desirous of altering the size, form, or construction of, or of changing or varying the times of delivery of any of the said sleepers which shall not then have been delivered, he shall be at liberty so to do; and in such case a proportionate alteration in price shall be made, either by increasing or diminishing the price hereinafter agreed to be paid for such sleepers supplied by the contractors; and the engineer by whom such alteration shall be required, shall settle whether any, and, if any, what alteration in price shall be made: provided always, that care shall be taken that the contractors shall derive the same proportionate amount of profit as they would have had if no such alteration had been required." The engineers were then empowered to reject and require the removal of any unsound or defective sleepers supplied by the plaintiffs, and to order the plaintiffs to replace them by proper sleepers, or to replace them at the costs of the plaintiffs, with such a number as would make up the full number thereinbefore agreed to be supplied; and the company were empowered to deduct the price of new sleepers, and the costs and damages incurred by the refusal of the plaintiffs to remove or replace the defective sleepers, out of any moneys which should be then due, or thereafter become due to the plaintiffs.

There was then a stipulation for determining the contract by the company in case of default by the plaintiffs; and the deed then proceeded:—

"The said company do hereby covenant that they, the said company, will pay to the said contractors, for the said sleepers hereinbefore contracted to be supplied, the price of 4s. 3d. per sleeper, at the time and in manner hereinafter mentioned,—viz. that when one of the engineers of the company shall have certified that a cargo of sleepers, to the amount mentioned in his certificate, has been delivered, and that the sum stated in the certificate is due, the company shall forthwith pay the said sum, with any deductions authorised to be made as before mentioned; and that the contractors shall be entitled to receive from the company, within one month from the delivery of each cargo, the amount of the moneys payable in respect thereof: provided always, that no sum of money shall be claimed or received by the contractors on account of the sleepers so applied until sleepers above the value of 2,000l. shall have been delivered to, and certified to have been received by, the company; and that as soon as sleepers to the amount of 2,000l. shall have been so delivered and certified, such sum of 2,000l. shall not be paid to the contractors, but retained by the company, and the excess only of the value of sleepers supplied above 2,000l. be from time to time paid to the contractors, it being the intention that the payment on account shall alway fall short of, and be less by 2,000l. than the sum actually due, to the end that the company may alway have in hand 2,000l. for the purpose of securing the due performance of the contract. And it is further agreed that within two calendar months after the whole of the 350,000 sleepers hereinbefore agreed to be supplied shall have been supplied, and a certificate thereof signed by the engineer, the said sum of 2,000l. or so much as may remain due, shall be paid over to the said contractors," &c. The declaration then set out the specification, which, besides describing the size, form, and mode of cutting the sleepers, contained the following clauses:—"The number of sleepers required under this specification is 350,000; one-half will have to be delivered in 1847, and the remainder by Midsummer 1848. The port at which the deliveries will have to be made is Goole." "The deliveries are to be made either by stacking the sleepers upon a wharf, or properly loading them into a boat, or barge, or other vessel, as may be directed by the resident engineer." "Payments will be made monthly within one month of the date of the engineer's certificate of the delivery of such cargo, after sleepers to the amount of 2,000l. shall have been delivered and certified, which sum of 2,000l. shall remain in the hands of the company as a guarantee for the due performance of the contract on the part of the contractors."

Bovill (Raymond with him) for the plaintiffs in error.—It is needless to trouble the Court by arguing that the pleas demurred to were good; but we contend that the plea on which we obtained the verdict of the jury was good. This was a contract between a contractor to supply sleepers and a railway company; and the only breach is that the engineer of the company did not give orders as to the delivery of the sleepers within the specified time. The deed, as set forth in the declaration, recites that the company were desirous of being supplied with 350,000 sleepers; but the contract does not contain anything to shew that the company were willing or had agreed to take the 350,000 sleepers. The first part of the deed consists entirely of Harrison's covenants. No doubt the Courts have held that covenants shall be construed as extending to both parties where the word "agreed" has been used therein. This Court has no doubt said that that word can only apply to two parties. But what we are here considering is, whether this is or is not our language. We say it is Harrison's, and not ours. Stress was placed upon the use of that word in Elderton v. Emmens, 4 C. B. 479, as importing the language of both parties; but here that word is not employed. It is upon a covenant, which is Harrison's, that an endeavour is now made to shew that it is a covenant of the company. [Parke, B.—No doubt the plaintiffs are bound to deliver 350,000 sleepers, and the question is as to the mutual obligation of the defendants to take them.] The covenant is by the plaintiffs to supply sleepers "as and when, and in such quantities, and in such manner, as Joseph Cubitt, or John Miller, or other principal engineer, shall, by order or requisition in writing, from time to time, or at any time within the period limited by the specification, require;" and it is not a covenant to supply absolutely without requirement of the defendants. The clause says, the engineer may alter the time for delivery; how, then, can it be contended that the company are bound that he shall give orders for delivery within the time mentioned in the specification? The plaintiffs were not entitled to a farthing until after receiving a certificate from the engineer. Every thing was left to the discretion of the engineer, and his certificate was a condition precedent to the contractor's right to recover, and the obligation on the company to pay. (Morgan v. Bernie, 9 Bing. 672; Milner v. Field, 5 Ex. 829.) The cases shew that where, in such a contract, the certificate is held by fraud, there is no remedy at law, the party must seek relief in equity. (MacIntosh v. The Great Western Railway Company, 2 Mac. & Gord. 74.) There is an express covenant as to what the engineer shall do; he is to examine the sleepers, but there is no engagement that he shall certify; and there must be no implication that he was to certify or do anything more than the contract has expressed. "Expressum facit cessare tacitum." There is no contract on the part of the company that they will take all the sleepers, nor that the engineer shall certify. By what is expressed the defendants have shewn into what contracts alone they intended to enter; all they have undertaken from beginning to end is to pay the money for the sleepers when the certificate shall have been given by the engineer. Both parties have left every thing in his discretion except a covenant by the company that he shall examine the sleepers. This being so the Court must not inquire what is reasonable; it must not make covenants for the parties, but be bound by what, on the face of the contract, the parties have themselves expressed. If the Court should hold that there is here an implied covenant that the engineer shall certify, they will altogether remove the necessary protection from railway companies and parties engaged in building, they intending by their contracts not to pay until their surveyor certifies. As to implied covenants reference may be had to Com. Dig. "Covenant" A, 3. It is there said:—"If a lessee covenants to repair, provided that the lessor finds timber, this is not a covenant by the lessor to find it, if there be not the word 'agreed.' If B. covenants to pay 100*l.* to A. and he covenants on receipt to give an acquittance, and to make an obligation, &c. it is not any covenant that he will receive and give an acquittance." (2 Danvers, 231; Wolveridge v. Steward, 1 Cr. & M. 644.) The plaintiffs have here to make out that a covenant by them with the company is a covenant by the company with them. As to mutual obligation there are many cases, of which, taking them in the order of date, the following are material:—Lees v. Whitcombe, 5 Bing. 34; Williamson v. Taylor, 5 Q. B. 175; Aspdin v. Austin, 5 Q. B. 671; Dunn v. Sayles, 5 Q. B. 685. If you are to extend covenants by implication, where is it to stop? Every judge will apply a different measure of implication. The general principle is well laid down in Aspdin v. Austin, and on that defendants rely. [Parke, B.—It must appear, either by express word or obvious implication, that the company are bound to take the 350,000 sleepers.] Another case in which this point was much discussed is now before the House of Lords. (Elderton v. Emmens, 4 C. B. 479, S. C. in Error, 6 C. B. 160.) [Erle, J.—The Court held in some of those cases that there was covenant to pay, though not one to provide work. In Elderton v. Emmens, the Court said that the word "employ" did not mean "find with legal business."] Next, as to that part of the record which depends upon the third plea. The declaration is bad, because it does not allege readiness and willingness to deliver a notice thereof to the defendants. The case of Hannuic v. Goldner, 11 M. & W. 842, is an authority that such averment was necessary, and if that be so, then notice was also requisite. (Grainger v. Dacre, 12 M. & W. 131; Doogood v. Rose, 9 C. B. 132.)

Parke, B.—The first step is on the defendants, to give notice to deliver; there is no obligation on the plaintiffs below to do anything until the defendants have given that notice; therefore, such an allegation in the declaration is unnecessary, it would be mere idle matter. All the Court are of this opinion.

Thursday, June 17.—Willes (Bramwell, Q.C. with him) resumed the argument.

Bovill, in reply.

Parke, B.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of C. P. is correct, and must be affirmed, and in this opinion, and in the reasons of it, I believe we all concur. The authorities which have been cited shew that in order to constitute a binding contract it is not necessary that any particular form of words should be used. We must collect the intention of the parties to a deed from all the parts of it. Accordingly, looking at this instrument and the other documents imported into it, we are to consider, first, whether the company undertake to take the 350,000 sleepers; and, secondly, whether they undertake that the engineers should require the delivery of them before the termination of the period mentioned, namely, Midsummer 1848. There is more doubt about the second question than the first. About the first indeed there is no doubt. The recital in the deed only incorporates what is expressly so incorporated, that is to say, only so much of the specification and tender as it purports to incorporate. I think from it, and them there is ample evidence of a contract on the part of the company to take the 350,000 sleepers. The terms of the recital, "desirous of being supplied," are relied upon by Mr. Bovill, but looking at the terms of the specification we think this is a contract to require that quantity. In the specification we find set out, first, the times when the sleepers should be delivered: "one-half will have to be delivered in 1847, and the remainder by Midsummer, 1848," and from the cases we are of opinion that that means that they contract to require the delivery of them at such times. Then follows the clause as to the requirement by the engineer. That is a covenant to supply, provided there is a requirement in writing by the engineer. Then the proviso as to alteration; and then come two clauses which prove to demonstration that the company understood they were contracting to require the delivery of the whole number within the time. The one gives a power to the company to terminate the contract. That clearly shews there was a contract, and that could only be, on the part of the contractors, to deliver, and on the part of the company to take, the whole amount, or such as the engineer should direct. Mr. Bovill says that the engineer was arbitrator between both, and not an agent of the company. But whether he were so or not, for some purposes this stipulation taken in connection with the general contract to take the whole amount shews that he was to act in that respect as agent for the company. I cannot conceive, looking at this contract, that the engineer was to be the person to finally determine whether the contractors should supply the sleepers or not. It speaks for itself. All this shews a contract; and that contract is to take the whole number within the time as the engineer should direct. That is strengthened by the other provision as to the 2,000*l.* In that, both parties specify that there is a time when that sum would be due, and that would only be when the whole number should have been supplied. That could not be open for ever. It must be within the times mentioned. I think, therefore, it is abundantly clear that the defendants have agreed to take 350,000 sleepers. Secondly. Has the company agreed to give orders for the delivery of the sleepers within the time? I think, the engineer being in this respect the agent of the company for the reasons above given, the clause in question, namely, "that the contractors shall and will, as, when, and in such quantities, and in such manner, as the engineer for the time being of the said company shall, by order in writing, under his hand, from time to time, or at any time within the period limited in and by the specification, direct or require, furnish the sleepers," imports that the company will give the necessary orders before the time limited in the specification, i. e. Midsummer 1848. Then comes the provision as to varying the time, and this is the only point on which we ever had any doubt. We have now come to the conclusion that it only authorises an extension of the times of delivery within the period limited. Midsummer 1848 is the last moment, and the contract cannot be completed unless by that time, and the power of extending the time of delivery is to some time before then. The engineer might give an order varying the time of delivery from that mentioned in the specification, and has a further right to vary the order so given, upon condition of a difference in price being paid, as a compensation to the contractors for any loss occasioned by such variation. But all those orders must be given within the time. Could it be supposed that it was intended that the company should have the power of extending the time for two years, during which the contractors would be out of their capital, and lose the benefit of it, and so be at a loss? The breach, therefore, is properly assigned, and the judgment must be affirmed on this point, as well as on that of entering a judgment non obstante veredicto.

Judgment affirmed.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Reported by W. H. Bennet, Esq. of Lincoln's-inn, Barrister-at-Law.

June 18 and 22.

Mangles v. Dixon and Others.

Equitable mortgage—Chose in action.

An assignee of a chose in action takes it subject to all the then subsisting equities against it in the hands of the assignor.

An agreement between a merchant and a shipowner for a partnership in a particular voyage of a ship belonging to the latter was carried into effect by three instruments,—one, a charter party, by which about one-half of the freight at a certain sum per ton per month was made payable by the merchant to the shipowner by monthly instalments during the voyage, and the rest on the return of the ship, the second, a memorandum of agreement which provided that the parties should be liable for the expenses and interested in the profits of the voyage in equal moieties; and the third, a guarantee after mentioned. While the ship was at sea, the shipowner deposited the charter party with his bankers, as a security for a balance then due on his account, with an order endorsed thereon, addressed to the merchant to pay the freight thereafter to become due to the bankers. Notice of the deposit, and of the endorsement, was some time afterwards given to the merchant, who accordingly paid the subsequent instalments as they fell due to the bankers, without informing them of the agreement: but upon the return of the ship, the shipowner having in the meantime become bankrupt, and the voyage having turned out a losing one, the merchant refused to make any further payment, on the ground that by virtue of the agreement, which was then for the first time brought to the knowledge of the bankers, he was liable only for half the freight made payable by the charter party.

Held (reversing the decision of the Lord Chancellor Cottenham below), that the bankers, whose title was equitable only, had not acquired any better or more extensive right in respect of the charter party against the plaintiffs than the assignors thereof would have had if the second document (the agreement) and the bankruptcy had not taken place, and that the freight must be treated as an item in the account prayed, within the influence, and under the provisions, of the agreement of the 24th April, 1845.

By a charter-party, dated the 23rd of April, 1845, and made between Messrs. Boyd, shipowners, and Messrs. Mangles and company, merchants, the ship Fifeshire was chartered by the latter for six calendar months from the time of her being ready to sail, and for such further time as the charterers should think proper, not exceeding eighteen months in the whole, at the rate of 16s. per ton per calendar month, such freight to be paid as follows:—100*l.* at the expiration of four months from the time of sailing; a further sum of 600*l.* at the expiration of the next two months; a further sum of 150*l.* at the expiration of the next two months, and a like sum of 150*l.* at the expiration of every succeeding month until the termination of the voyage; and the remainder on the unloading and delivery of the cargo at some port in the United Kingdom.

On the 24th April, the day following the date of the charter-party, the following memorandum of agreement was signed by Messrs. Mangles and Co. and George John Ashton, a clerk of Messrs. Boyd:—

"Memorandum.—That Messrs. Mangles and Co. having, by a charter-party dated the 23rd instant, hired the ship Fifeshire for the term and at the freight therein mentioned: It is hereby agreed between them and Mr. G. J. Ashton, that the trading which shall be carried on, and all cargo and produce which shall be sent on board of the said ship in pursuance of the said charter-party, and all benefit and advantage which shall be derived therefrom, shall be for and on the joint account and risk of the said Messrs. Mangles and Co. of the one part, and the said G. J. Ashton on the other part, in equal proportions; and that, after payment or deduction of the freight, and all incidental expenses, the property or loss which shall arise shall be borne and received or paid by the said parties in equal moieties."

Contemporaneously with that agreement, Messrs. Boyd gave to Messrs. Mangles and Co. their guarantee for the payment of the share of all such expenses or loss, if any, as might be sustained in the course of the adventure, for which G. J. Ashton should, by virtue of the said agreement, become liable. The ship sailed in the following month of May. In that month Messrs. Boyd obtained from their bankers, Messrs. Dixon and Co. an advance of 12,000*l.* upon their banking account; and there being, on the 1st December following, a balance of 11,000*l.* and interest remaining due in respect of that advance, Messrs. Boyd deposited the charter-party with Messrs. Dixon and Co. as a security for the same, with an order written in the margin, and addressed to Messrs. Mangles and Co. in these words:—"Messrs. Mangles and Co.—Please to pay the amount of what is due from this date to Messrs. Dixon and Co. or their order.—J. BOYD and Co. 1st December, 1845."

On the 11th of March, 1846, Dixon and Co. sent to Mangles and Co. a notice in writing, apprising them of the deposit, and of the order with which it was accompanied, and requiring them to pay to them, Dixon and Co. "all moneys which may now be due, or may hereafter become due, by virtue of the said charter-party, as and when the same may become payable."

On the 12th May, 1846, the solicitor of Messrs. Dixon and Co. called at the counting-house of Messrs. Mangles and Co. and demanded payment of the 150*l*. which had become due under the charter-party on the 1st of that month; but, not finding them within, he called again on the 12th, when their clerk told him that none of the parties were at the office, but that they had instructed him to say that they doubted whether they could safely make any further payment under the charter-party, in consequence of the known insolvency of Messrs. Boyd; adding, however, that they would consult their attorney upon the subject, if Messrs. Dixon and Co. would send them a demand in writing. The solicitors of Dixon and Co. accordingly, on the 16th of May, 1846, sent a written demand, and, on the 20th, Dixon and Co. received from Mangles and Co. bank notes for 150*l*. with a letter stating it to be the amount then due on account of the charter-party. A few days after, on the 25th of May, a fiat in bankruptcy was issued against Boyd; notwithstanding which, on the 9th of July following, Mangles and Co. without any further application being made to them, paid to Dixon and Co. the sum of 300*l*. being the amount of the two monthly payments of 150*l*. which became due on the 1st of June and 1st of July.

On the 17th of August, 1846, the ship returned from her voyage, and Dixon and Co. thereupon claimed payment from Mangles and Co. of the sum of 3,717*l*. as the balance of freight then remaining due under the charter-party. That demand, however was resisted by Mangles and Co. on the ground that the agreement of the 24th of April, with which Dixon and Co. were then, for the first time, made acquainted, though nominally an agreement with Ashton, was in reality an agreement with Messrs. Boyd, Ashton's name being used in it merely as their trustee; and that, after debiting the Boyds with one half of the expenses of the voyage, including in those expenses the line of the ship, the balance due to them in respect of the joint adventure would not exceed 1,379*l*. which sum Mangles and Co. offered to pay Dixon and Co. Dixon and Co. however, refused that offer, and brought an action on the charter-party in the names of Messrs. Boyd, upon which Mangles and Co. filed the bill in this suit against the partners in the firm of Dixon and Co. and against the Messrs. Boyd and the assignees under their bankruptcy, insisting that Dixon and Co. were bound, as well as the Boyds, by the agreement of the 24th April, 1845, and praying an injunction, and that the accounts between the parties might be taken on the footing of that agreement.

The bill alleged that the three documents above set forth of the 23rd and 24th April, 1845, were all executed on the 24th April, and were intended to constitute but one transaction, viz. a partnership between Mangles and Co. and the Boyds in the voyage, and that the mode of carrying that intention into effect had been left entirely to the shipbrokers employed by the respective parties, who had determined upon that which was adopted as the most proper and convenient one for carrying out such an agreement, where one of the parties to it was the owner of the ship. The bill further alleged that the instalments made payable by the charter-party were fixed with reference to that agreement, and on the calculation that by means thereof about one half of the whole freight made payable by the charter-party, would be paid by Mangles and Co. before the termination of the voyage.

This account of the transaction was confirmed by the evidence of both ship-brokers, and also by that of Ashton; but none of these witnesses gave any explanation of the circumstance of Ashton's name being used in the memorandum of the 24th April, instead of that of the Boyds, except Ashton himself, who said it was done by the advice of the solicitor of the broker employed by the Boyds, and under the impression that there might otherwise have been a difficulty in bringing an action on the charter party.

Dixon and Co. by their answer, did not suggest that Ashton's name had been used with any fraudulent purpose of concealment, but rested their claim to the balance due under the charter-party, upon the fact of their having had no notice or knowledge of the alleged agreement until after the bankruptcy of the Boyds.

On the hearing of the cause, Vice-Chancellor KNIGHT BRUCE, being of opinion that Dixon and Co. as the assignee of the charter-party, could stand in no better position than the Boyds, their assignees, and that the latter were bound by the agreement entered into by Ashton, as their trustee, made a decree restraining the action at law, and directing that an account should be taken upon the footing of the charter-party and memorandum of agreement. On appeal to the Lord Chancellor (Cottenham), he, on the 20th November, 1849, reversed his Honour's decree, and, instead thereof, ordered that appellant's bill should stand dismissed as against the bankers (Dixon and Co.) with costs.

From the decision of the Lord Chancellor, the plaintiffs now appealed to this House.

Rolt, Q.C. and John Bailey, Q.C. (with whom was Josiah W. Smith) contended that the Messrs. Boyds were entitled in equity to recover against the appellants only the balance which might be due on the footing of the agreement; that the respondents, as assignees of Messrs. Boyd, were bound by the equities by which they (Messrs. Boyd) were affected, and that the circumstances of the case were not such that the respondents could be considered as having acquired any better or more extensive right in respect of the charter-party against the appellants than the said Messrs. Boyd would have had if the assignment of the 1st of December, 1845, had not been made, and the bankruptcy had not taken place; and also that under the decree pronounced below the appellants had been obliged to pay double the amount of freight which the appellants agreed to pay to the firm of Boyd and Co. under whom the respondents claimed.

C. P. Cooper, Q.C. and W. T. S. Daniel, Q.C. for the respondents, contended that upon the pleadings and evidence in the cause, the appellants had failed to establish their right to any relief, which by their bill they sought to obtain, and that the bill, therefore, had been properly dismissed against them.

Rolt in reply.

At the conclusion of the argument the LORD CHANCELLOR (St. Leonard's) said that the question in the case was of such vast importance in a mercantile point of view, that he should move that the further consideration of the matter be postponed. On the 22nd of June he moved the judgment of the House in the following terms:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—My lords, this case is not so important with respect to the amount of property involved in it, as it is with regard to the principle of equity which your lordships are called upon to decide. There have been divided opinions in the Court below, and your lordships are now called upon, finally, to decide what is the true construction of the different instruments which have been executed, and what is the rule of law properly applicable to it. My lords, there are two important subjects to be considered; first, what is the real construction of the different instruments, as between the parties to those instruments; and, secondly, what is the construction and the operation of those instruments, as between the charterers and the bankers, to whom the owners had mortgaged, or rather made an equitable assignment of the charter party. I propose to consider, my lords, first, the operation of the instruments as between the parties to them, without any reference to the difficulties which have been introduced by the assignment of the charter-party to the bankers. Now, my lords, the agreement is clearly proved, and I shall feel it my duty, under the peculiar circumstances of this case, a statement of which has been made at your lordships' bar, as the facts of the case were not properly apprehended in the Court below, to refer your lordships, more than I am in the habit of doing, to the documents, to prove what the real agreement was. The transaction was of this nature: Messrs. Mangles were desirous of chartering a vessel in search of guano; Messrs. Boyd were shipowners, and importers of guano upon a large scale, and otherwise acting as merchants, and they had a vessel called the Fifeshire, which they were ready to let upon freight, to search for and bring back guano; that vessel happened to be of too much tonnage for the proposed charterers, Messrs. Mangles, and therefore it was suggested, on the part of Messrs. [illegible] that they, the Messrs. Boyd themselves, might [illegible]alf and risk half of the venture; in that way Messrs. Mangles would have, indirectly, the precise quantity of tonnage which they required. The agreement, which was entered into upon that basis, was carried into effect through the instrumentality of the brokers on each side. Now, my lords, this difficulty naturally occurred to the brokers, and had been suggested, indeed, by one of the solicitors to one of the parties, that, as the owners of the vessel, Messrs. Boyd, were themselves to be co-charterers, a difficulty would arise, unless the documents assumed a particular shape,—that is, that it was very difficult to draw a contract which would give a right to Messrs. Boyd to recover whatever portion of the freight was to be paid by Messrs. Mangles, whilst they themselves, the Messrs. Boyd, appeared upon the face of the instrument as the owners of the very vessel which was to earn the freight. The plan that was adopted was this,—but first I must say that the witnesses clearly proved that the precise agreement between the parties was this: that each party should bear the expense; 16s. a ton was the price fixed for the freight; and, accordingly, the clear agreement, without the slightest doubt, was, that each party, the owners and the charterers, properly so called, should bear 8s. of that freight, and in that way the 16s. were to be paid, and then the risk of the venture, whether it turned out profitable or the contrary, whether it was either a total gain or a total loss, was to be borne between them just as the fact happened. Now, my lords, the way in which that was carried into execution I find no fault with. It was difficult to know how to make a good charter-party with the conflicting character of the Messrs. Boyd; and what they wanted was this, whilst they intended to carry the real agreement into execution, and there is no doubt about that, they wanted also to insure to Messrs. Boyd, as they ought to have insured to Messrs. Boyd, the power of recovering that portion of the freight during the voyage which Messrs. Mangles were to pay. The plan they hit upon was this,—there was a pure simple charter-party between Messrs. Boyd on the one hand, and Messrs. Mangles on the other, by which Messrs. Boyd lent, in fact, their vessel on freight to Messrs. Mangles to go in search of guano, and the money was to be paid, the freight at 16s. a ton, according to certain arrangements. Bills were to be given at different dates,—one upon the sailing of the ship, another at another time, and so on till a certain number of months had elapsed, and then a monthly payment in cash was to be made of 150*l*. every month for the freight, that is, to be paid by the freighters, by Messrs. Mangles, upon the face of this instrument; and then when the venture was closed, when the result was known, and the ship came home, a bill at ninety days date, which is a very material circumstance, was to be given by Messrs. Mangles to Messrs. Boyd, for whatever might be the balance due for freight upon the venture, or it was to be paid in cash equal to a bill, that is to say, there was of course to be a discount equal to the term of ninety days, which was the period the bill would have had to run. Now the first circumstance that would strike any one, conversant with matters of business, on reading this charter-party, is, that the sums which were to be paid for freight, were, as nearly in round numbers as could be, just half of the 16s. a ton; shewing, therefore, upon the face of the charter-party itself the intention of the parties to carry into effect the real agreement of the parties, that during the voyage, at all events, beyond all doubt or question, Messrs. Mangles were not to pay more than their half of the freight, which they had agreed to pay according to the stipulation. Now, my lords, one important thing to ascertain is this, with a view to the second question by-and-bye, was there any fraud intended—was there any fraud carried into execution—was there any secrecy intended in regard to this transaction? Clearly and indisputably not. It was a simple mode of carrying into effect the agreement of the parties; and, conversant as I am with the forms of conveyance, I do not myself know how it would have been easy to have carried their intention into effect in a better way. Now, my lords, the plan was this: that after that charter-party had been executed, by which, no doubt, upon the face of it, Messrs. Mangles were the sole charterers, and Messrs. Boyd were the owners, letting their ship at freight. A clerk of Messrs. Boyd's, of the name of Ashton, was put forward as if he were the person who was to undertake half the risk and half the venture; he accordingly executed an agreement which was dated the next day. But all the agreements, I must observe, were executed on the same day—the 24th, the charter-party was dated the 23rd, and two other documents which I am bound to mention (the one I have just mentioned and another) were dated the 24th, but they were all executed on the same day and at the same time. Now Ashton was put forward as if he was the third party, really dealing with Messrs. Mangles, and he engaged that he would stand half the risk, and he stipulated to be entitled to half the profit of the venture. Now there is no doubt that that stipulation included tonnage, because the tonnage was to be paid, at all events, in account to Messrs. Boyd. But we shall presently see how it was to be paid. And then by another document, which I will call No. 3, Messrs. Boyd entered into a guarantee with Messrs. Mangles, that Ashton should perform his part of the engagement. Now, my lords, all this was a mere contrivance, a mere piece of machinery, to carry into effect that which they would have done directly, but for the difficulty which had been interposed by the fact, that Messrs. Boyd were both owners of the vessel and adventurers in it for a voyage of speculation. In that mode it is admitted distinctly by the answer of Messrs. Boyd and clearly proved, that Ashton was merely the nominee; in fact, Ashton was Messrs. Boyd. And in this case your lordships are now sitting as a Court of Equity, and in this Court therefore, as a Court of Equity, it admits of no doubt that Ashton represented, and, in point of fact, was for all the purposes of this cause, the firm of Messrs. Boyd. He represented the character of the firm of Messrs. Boyd. Now, my lords, under the circumstances, and I adverted to the other point before, was there anything secret in this transaction? Decidedly not; for, in the first place, it was known openly to the brokers of both parties, and carried into execution by the brokers of both parties just in the way they thought proper, and was manifestly communicated to the clerks. And we have these two remarkable circumstances, that Messrs. Boyd having, before the ship sailed, furnished certain materials and implements for the purpose of loading the vessel with guano, having furnished certain instruments which cost some hundred and odd pounds, they, in consequence of the agreement that the expenses should be borne equally, made out an account by which one moiety of the aggregate of those charges was charged to Messrs. Mangles and paid by Messrs. Mangles. Now that was seen at once necessarily by the clerks in Messrs. Boyd's house, and they must have known perfectly, as Ashton, who was their own clerk, did perfectly know, and as their brokers did perfectly know, and everybody, in point of fact, that had anything to do with it, was perfectly acquainted with the real nature of the transaction.

Now, there is a still more remarkable circumstance. Ashton, a clerk of this firm, had a brother who was resident at the Cape, and who was there the agent of Messrs. Boyd. Now, my Lords, in August, of the same year, when nobody knew where the vessel was, or whether it was Messrs. Boyd's, or whether the venture was successful or otherwise, Messrs. Boyd write to Ashton, at the Cape, their own agent, and state to him that they have got the Fifeshire on her voyage for guano, and another vessel, the Jane, also on her voyage for guano, and that they have taken half the risk in both these vessels. So that this was not a solitary transaction. So far from desiring to make it a secret transaction, they communicate to their agent at the Cape, amongst other matters of business, without the slightest intimation that it was to be a secret matter, that they had half a venture in both the Fifeshire and the Jane, both of which were in search of guano. In short, they were very great importers, as appears from that letter, of guano, and it was in the natural course of their business, if circumstances called for it, that they should, if they could, let their vessel, and join in the venture. Now, Ashton, their clerk, has proved this: he had a conversation with Messrs. Boyd after Messrs. Boyd had agreed to take half this venture, and he asked them what induced them to do so, upon that Messrs. Boyd said, "Our inducement is this, we shall get 8s. a ton from the charterers,—Messrs. Mangles,—and that will pay the ship's expenses, so that we cannot do any great harm, and if the venture turns out fortunately, we shall have a large sum of money probably as a return of the voyage, but at all events the ship's expenses are covered with the 8s. per ton. Now, my lords, this is proved so very clearly, that I do not know that it is necessary to trouble you upon it, although I said I would have got all the passage here, but it is hardly necessary to trouble you with it. I have read them with much attention, and I believe I have represented them pretty accurately. But the agreements prove beyond all doubt, that which is admitted by Messrs. Boyd themselves, and which has never been disputed, that all three agreements make one transaction. It is admitted by them in their answer in most distinct terms. I am considering the effect of these instruments as against themselves. They admit, in many words, that the three instruments were all one transaction, they do not attempt to deny it. Now, my lords, the evidence of the witnesses whom I have stated proves exactly what I have stated to your lordships; but the evidence of Ashton it may be worth while, perhaps, to read, as proving more particularly what the real matter is. Ashton says, in page 106,—"The mode which the said shipbrokers adopted, as to their arrangements with each other, was as follows; namely, the charter-party was to express the full amount of freight, and the said defendants John and James Boyd's half of the venture was to be represented by myself, and that I should enter into an agreement with the complainants to take half the risk of such charter on their the said last-named defendant's account. The said defendants the said Messrs. Boyd indemnifying the complainants by guaranteeing my fulfilment of such agreement." He is unable to state particularly what his reasons were, but he believed that it was to enable each party to retain his right against the other, or to render it a legal contract. For the purpose of carrying out such aforesaid agreement a charter-party was prepared dated the 23rd of April, 1845, and executed by the complainants and the defendants John and James Boyd, and two several agreements bearing date respectively the 24th of April, 1845, and which agreements and said charter-party were executed at the same time, and all which said three instruments were said to be identical with each other. That is not an accurate expression, but one understands what he means. He means that which the Messrs. Boyd admit in their answer, that there was only one agreement. Then he states exactly that this was to be a joint risk between them, and the other brokers state in the clearest terms that the freight was to be 16s. and that the instalments were fixed upon the principle of the joint trading of the ship, and that the charter-party was signed by the Messrs. Mangles upon the representation that the owners of the ship would charter half of the ship. Now Mr. Sunbery states, for example, in page 100, like the other brokers, that the amount of the aforesaid instalments were fixed upon the principle that there was a joint interest in the aforesaid cargo and the charter, each bearing a moiety of the profit or loss. What the real agreement, therefore, was, admits of no doubt, and I have explained the grounds now upon which the particular machinery is to depend. I state to your lordships, without the slightest hesitation, that there is no trace in any part of those voluminous proceedings of any intention to have a secret arrangement, or if any, the slightest desire to keep the arrangement secret. My lords, it will be seen that the ship sailed on the 1st of August, 1845; but we will stop for a moment to consider how this was to operate, and I think nothing can be more clear and plain. Messrs. Boyd were the owners, and they were the half charterers, and Messrs. Mangles were half-charterers also, and filled only that character. They were to pay by express stipulation, and they were liable to be sued at law for the recovery of their moiety of the freight. What was that? 8s. a ton a month. The sums stipulated to be paid by them during the voyage by instalments were all, as I have said, measured by that amount, being as nearly as possible half of the whole. Now, how was the other half to be borne? Why, by the other co-charterers. And who were they? Why, they were the owners. What was the consequence? That they received the money every month. They had it in hand, and if they had to receive, they had also first to pay. They had to pay as charterers, and to receive as owners. In that way, therefore, the whole of 16s. a ton was actually paid to the owners during the whole of the voyage, and up to the moment the ship arrived at her destination in London, every shilling of it was paid. I deny, my lords, that there was a single shilling unpaid, so far as those two sums as nearly as possible represented the whole amount of the two halves, as they were intended to be not quite half each, but whatever small balance there might be being excluded, the whole freight was regularly paid either by moneys down, or by retaining them, which was equal to moneys down, so as to satisfy the whole 16s. a ton during the voyage. Now, this case has been tried at law, action having been brought, it was tried in the Court of Exchequer, and there the Lord Chief Baron and Mr Baron Parke undoubtedly, having the documents before them, gave an opinion that the true construction of the agreement was, that the freight was to be paid for the whole, whatever might be the balance of accounts owing by Messrs. Mangles. So that at the conclusion of the voyage they were bound to give a bill for the remaining half of that freight, which I say was provided for regularly by the retainer during the voyage, and could not import No. 2 and No. 3 as part of the original agreement. Now, my lords, the case at law assumes a very singular aspect, and I must say that, as shewing the danger of mixing law and equity together, this being a chose in action, as it is called, that is, the charter-party not being assigned to them. I will assume for a moment the assignment to Messrs. Dixon, the bankers, the action was brought in truth by Messrs. Dixon, the bankers, but necessarily in the name of Messrs. Boyd, because it was not assignable at law, but as they had the assignment in equity, they were entitled to use the names of the parties legally entitled in the action. Well, the judges admit that action, not simply as an action of the owners of the vessel for the freight, but they admit the action of the owners in the character of trustees for the bankers, and they advert to the equitable title of the bankers in regard to their decision. Now, in that way, in point of fact, they administer as it were an equity, for they advert to the equity, and yet they do not carry out the equity. The learned judges say, both of them, that the very construction that they put upon the instrument was put upon the instrument by Messrs. Mangles themselves; for that after the equitable assignment to Messrs. Dixon, the bankers, they, the Messrs. Mangles, made the monthly payments to the bankers, but how could they refrain from doing so? It was part of the contract. It was intended that Messrs. Mangles should pay the 16s. a ton regularly by monthly instalments, after the first payment; during the voyage they could not relieve themselves from that liability. Whatever might be the result of the account, it was intended that the freight should be paid pending the voyage, and up to the close of the voyage, in the way I have stated. Then what construction was there? There was no other construction on those payments than an obedience to the actual terms of the contract, and the real intention of the agreement. It is impossible, therefore, to draw that inference, it appears to me, with great submission to the learned judges, which they did draw; I think it was in perfect obedience to the contract, and according to the terms of the contract, and the forms of it, and according to the real agreement. Now, my lords, just let us see for a moment what the rights of the parties were upon the real merits of the case, and according to the truth and good conscience; the ground of equity being according to the truth and honour of the case, and good conscience according to the rule of the Court. Now, what is the nature of the real transaction? You shall pay. We will pay between us 16s. a ton during the voyage; that will cover the ship's expenses: we will bear the other half ourselves. It appears to be a joint account when the voyage is ended, and then there is to be a bill at ninety days. It would not require ninety days (we shall see it could not) to sell the cargo, and, therefore, that distant day was in point of fact named evidently in order to enable the parties to wind up their accounts. And the reason why, upon the face of the charter-party, the charterers were made liable to give a bill at the end of that voyage was manifestly and simply this, because it otherwise would have been inconsistent with the principle of the charter-party. You could not carry it out as a legal instrument on the face of it, unless you carried it out wholly; because if they had not made the residue in the form (and it was but form, according to my view of the matter), if they had not carried it out to the whole extent, they would have disclosed the very thing which they did not want to shew, namely, that there was no legal right in Messrs. Boyd to bring an action for the 8s. a ton pending the voyage. Now, my lords, for a moment, to return again to the other point, What was the real transaction between the parties? Each is to pay; and in this respect I look upon Messrs. Boyd as having two perfectly distinct characters. Messrs. Boyd, as co-charterers, were to pay 8s. and Messrs. Mangles, as co-charterers, were to pay the other 8s. and that was all to be paid regularly up to the time the ship had ended her voyage. Then they gave a bill at the distant date for the sake of this form. But what is the substance? Why, that you, at the end of the voyage, shall partake of the profit, if there be any, and you shall bear also the loss, if there be a loss. And what is first to be deducted? The words are singular,—"To be paid or deducted." What is to be deducted? The freight. It was intended in the account undoubtedly that Messrs. Boyd should have 16s. a ton a month for freight. There is no question about that, and that was to be an item in the account. Now let us see what actually did take place, and see what the supposed equity is. For I am still speaking between Messrs. Boyd and Messrs. Mangles. See now what the supposed equity is. On the 17th or 18th of August, 1846, the ship arrived. There is a little doubt about the date, one states one day and another the other. On the 5th of September, 1846, the final freight became payable, and at that time a bill at ninety days ought to have been given, or cash, and it is singular that Messrs. Dixon demanded cash, which they had no right to do; then they do not allow the other party, Messrs. Mangles, the right, which they clearly had, either to give a ninety days' bill, or to pay in cash, according to the charter-party. Now, on the 21st of September, in the same year, the cargo was sold, and on the 10th of November, in the same year, the accounts were made out by Messrs. Mangles, and the balance, after allowing for the freight properly, was tendered to persons who then represented Messrs. Boyd. Now, suppose it had been tendered before the six months, how can it be contended upon the result of these accounts that Messrs. Boyd could have recovered a single shilling of the extra 8s. a ton during the voyage from Messrs. Mangles, the agreement being, that they should bear the charge equally; and during the voyage pay equally the freight, and that the freight should be brought into the account at the end of that voyage, and that they should then bear the profit or loss? Why, my lords, the bill for ninety days would not have become due until the 7th of December, and on the 10th of November every account is made out, the transaction was closed, and the balance of the money was ready to be paid to the party entitled to it. Then what would be said of the equity of this country, if a man, having the result of the account in his hand, ready to pay over, is fact, they had received by retainer during the voyage and up to the moment when the voyage closed; and then we are to be told that it is equitable that the supposed charterers should pay the whole in order afterwards to have the right to demand the whole back again. My lord, some cases were cited of cross demands. This is not a case, in my apprehension, either of a cross demand or of a set off; it is neither one nor the other. It depends upon the true meaning of the agreement for that, the freight never became due in equity from the Messrs. Mangles, because the agreement was that they never were really to pay it. The consequence of which is, that it is a proper subject to be set off in the account, and the full benefit is to be given to the parties. I think I never saw anything much clearer in my mind than as between Messrs. Mangles and Messrs. Boyd that Messrs. Mangles were not liable to pay the extra freight. The freight had already been received during the voyage, and therefore there was a clear equity as between those parties. Now, my lords, that closes the transaction as regards these parties. And then the case assumed a very different shape, and a very important one, and involves certainly the consideration of one of the most important points of equity and law that I am aware of, and it is singular that it should be reserved for decision at this time. The case in that respect is this: Messrs. Dixon, who were the bankers of Messrs. Boyd, had, at an early period, namely, the 29th of May, 1845, advanced 12,000*l.* to Messrs. Boyd upon their promissory note. Now that was entirely independent of any transaction of the charter-party, it had nothing whatever to do with it; it was not advanced, as it seems to have been understood by the Lord Chancellor in the Court below, that it might have been advanced on the joint account of the charterers, there is no pretence for any such notion in any part of these proceedings. I have read every word of them, and sought in vain for any trace of it, and could not find it. They admit, on the other hand, that the advance was not upon the security of the charter-party, and they admit what, by and by, will be important, that they advanced no further sum after they got the assignment of the charter-party, and that they never originally looked to the charter-party as their security. I have got the passages here where they admit, in the most distinct terms, that they did not advance the money, nor do Messrs. Boyd so allege it. Now, they remain for some time upon the security of the promissory note, but they became a little alarmed apparently, for there was 11,000*l.* still due to them upon that account, and I suppose they called for a security; the result of it was, that the Messrs. Boyd gave them the charter-party, and we must take it gave to them No. 1, the charter-party alone; and in the margin of that instrument this was written: "Messrs. Mangles, Price, and Price. Please pay the amount of what is due. Boyd and Company, 1st December, 1845." Now that, it will not be disputed, is a mere direction to pay the amount of what was due, without stating any particulars. It does not state, "Please to pay the 16s. a ton stipulated by the charter-party; they do not state that; it states, "Please to pay what is due;" and that will not be disputed to be a good equitable assignment; it uses those terms; in short, the expression is one that there is no doubt about. Now, they remain upwards of five months upon that security, without giving any notice to Messrs. Mangles that they had taken that assignment; and yet we all know that that notice was exceedingly essential to their own safety in many respects, but they were so satisfied with the dealing between themselves and the Boyds, that they remained upon that security without giving any notice for upwards of five months, and then, on the 14th of March, 1846, they do give notice; but they do not give notice quite in the terms of the indorsement which I have read, for they introduce words rather more copious than the words which I have referred to, and which are the words used in the assignment to them. Now they first of all remain five months without any security whatever, and then they take a security for the balance. They then remain between three or four months without security and notice,—they make no communication with Messrs. Mangles, they ask no questions of Messrs. Mangles of any sort or kind, and very shortly after that, that is, some two months after, the Messrs. Boyd become insolvent. Then the question is, what are the rights of the Dixons under these circumstances? Without going into any dealings beyond the actual notice, and just to stop at this moment when the actual notice was given, what are the rights of these parties? Now if there be one rule which is more perfectly established in a Court of Equity, it is, that whoever takes an assignment of a chose in action, which this charter-party was, that is, not an assignment at law, although it is in equity, he takes it subject to all the equities of the person who made the assignment. That admits of no doubt. Therefore it is not to be the notice was given, during all these months the bankers took precisely the same interest, and were subject to the same liabilities,—namely, to No. 2 and No. 3, just the same as Messrs. Boyd themselves, and for this purpose, of course, the notice is not used, it has nothing to do with it. If they had notice it only introduces a new head of equity, which is, that they are bound by the notice which they have, for equity will not permit a man to shut his eyes to a fact of which he has been informed, and therefore if he has notice, he is bound by the knowledge he has thus acquired. But the rule to which I refer is, that there is no notice. And although we may suppose Messrs. Dixon, the bankers, to be utterly unacquainted and uninformed of either No. 2 and No. 3, they were bound by Nos. 1, 2, and 3, as forming one agreement precisely to the same extent as Messrs. Boyd themselves were bound at the time of the execution of the agreement. Then they do not ask any question of Messrs. Mangles, when they do give the notice,—they ask no question when they take the security,—it was not for the money then advanced, it was for money already advanced, and in their notice, they intimate that, for they say, "for valuable consideration paid." It was therefore, as they state it truly, for a past consideration, and this security was taken, as many such securities are daily taken, in the City of London, no doubt; at the time, they thought it prudent to make themselves as secure as they could, and they took the best security which their debtor had to offer; but they took it with all the liabilities, and your lordships must fix them in point of law, as being cognisant of their liabilities, under the rule which I have drawn to your lordship's attention. Then to stop here for a moment, the important question is this, when the notice was given to which I have alluded, was it incumbent upon Messrs. Mangles to write back to Messrs. Dixon and to tell them that there was, besides the charter-party, documents Nos. 1, 2, and 3? Now, in the first place, who is to inquire and to take the trouble in these cases,—who ought to do that? Why, the person who ought to do it is, undoubtedly, he who is fixed with the liability. Messrs. Dixon were fixed with the liability,—if they desired to remove that liability, they ought to have made due inquiry, and, therefore, primâ facie at least, the loss ought to fall upon him who has not thought proper to inquire. He has no right to speculate whether he shall obtain an answer or not which will disclose circumstances which he is not required to know, and if there is to be a loss, the loss ought to fall upon him who being subject to the liability, and having to to remove that liability if he can remove it, ought to inquire, and he did not inquire. Now, my lords, I must take care and guard myself upon this important point. If that notice of the bankers had shewn that they had been deceived—that they were advancing money upon a ground which they misunderstood—and that the charterers, Messrs. Mangles, had stood by knowing and seeing that circumstance, and had been silent, I agree that the case would be altogether different, and that it would be incumbent then upon the Messrs. Mangles to have disclosed the real circumstances of the case to Messrs. Dixon; and if they did not do so, that they would be just as much bound as it is now contended they ought to be bound. Now let us see how the case stands in that respect. The dealing, remember, was between Messrs. Boyd and Messrs. Dixon, without any intervention in any manner, directly or indirectly, or any inquiry of Messrs. Mangles. What was there to induce Messrs. Mangles, when they received that notice, to suppose that Messrs. Boyd had been committing a fraud upon Messrs. Dixon, their own bankers? What was there to induce them to suppose that? Pay what is due. They say they perfectly intend to pay what is due. Why were they to suppose that No. 2 and No. 3 had not been communicated to Messrs. Dixon, who put trust and credit in the statement of Messrs. Boyd? Why Messrs. Dixon advance this sum of 12,000*l.* upon Messrs. Boyd's mere promissory note, and they remain content with it for months. They then take an assignment; they do not communicate that assignment even to Messrs. Mangles for two or three months afterwards; then they give the notice; and then they say, "We have told you of this transaction, now you shall be liable to every thing which we have neglected for our own security. We have neglected to inquire; we have dealt behind your back with Messrs. Boyd; we, the bankers, have dealt with Messrs. Boyd, our own customer, without your intervention; they have incurred a great debt with us, and we have taken an assignment of this which is not assignable except in equity, and imposed all the liability upon us,—we have never communicated that fact to you to inform you,—we have never made inquiry whether you have any dealings between you,—and then when we give you notice, we throw upon you at once the whole liability, and desire you to indemnify us for our own negligence, our own want of care and caution, which, duly exercised, would have prevented this." Now certainly that is a new point. I admit the books do not establish the point, but I think the principle is perfectly clear, that where there is no fact, nothing to lead the party who is receiving the notice to see that the party who gives the notice has been deceived, and is certain to sustain a loss by that delay,—I conceive no equity will require the party who receives the notice to be impertinently almost interfering between two parties who have dealt behind his back, and who have never made any communication to him or ever seen him on that subject. Messrs. Mangles must have begun by supposing that Messrs. Boyd had cheated Messrs. Dixon; and they must have had the hardihood to say, "We are afraid that Messrs. Boyd have been committing a fraud upon you, for we do not see that you mention No. 2 and No. 3, therefore we are forced to tell you of it." Suppose that Messrs. Boyd had, as the probability was, really stated the facts, it would have been a very disagreeable answer, I imagine, to have been received by Messrs. Mangles to that communication. Your lordships were asked by the learned counsel at the bar who appeared for Messrs. Mangles, and, upon the subject of character, it was put as a very fair question, whether, after the turn this case had taken, the House would say that there was anything fraudulent in the transaction as between Messrs. Mangles and Messrs. Dixon. And as against Messrs. Dixon, I cannot help stating to your lordships that my clear impression is, that there is no trace of any such fraud, or of any intention on the part of Messrs. Mangles. Now another view of it is this—it did not at all follow that upon the result of the transaction, there would not be enough to pay Messrs. Dixon. That depended upon the success or failure of an adventure, of which nobody knew anything. Nobody knew what had taken place. The adventure did not turn out successful: they went to certain islands for guano; they did not find it; then they had to go to the Cape, and find other places to search for the guano, and get the guano from other places. It turned out therefore, clearly, but no one could tell that, and there is no doubt, as between Messrs. Boyd on the one hand, and their own bankers, Messrs. Dixon, on the other, that Messrs. Dixon would have been entitled to the whole extent of the freight, to the benefit of the voyage,—that, as between Messrs. Boyd and Messrs. Dixon, Messrs. Dixon would have been entitled to the whole 16s. a ton during the whole voyage. Now, the authorities upon this subject, as to liability, may be worth just referring to as going beyond your lordships' rule, shewing that if a man does take an assignment of a chose in action, he must take his chance as to the exact state in which the party stands. The case of Cator v. Burke, 1 Bro. C. C. 434, very strongly illustrates that. There the defendants, the Burkes, had entered into a bond of 500*l.* to the other defendant, Hargrave, for securing 250*l.* and Hargrave had given to them a counter bond. Hargrave then deposited the first bond with a man of the name of Cator, and Cator filed his bill in order to prevent the parties at law from setting up their counter bond. Now, nothing could appear more fraudulent upon the face of it than a bond and a counter bond, because there you do enable the party to deal with the bond when you know you have a defence in your hand,—namely, a counter bond to set up as a defence to the legal obligation. Cator had no notice. The Lords Commissioners held that there was no equity, and Lord Thurlow, on the re-hearing, decided that it was not satisfactory. But he decided it upon this ground,—it came on before Lord Thurlow upon a re-hearing, when his lordship was of opinion that a special purpose appearing for the bond to Hargrave, and that it was not to give a general credit, the plaintiff was not entitled to the remedy prayed, and, therefore, affirmed the Lords Commissioners' order of dismission. I understand that decision to amount to this, that there being no general claim, but there being a special purpose, which was provided for by the counter bond, the man who took the original bond was not entitled to have any remedy against the counter bond, though he knew nothing at all of it. That is certainly the strongest case that can be upon this subject. There is a case of Turton v. Benson, in the 1st P. Wms. 496. The case itself was one where a man, upon the marriage of his daughter, had advanced a sum of money, and then he took a bond, which equity always holds is void, from the son-in-law, to return part of the marriage portion. The result was that the bond was deposited with Sir Theodore as an additional security. Mr. Benson died. Sir Theodore's demands were afterwards paid; then the administratrix assigned the bond for the general creditors of the deceased. "Now the Master of the Rolls declared that the creditors of Benson could not be in a better condition than Benson himself, and as to Sir Theodore Janssen, it was to be considered he had no legal title to this bond, but only an equitable assignment; and there-

Appeal allowed.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S COURT.

(Before Lord St. Leonards, L.C.)

Reported by C. H. Keene, Esq. of Lincoln's-inn, Barrister-at-Law.

May 22 and 26.

LUMLEY v. WAGNER.(a)

In a contract containing a positive agreement to do something, accompanied by a negative agreement not to do any other thing, the Court will restrain breach of the negative agreement, although it may not be able to enforce specific performance of the positive agreement.

The power which the Court has of preventing an act being done will not be exercised unless it can be exercised properly and beneficially.

The cases of Martin v. Nutkin, Barrett v. Blagrave, Robinson v. Byron, Collins v. Plumb, Morris v. Colman, Kemble v. Kean, Kimberley v. Jennings, Rolfe v. Rolfe, Clarke v. Price, Hills v. Croll, and Dietrichsen v. Cabburn, considered.

This was a motion, by way of appeal, to dissolve an injunction granted by his Honour the Vice-Chancellor Parker.

The facts of this case will be found at length supra, p. 127.

Bethell, Malins, and Martindale appeared in support of the appeal.

Bacon and H. Clarke appeared in support of the injunction.

The following cases were cited during the argument:—Martin v. Nutkin, 2 P. Wms. 266; Jervais v. Edwards, 2 Dr. & W. 80; Barrett v. Blagrave, 5 Ves. 555; Collins v. Plumb, 16 Ves. 454; Morris v. Colman, 18 Ves. 437; Clarke v. Price, 2 J. Wilson's C.C. 157; Robinson v. Byron, 1 B.C.C. 588; Swallow v. Wallingford, 12 Jur. 403; Kemble v. Kean, 6 Si. 333; Kimberley v. Jennings, 6 Si. 340; Dietrichsen v. Cabburn, 2 Phil. 52; Hills v. Croll, 2 Ph. 60; Escott v. The North Staffordshire Railway Company, 2 M. & G. 112; Baldwin v. The Society for Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, 9 Si. 393; Hooper v. Brodrick, 11 Si. 47; Rolfe v. Rolfe, 15 Si. 88; Stocken v. Brocklebank, 3 M. & G. 250; Whittaker v. Howe, 3 Bea. 382, 395; French v. Macale, 2 D. & W. 269; Cholmondeley v. Clinton, 19 Ves. 261; Smith v. Fromont, 3 Swanst. 330.

Bethell, in reply.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—This case arises out of a very simple contract, and without considering the difficulties which have been raised by the conduct of the parties, and independently of the question of law, the contract simply was, that this young lady should sing at the Queen's theatre for a certain number of nights, and that she should not sing elsewhere (for that is the true construction) during that period: nothing, therefore, can be more simple than the case on which I have to decide. As I understand the point which is taken, it is this,—that there is no case in which this Court ought to grant an injunction except those either connected with specific performance, or those where, if the injunction is to compel a party to forbear from doing an act, that injunction will execute the whole of the agreement, or the whole that remains to be performed; and, without going into other cases of injunction, I understand that to be the precise question. The point, therefore, first is, how that stands on principle; and the next, how it stands on authority. Before I consider it on principle, I will refer to some of the cases which have been cited by the defendant, the appellant, in support of the argument. The first case was that of Martin v. Nutkin. Now, that was a case in which the Court did issue an injunction, restraining an act from being done which could in no respect be considered as a case in which the Court could have granted any specific performance; but then that case falls within the second of the line of cases which the appellant admits are proper cases for the interference of the Court, because there the ringing of the bell had been agreed to be suspended by the churchwarden who represented the parish in consideration of moneys paid by Dr. Martin and his wife in the erection of a cupola and clock, and so on; a price in effect stipulated for by the parish in consideration of their relinquishing the great enjoyment of constantly hearing the church bell ringing at five o'clock every morning at certain periods of the year. The parish accepted the benefit, but rejected what they considered the obligation. Lord Macclesfield first granted the injunction, and the Lords Commissioners, on the hearing of the cause, made that injunction good for the lives of Dr. Martin and his wife. Now that therefore, however it may be explained, and falling, as it clearly does, within the second line of cases, is a case in which the Court did grant an injunction, prohibiting a man, or a clerk, or a parish, which is still more difficult, from doing an act in respect of which this Court could never have interfered by way of specific performance. Now, the next case which was cited was that of Barrett v. Blagrave. There a lease had originally been granted to the proprietor of Vauxhall of an adjoining public-house, with a stipulation that the tenant of that house should do no act which would damage the custom and the business of Vauxhall itself. After a considerable lapse of years the proprietors of Vauxhall filed a bill for an injunction, asserting that the then tenant of the house was breaking that stipulation, and Lord Rosslyn granted the injunction. Now, it was stated by Mr. Bethell, in arguing on that case, how remarkable the words of Lord Rosslyn were; for he said—"This is a case of

(a) It having been arranged that the point of law involved in this case, without entering into the merits, should be submitted to the Lord Chancellor, his lordship consented to hear it; and on that understanding gave it precedence over the other matters already on his lordship's list.

specific performance," and therefore the learned counsel said,—"This falls under the cases of specific performance." Now, when the case came before Lord Eldon, he dissolved the injunction, but upon a different ground. He said there had been so much acquiescence for so many years in the way that this public-house, or whatever it was called, had been carried on, that he could not interfere; but he also treated it as a case of specific performance. As far as the words go, therefore, the observations of those two eminent judges would seem to justify the argument which has been addressed to me. But how is it in point of substance? In effect it is a specific performance; because, a prohibition preventing a man from doing an act, does as effectually compel him to perform his agreement as an order for him to perform an act which he had agreed to do: the man had agreed that he would not open his house for purposes of entertainment, so as to damage Vauxhall. The Court said he shall not do so. That is a performance of the agreement in substance, for the man cannot do the act which he has agreed not to do. Therefore the term "specific performance" is aptly applied in such a case, but not in the sense in which it is now addressed to me on the first general head. It is no objection to the exercise of this jurisdiction, that the remedy is at law. The case of Robinson v. Byron, which has since been so often commented upon by subsequent judges, is a clear illustration of that point. In the case of the head of water, over which Lord Byron was abusing his right, the remedy was at law; but this Court (although there was an action depending) felt no difficulty in restraining Lord Byron, by injunction, from abusing the right of the head of water which he had. There are cases, such as that of Collins v. Plumb, in which the power of the Court, —which it was there admitted the Court had,—of preventing an act being done, will not be exercised, where it cannot be exercised properly and beneficially. In that case the negative covenant, not to sell water to the prejudice of the water-works, was not enforced by Lord Eldon, not because he had any doubt about the jurisdiction of the Court (for upon that he had no doubt), but because it was impossible to measure the damage which might be sustained by the different parties, and because, from the nature of it, the judges could not properly interfere. No one could tell every time the water was supplied whether it was or not to the damage of the water-works; and, whether right or wrong, that learned judge meant in no respect to break in on the general rule, whatever that general rule might turn out to be, but he merely refused to exercise the jurisdiction, on very sufficient grounds. Now, I took the liberty of calling attention at an early stage of the argument, to those familiar cases of attorneys' clerks, and surgeons' and apothecaries' apprentices, and the like, which are hourly arising in this court. On what principle do they proceed? I am told to-day that they are decided upon this principle—that they arise out of benefits received and out of concluded contracts, and that therefore the prohibition finishes everything and brings it within the second category. Now I do not apprehend that the jurisdiction of the Court depends upon that. Take the familiar case of a tenant, which is the exact case. It is said that springs out of the relation of landlord and tenant; but as that relationship is fixed by contract, consummated by contract, and determined by contract, what is there to differ that case from any other? There is no doubt that if there were a contract to grant a lease it would be specifically performed, and it will be executed even with a negative covenant, I may call it, not to do a particular act: the moment you are called upon to perform that covenant in this court by inhibition, you have to deal with that covenant alone; and I do not think any case ever occurred in this court, in that relationship, in which there were not many stipulations,—affirmative stipulations to be performed—in the very contract out of which the Court gives effect to the particular contract, and gives effect to it by inhibition. You will find affirmative covenants on the part of a tenant, and affirmative covenants on the part of a landlord, not one of which this Court will attempt to execute, but will leave it entirely to law to measure the damages and to give damages if it should think fit and it be right to do so; but if there be a negative covenant that the tenant, for example, will not cut timber trees or lop them, or any other given act of forbearance, the Court does not ask how much remains to be performed under the lease, or who has got to perform half a dozen covenants, and who twenty, but the Court acts on the negative covenant, and gives effect to that negative covenant; that is, specifically executes it, by prohibiting the man from doing an act which he is not entitled to do. Now those are cases, therefore, which appear to me to go in direct contradiction of the principles and rules which have been so elaborately and so well pressed upon me. In the case of an attorney's clerk, suppose the covenants were measured one by the other, as in this case: There, because the covenant does not arise until the man's servitude is ended, the point is raised at the Bar: you cannot apply for the injunction, and the injunction is not required, until the service is ended. It is not until the service has been performed, that the covenant which the clerk, or the assistant, or the pupil, whichever he may be, has entered into, comes into operation, by which he binds himself not to carry on business within certain limits of the place where he has been instructed, so as to be enabled by that means to take away the business of his master. I believe that is the only reason why you find in those cases there is nothing remaining to be done but to grant the injunction. Now this is a mixed case; it is a mixed case of this nature, not of acts to be done by the opposite parties; not that Mr. Lumley is to do one act and the young lady is to do another, which may, and has, in some cases, introduced a very important difference; but it is an act to be done by the lady alone, and an act of forbearance by the lady alone, not to break in on that act of forbearance which she has agreed to execute; the one is auxiliary to the other, the one is equal to the other; they are concurrent; one covers the other; they are co-equal; they are co-existent; they operate together; they are one in assistance of the other; they are not in opposition, there is no correlative right; there is no option. "I will sing for you during three months at your theatre, and during that time I will not sing for anybody else." It is in effect one contract. In all sound construction this Court cannot interfere; in all sound construction, and in all judicial construction, and according to the true spirit and essence and meaning of men's acts and agreements, to perform for three months at one theatre, must necessarily exclude the right to perform at the same time at another. The measure of performance is meted out according to the lady's capacity and physical power of singing, and the very correspondence and the whole of the contract shews that she was to do all that her physical power would enable her in the exertion of her vocal abilities to aid the theatre to which she intended to attach herself; and therefore if she had attempted,—if there had been no such stipulation—to perform at another theatre, she would have broken the spirit and true meaning of the contract as much as she has done by the contract into which she has already entered. Then as regards this being a mixed case; a mixed case of the sort that I have pointed out (and we shall see presently such cases in which there is one act to be done by the one party and another act to be done by the other), let us see for a moment what is the principle of the jurisdiction of this Court. The Court where it has jurisdiction, as in cases of specific performance, operates to bind men's consciences, as far as they can be bound, by a true and literal performance of their agreements; I have always thought that you may attribute a great deal of the right and fair dealing which exists between Englishmen to the exercise of that power in this Court; men are not suffered by the law of this country to depart from their contracts at their pleasure, and to leave the party with whom they have broken their contract to the mere chance of what a jury may give in point of damages; but this Court enforces, where it can, a literal performance, and it is that literal performance which is here called a specific performance, which I believe has tended to that good faith which exists, perhaps to so great a degree in this country, and certainly to a much greater degree than in many others. The jurisdiction, therefore, is a wholesome one; and although it is not to be extended, yet a judge would desert his duty who did not act up to that which his predecessors have handed down as the rule by which such wholesome jurisdiction is to be exercised. Now what mischief can be done by exercising that jurisdiction in this case? It is objected, that if I refuse this application I exclude this lady from performing at Covent-garden, whilst I cannot compel her to perform at the Queen's Theatre. I have not the means of compelling her to perform; I cannot force her to do so; it is a jurisdiction which the Court does not possess, and it is very proper that it should not possess it. But what cause of complaint has she, if I compel her to abstain from doing an act which in effect will compel her to do that which she ought to do? I exercise the jurisdiction wholly within the power of the Court; I touch no subject over which I have not jurisdiction; I go to the whole extent of the jurisdiction; I leave nothing unaccomplished by my order which it is in the power of this Court to accomplish; I leave nothing to the future. I am of opinion that this is a proper case for interfering; and in doing so I leave nothing unsatisfied: I leave nothing uncovered by the judgment which I shall pronounce. It is not, therefore, a case in which, by making an order on this particular covenant, I leave something not covered by it, because, as the one does cover the other, it is undeniable that if I restrain this young lady from singing at Covent-garden she cannot do so, and that the natural effect of that will be (although that is not the object which the Court has, because the Court cannot indirectly do a thing), the performance of the act which she is bound to do. Of this she has no right to complain. I deprive her of no right: I take away from her no remedy. She has no remedy at law. The remedy is not a remedy by her, but a remedy by Mr. Lumley against her. Because I have granted an injunction restraining her from doing an act which she was bound not to do, will be no answer to an action by Mr. Lumley against her, if she does not perform the act which she is bound to perform. It will be no answer at all; she would be amenable to this Court, and would no doubt be committed to prison if she did the act in breach of the injunction. Of what, then, has she to complain? My injunction will have this effect. It will prevent her from doing the act; it will, in the event of an action being brought against her, prevent any such amount of vindictive damages being given as a jury might probably be inclined to give, if she had carried her talents, and exercised them, at the other and rival theatre. It appears to me, therefore, that in the exercise of this particular jurisdiction, I shall do nothing contrary to the settled rule of the Court, but that I shall do simply that which the Court has power to do,—namely, to carry into effect, as far as I am enabled, the whole power of the Court on one subject, and that subject bearing—I say frequently bearing—for the purposes of justice, indirectly on the performance of that which I cannot enforce. But I do not continue the injunction upon that ground, because I disclaim doing indirectly that which I cannot do directly; but I say it is a fortunate thing for justice, if it does indirectly induce this lady to do the act which she is bound to execute. Now, this case has been very elaborately argued upon the authorities. I bow to the authorities; and I mean to execute the authorities. I am assuming no power of my own; I am giving no authoritative decision of my own; but I mean to follow the current of authority; and as there is no doubt a difference of decision between the learned judges who have preceded me, I mean calmly and patiently to consider in what the difference consists, and to arrive at the best conclusion I can, but meaning to follow the better authority as I find it. Now, the first case is that of Morris v. Colman. Mr. Colman was a part proprietor with Mr. Morris of the theatre in the Haymarket, and there was a partnership deed, and therefore a quasi partnership transaction, because this Court has thought proper to treat a theatre as a sort of trade, and so to bring it within the jurisdiction; but it is a jurisdiction which I shall very sparingly exercise. Mr. Colman, by that deed of partnership, agreed that he would not exercise his dramatic abilities for any theatre other than the Haymarket. Observe he did not enter into a covenant that he would write for the Haymarket, but it was merely a negative covenant that he would not write for any other theatre than the Haymarket. Now, Lord Eldon granted an injunction and maintained that injunction against Mr. Colman, and prevented his writing for any other theatre than the Haymarket; and the point which is in discussion at the Bar is, what was the ground upon which Lord Eldon assumed that jurisdiction? It was truly said for the appellant, that that was a quasi partnership; and it was said, moreover, that Lord Cottenham was mistaken in the case of Dietrichsen v. Cabburn, when he said that Lord Eldon had not decided that upon the question of partnership; and I agree that the observations which fell from Lord Eldon in the subsequent case of Clark v. Price, shew that he did mainly decide it on the ground of partnership; but he did not decide it exclusively on that ground. In the argument of that case by Sir Samuel Romilly and another counsel, they put, I may say, this very case. They said, "I suppose that Mr. Garrick had been living, and that he had entered into a covenant that he would not perform anywhere but at the theatre in the Haymarket." Lord Eldon, in his judgment took up that; and he said, Suppose that Mr. Colman and Mr. Garrick, if he had been living, had entered into a stipulation that Colman would not write for any other house than that in the Haymarket, and that Garrick would not perform at any other house than the Haymarket; he said, I can suppose that that would be a very valuable engagement on both sides, for the benefit of the theatre and for themselves, and he gives the clearest enunciation of his opinion, that that would be an agreement which this Court would enforce by way of injunction. Now, in a later case the late Vice-Chancellor Shadwell decided in a different way. He said that you must understand Lord Eldon to have spoken according to the subject-matter before him, and that he must there be considered to be addressing himself to a case in which Colman and Garrick had both an interest in the theatre. Now, I must take the liberty of entirely differing from that notion. Lord Eldon's words are perfectly plain. They are quite clear, and they want no comment upon them; they speak for themselves. He spoke of a case in which Garrick was a performer, and had nothing to do with the theatre beyond the engagement that he would not perform anywhere else; and that he makes a stipulation with this distinguished performer that if he would not perform anywhere else (he engaging Garrick of course), he, Colman, would not write for any other theatre. I think, therefore, after the greatest attention I have been able to give to that case (which of course I was sufficiently familiar with before), after the attention I have felt bound to give to it on the present occasion, I have come to the very clear conclusion that Lord Eldon would have granted the injunction in that case, although it had not been a case of partnership. Now, the case of Clarke v. Price was one in which there was no negative stipulation, and, therefore, does not properly belong to his argument; I admit, and every judge who has sat here has admitted, that you cannot enforce an affirmative stipulation to do such an act. Mr. Price, the reporter, agreed to sit in the Court of Ex. and to take notes and compose reports, and print and publish them for Mr. Clarke. He did not do so; and Mr. Clarke filed a bill for an injunction. Lord Eldon said, "I cannot compel Mr. Price to sit in the Court of Ex. and take notes and compose reports—I cannot compel him to do the act:" and he said—he did not say it in so many words, but the whole of his judgment shews that he proceeded (and so it has been considered in later cases) on the ground that there was no covenant that he would not publish with any other person. Now, the expressions in the judgment are, "I cannot compel him to do the act indirectly by compelling him not to publish with anybody else;" and then comes these important words—"because it is against the meaning of the agreement." Those are the precise words. Lord Eldon, therefore, was of opinion upon the construction of that agreement, that it would be against the meaning of the words of the agreement to affix to them a negative quality; that is to say, a covenant by implication, for there was none expressly, that Mr. Price would not only publish with Mr. Clarke, but would not publish with anybody else. Lord Eldon, therefore, very properly, as I conceive, refused that injunction; and that is a case which in no respect touches the question now before me, because I at once declare that if I had only to deal with that first covenant by Mdlle. Wagner that she would perform in this theatre, I should not have granted any injunction. Now, so far, I think the authorities are very strong, and the principles of the Court are very broad, against the appellant in this case. But then comes the case of Kemble v. Kean, before the late Vice-Chancellor Shadwell, which has, in point of fact, introduced with subsequent decisions, the difficulties on this part of the law. Mr. Kean entered into an agreement as nearly like this, I admit, as two agreements can be one to the other. Mr. Kean agreed that he would perform for Mr. Charles Kemble at Drury-lane, and that he would not perform anywhere else during the time that he had stipulated to perform for Mr. Kemble; Mr. Kean broke his engagement; a bill was filed, and Vice-Chancellor Shadwell was of opinion that he could not grant an injunction to restrain Mr. Kean from performing elsewhere, which he was going to do, or was actually doing, because he could not enforce the performance of any affirmative covenant that he would perform at Drury-lane for Mr. Kemble. It is precisely this case, and we shall presently see what the Vice-Chancellor himself says of it subsequently. Being pressed by that passage to which I have referred in the Lord Chancellor's judgment in Price v. Clarke, he put that paraphrase, or that commentary, upon it which I have referred to, that is, he says, "Lord Eldon only intended this to apply to a case of partnership." I have come to a different conclusion, and I am bound to say, that in my apprehension of the case of Kemble v. Kean, it was wrongly decided, and could not be maintained. Now, the same learned judge followed that decision in the case of Kimberley v. Jennings, and that was a case of hiring and service. The learned Vice-Chancellor, in that case, admitted that a negative covenant could be enforced in this court; and he quoted an instance within his own knowledge. He said, a nephew of a man had a great disposition for the stage, which was very distasteful to his uncle, and the uncle gave him a large sum of money upon his entering into an obligation not to perform within certain localities. The man received the money and broke the engagement, and the Court, as I understand his statement, enjoined the nephew from performing within the localities. He admits, therefore, the jurisdiction of the Court, if nothing but that remains to be executed. But the learned judge says, "Here the negative covenant does not stand by itself: it is coupled with an agreement for service for a certain number of years, and then for taking the defendant into partnership. This agreement cannot be performed in the whole, and therefore the Court cannot perform any part of it." I apprehend in that case that there were rights which one party had to be performed by another, which might prevent the Court from giving effect to such a negative covenant. That does not embarrass the Court in this case, because I have already shewn that both the covenants are on the part of the same person, and that person is Mdlle. Wagner. Now, so far we advance. Hooper v. Brodrick was quoted as a case in which the Court had refused the injunction of which we are now speaking. The case was this:—To lessee of an inn covenanted to use and keep it open as an inn during the time, and not to do any act whereby the license might become forfeited. In point of fact, the application was that he might be compelled to keep it open, and the Vice-Chancellor makes this observation:—"The Court ought not to have restrained the defendant from discontinuing to use and keep open the demised premises as an inn, which is the same in effect as ordering him to carry on the business of an innkeeper." So far all the authorities agree; it was an affirmative covenant, and this Court cannot indirectly enforce it. "But it might have restrained him from doing, or causing or permitting to be done, any act which would have put it out of his power, or the power of any other person, to carry on that business on the premises. It is not, however, shewn that the defendant threatens or intends to do or to cause or permit to be done any act whereby the license may become forfeited or refused; and, therefore, the injunction must be dissolved." That is an authority directly against the appellant; because it shows that the Court, if there had been an intention to break the covenant, a negative covenant, this Court would have granted the injunction. Another case has also been quoted (Smith v. Fromont) which contained no negative covenant, and consequently does not bear on this point; but it was an attempt to restrain by injunction a man from horsing a part of a road when the party who was applying for the injunction was himself incapable of performing his obligation to horse that part of the road. Lord Eldon shews how grievous a thing it would be to grant such an injunction, and refuses it. But see what Lord Eldon says on that case:—"The only instance that I recollect of an application to this Court to restrain the driving of coaches occurred in the case of a person who, having sold his business of a coach proprietor from Reading to London, and undertaking to drive no coach on that road, afterwards established one. With some doubt whether I was not degrading the dignity of this Court by interfering, I saw my way in that case; but one party had there covenanted absolutely against interfering with the business which he had sold to the other." That again is a direct authority against the appellant; because there Lord Eldon tells you that he could interfere in the case of a negative covenant, although he could not interfere in this case, because there was no such covenant. Now, that brings us down to the case, I think first before Sir Launcelot Shadwell, and then before Lord Lyndhurst, of Hills v. Croll. Some observations have been made upon a decision of my own in Ireland in the case of Jervais v. Edwards. There is no fault found with that decision, and I believe it is right, but it is quoted to shew that I was of opinion that this Court cannot interfere and specifically perform unless it can execute the whole of an agreement. I abide by that opinion, and I mean to do nothing in this case which shall in any manner interfere with that opinion. There the whole was properly a case for specific performance; but, from the nature of the contract itself, there was a portion of it which could not be executed. I said, "I cannot execute this contract, which is intended to be binding on both parties. I cannot execute a portion of this contract for one, and leave the other portion of the contract unexecuted for the other; and therefore, as I cannot execute the whole of the contract, I am bound to execute no part of it." But that has no bearing on this part of the case. Here I execute the whole duty of this Court; here I leave nothing unperformed which the Court can ever be called upon to perform; and here I do no injustice, but I simply order the lady not to do the act which she has covenanted not to perform. Now, in Hills v. Croll, Lord Lyndhurst followed the decision which has been referred to, and other authorities of the same sort. But in Hills v. Croll, he refused to enforce an injunction for a negative covenant. But observe on what grounds. It was a case in which one man had given to another a sum of money; and the man who had received the money covenanted that he would buy all the acids that he wanted from the manufactory of the other, and covenanted that he would take his acids from no other person. Lord Lyndhurst refused to prohibit the man who entered into that covenant from obtaining acids from any other quarter. Why did he do so? Because the person who had contracted with him had entered into a covenant to supply him with acids. Lord Lyndhurst therefore found these things correlative. He said "A. is to supply B. with acids; B. is not to buy acids anywhere else; I cannot compel A. to supply B. with acids; if, therefore, I restrain B. from obtaining acids from any other quarter, I actually paralyse his manufactory and ruin him, because I have not the means of compelling A. to supply the acids; and, therefore, I cannot interfere." Now, that case has never been rightly understood. It is supposed that Lord Lyndhurst decided that case upon a wrong principle; that he went on the decision of Jervais v. Edwards, and such cases; and that he applied the rule, which was properly applied there, improperly; but I do not think he did improperly apply it. I think, as you could not enforce the act, the benefit of which the man was to have who entered into the negative covenant, you are not to enforce the negative covenant if you could not enforce the affirmative covenant; for you would ruin the man whom you enjoined in case of the other man breaking his covenant, and you had no means of compelling him to adhere to it. Then comes the case which has been so much observed upon, before Lord Cottenham, of Dietrichsen v. Cabburn. That was a very simple case; and the only question is, upon what principle it was decided. It was a case in which a man, in order to obtain a great circulation for his medicine, through the instrumentality of a vendor of medicine, a man who very much dealt in advertisements, entered into a contract, that he should have a general agency, with 40 per cent. allowed, and that he would not supply anybody else with a discount of more than 25 per cent. He did so, and he was proceeding to employ other agents with a larger discount than 25 per cent.; and an injunction was applied for and granted; and it is said properly granted, because that was a case of partnership. Now, I wholly deny that it was a case of partnership. It was no case of partnership; it was strictly a case of principal and agent; and it was only because there was that negative covenant that the Court gave effect to it. It is impossible to read Lord Cottenham's judgment without being satisfied that he did not consider it to be a partnership. He called it in the nature of a partnership: he did not call it a partnership. In a popular sense, you may no doubt call it in the nature of a partnership, because they were both dealing with respect to the same subject, from which each was to have a benefit, but in no legal sense was it a partnership; and it is, in my apprehension, impossible to read that judgment of Lord Cottenham's without coming to the conclusion that he was of opinion that this jurisdiction could, in cases similar to this, be properly exercised. Now then, stopping there, it is impossible to have, as I conceive, a doubt on the law of the case; and the only matter which can create a doubt is the authority of Vice-Chancellor Shadwell. Now, with great submission, it appears to me that the whole of Vice-Chancellor Shadwell's authority is removed by himself: I am of opinion that the case of Rolfe v. Rolfe, which was the last case before him, entirely displaces the whole of his authority on the subject. In that case there were three persons, brothers, I suppose, who were partners as tailors; two went out of the trade on a consideration of 1,000*l*. each, and the third was to continue. One of the brothers who went out, entered into a covenant that he would not carry on the trade of a tailor, which he had just sold, within certain limits; the brother who had bought the trade entered into a covenant that he would employ that brother William as a cutter, at a certain allowance. The bill was filed simply for an injunction to prevent William from setting up as a tailor within the prescribed limits, and the Vice-Chancellor granted that injunction. It was objected, How can you grant this injunction when there is something remaining to be performed; for William has a right to be employed as a cutter; and you cannot enforce that and you do not attempt to deal with it? How can you, therefore, grant an injunction against William, restraining him from setting up as a tailor, when you cannot compel his brother, and do not affect to enter into the question of compelling his brother, to employ him? Now that was open to a difficulty which does not occur here; that was a difficulty which might have arisen in Hills v. Croll, before Lord Lyndhurst. But Sir Launcelot Shadwell held that to be no difficulty at all. He says, "They come here simply for an injunction, and I will grant that injunction, although I cannot give effect to that covenant to do the act in respect of which no performance is asked." Well, then, his own decisions in Kemble v. Kean, and in Kimberley v. Jennings, were quoted, and it was said, how can you decide this case in the face of those decisions? "Oh," he said; "those cases depend on a totally different rule. Kemble v. Kean, and Kimberley v. Jennings, were cases for specific performance, and the injunctions were asked as ancilliary to the relief, and as I could not grant specific performance, I would not grant an injunction." The learned judge no longer put it upon the inability of the Court to enforce a negative covenant, but he put it on the form of the pleadings. Whether that form was sufficient to justify his opinion, is a question with which I need not deal; but I am very clearly of opinion, that the case of Rolfe v. Rolfe does remove the whole of the authority of that learned judge on the subject. It was said in argument that the injunction in that case was prayed merely as ancilliary to the relief. It will be seen that that was not so. It was a case which merely went to the injunction, and had nothing to do with relief; and the learned judge himself tells you that if it had gone to that extent, he, following his former authority, would not have granted the injunction. The result, and I must say, the clear result, is, that in my mind, this point of law has been properly decided in the Court below; and, therefore, as far as regards that, I must confirm the decision. There has, no doubt, been much controversy on the point; and I am not surprised, and, indeed, I was going to say I am not sorry, that the point has been brought here for full consideration. Whether my authority may be considered sufficient to settle this question is another question; but I wish it to be distinctly understood, that I have no doubt whatever on this question as applicable to this case. Now that relieves the case entirely of the question of law, which was the only question proposed to be brought before me; but no doubt it has been necessary, and it was inevitable, to enter into the merits. It was insisted, and very properly insisted, that if upon the merits I ought not to give relief to Mr. Lumley, then, although the point of law be decided in his favour, I ought not to allow this injunction to stand. If the point of law was in his favour, then the merits have nothing to do with it; but if the point of law is in his favour, still he may be excluded from having the benefit of that point of law by the merits. Now, the merits, after a good deal of discussion, rest on two points. It was first of all said, that there was an abuse of confidence by Dr. Bacher. Now I never saw a case in which there was less foundation for that charge. This young lady seems to have got an introduction to Dr. Bacher, who, after hearing her sing, put himself in communication with Mr. Lumley, a friend of his. Mr. Lumley had a printed form, which contained many and onerous terms; and it contained the precise condition which is said to form, by its introduction ultimately into the agreement, the fraud in this case. That printed form it was which Mr. Lumley signed in the first instance with Dr. Bacher, and which was sent over to the Wagners. It was the general form of all engagements entered into by Mr. Lumley. They knew what were the common and usual terms of such an engagement. But what do the Wagners do? The father, repudiates it; and, according to his own account, sits down and draws the agreement which is now before me; and he omits every one of the penalties which find their way into Mr. Lumley's printed form, so that the young lady would have been entirely free, however she might misconduct herself, absenting herself from rehearsal or what not, and disregarding the rules of the theatre and the injunctions of the director, she would have been entirely free from all obligation as regards penalty, and he also omits the clause prohibiting her from singing at theatres or private concerts. Now, under those circumstances, Dr. Bacher going to Paris, takes back the agreement with him, with those omissions, upon which Mr. Lumley, acquiescing as to the omission of the penalties, says "It is impossible I can agree to this; I cannot give this young lady (the terms had been much increased), however great her abilities, this sum, unless I have some stipulation that she will not perform at other places." Dr. Bacher says, "I think it must have been omitted by mistake, I will insert it;" and he actually inserts it in his own handwriting, and signs it. This he does in Paris, on the 15th November, 1851, by the authority, he says, of the Wagners. Now the Wagners do not tell us when they received that, and it was for them to tell the Court when they did receive it; but it is perfectly clear they received it before the several letters were written which are now before the Court; and in no one of those letters do they complain, as an article to be rejected, of the terms which had been thus introduced. M. Wagner finds fault; but in that very act of finding fault, he acquiesces, he does not like it; but the very finding fault with it, without saying, "I will not be bound by it," is a clear acquiescence. It shews his knowledge; it shews his distaste for it; and the more he dislikes it, the stronger his acquiescence when he does not reject it. Now observe, when they received that document so signed, they had the most complete power to reject the contract altogether. They had the power to reject it; they could not be taken by surprise, because the printed form signed in the first instance by Mr. Lumley and sent to them, contained the clause. Then when the document which they themselves had drawn with the omission of that clause went back with that clause inserted, they might have rejected it; but instead of rejecting it, they accept it. It is much too late now to raise any objection on that ground, and, therefore I must overrule it. Now, the remaining question is a simple one. There were 300*l.* stipulated to be paid by Mr. Lumley, at a day named, to this young lady. I am told that the decision of the Court below was, that that was not a reciprocal obligation, and that it was an independent covenant. With this I cannot agree, and, so far, I come to a different conclusion. Whether time was so much originally of the essence of the contract either by the foreign law or the law of this country, I need not, under the circumstances of the case, inquire; because the time was open. But I am clearly of opinion that Mr. Lumley could not come here to enforce that contract, unless he had put himself right, by tendering at a proper and reasonable time the 300*l.* which he had stipulated to pay. Observe what a hardship it would be. The construction of law is perfectly clear in such cases: if you desire to enforce a contract, you must first put yourself right by performing your part of the contract, or being willing to perform it. If a performer abroad stipulates for a sum of money to be paid by the director here by a given day, and she is to arrive in London within a certain number of days after that payment, is not it apparent that the money ought to be paid to her, not simply as caution-money, but as money to enable her to perform her own obligation? She could not perform her obligation when you withheld from her those moneys which you were bound to give her to enable her to do so. I am of opinion, therefore, that Mr. Lumley was bound to pay the 300*l.* before he could enforce this contract. The question only remains, when was he bound to do it? By the original contract he was to pay it on a given day in March. Before that day arrived the young lady herself, by her father, applied to Mr. Lumley to enlarge the terms of the contract. The father writes on the 9th of March, but before that letter could have been received by Mr. Lumley, Dr. Bacher writes to M. Wagner to say that he, Dr. Bacher, had the 300*l.* to pay to Mdlle. Wagner, and asking her how and where he should send it. He swears to the contents of that letter, and he swears that he received no answer to it. Now what is the allegation on the other side? That they remember they did receive a letter of the 10th of March; but they contradict, in the flattest terms, the truth of Dr. Bacher's statement in regard to the contents of that letter. I called for the production of that letter, and I am not satisfied with the account given of its non-production. Dr. Bacher does not know that that letter is not in existence, and he swears, in the first instance, to the absolute contents of that letter as a positive fact, not knowing, as he could not know if he were swearing falsely, that the letter might not be produced the next hour in order to establish the falsehood of which he was guilty? If, therefore, a party at that peril makes such an affidavit in the first instance, and the other party merely says that it is not true that those are the contents, I must take the contents to have been as Dr. Bacher has sworn they were. Then, on the 18th, Mr. Lumley himself writes (the letter of the 10th having in the meantime been received): "I will do as well as I can about the rehearsal, and will postpone the appearance of the young lady." "I have sent to Dr. Bacher. Dr. Bacher has undertaken to pay you a bill of exchange for 300*l.* (which was before it was due), and by this time I have no doubt all is in order." What do M. Wagner and his daughter do? They never say a single word; they never raise the slightest complaint; they make no communication to Mr. Lumley; they make no communication to Dr. Bacher; but they actually remain satisfied with the money being, as they supposed, and as I suppose it was, in Dr. Bacher's hands. It was said this was not the money of Mr. Lumley. What has that to do with the case? Dr. Bacher was his agent. Madlle. Wagner had no right to inquire whence the money came. There was the money; and whatever may have been the embarrassments of Mr. Lumley, they cannot bear on this case. I must say that when the money was required—that is, when the necessity for producing it arose—the money was forthcoming, and would have been sent as a matter of course, if the lady had insisted upon it. On the 2nd of April this lady writes to Dr. Bacher, writes and asks him to come to Hamburgh in order to accompany her to London for the purpose of performing her engagement. There is not a word of complaint about the nonpayment of the money. The money would then have been paid in sufficient time if she had asked for it to answer the very object for which it was undertaken to be paid. Dr. Bacher comes to Hamburgh to this young lady, but instead of being ready to accompany him to London, she, on the 5th of April, entered into an agreement with Mr. Gye, and on the 6th she goes before a notary, and a most absurd declaration was then made in the absence of all parties, in which she declares she is released from the contract. This Court declares she is not released from the contract, and the power of this Court is more effectual than that of a notarial protest in Hamburgh, and she will find that she must obey the order of the Court, and that that transaction is a simple nullity. I think she has nothing to complain of. I think it is entirely her own fault, and that she intended, as far as she could, to prevent the money being paid in order to escape the liability of performing the contract. Therefore, although I find no fault on the point of law being raised, yet looking at the merits and circumstances of the case, I must refuse this motion with costs.

HILLS v. NASH.

Law of Evidence Acts, 6 & 7 Vict. c. 85, and 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99—Examination of plaintiff and defendant in support of plaintiff's case—Practice—Reception or rejection of evidence by the Master—Preliminary objection.

Quære, whether the stat. 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99, applies to causes at issue before the passing of Lord Denman's Act (6 & 7 Vict. c. 85)?

The Master ought either to accept or reject evidence, and then the parties objecting to either should come before the Court upon exceptions to the Master's report.

Where the Master merely says he doubts whether he can receive evidence, and the parties come to the Court to decide the point, that is irregular, and no arrangement by consent between the parties can give the Court jurisdiction, or waive the irregularity.

This was a motion by the plaintiffs on behalf of themselves, that they might be at liberty to exhibit interrogatories to examine themselves and the defendant, William Carpenter, as witnesses on their behalf. The bill was filed on the 27th of May, 1842, by the plaintiffs, Messrs. Hills and Busk, against Messrs. Nash (the executors of Thomas Nash, deceased) and William Carpenter, to establish a partnership in certain grain speculations, in the years 1840 and 1841, in which it was alleged that the plaintiffs, the said Thomas Nash, Carpenter, and two others named Wedd and Shepherd (who are now defendants), were interested in different proportions. Heavy losses were alleged to have been sustained, and it was sought to render the estate of Thomas Nash liable for one-eighth af the loss, that being his share in the alleged partnership. Wedd had been a factor of Thomas Nash, and it was said was largely indebted to him, and accordingly Mr. Nash's executors took an objection for want of parties, which was overruled by Lord Langdale on the 10th of July, 1843, when a decree was made establishing the partnership and directing an account. This order, however, was discharged by Lord Lyndhurst on appeal, his Lordship holding that Wedd and Shepherd were necessary parties, but giving the plaintiffs liberty to amend. The plaintiffs accordingly made Wedd and Shepherd parties, and examined the former as a witness (having previously released him in respect of his liability), and also another witness to prove the agreement of Thomas Nash to join in the speculation. On the 22nd of March, 1847, a decree was made similar to the former, from which the defendants appealed, on the ground that Wedd and Shepherd were parties whose interest was such as to render their testimony inadmissible; but Lord Cottenham on appeal held that it was admissible. The parties then went into the Master's office, and carried on interrogatories for the examination of witnesses; but it was found that the books themselves proved nothing to fix Thomas Nash; and the plaintiffs therefore found themselves in a difficulty in point of evidence. On the passing of the statute 14 & 15 Vict. c 99, the plaintiffs insisting that it was retrospective and applicable to this case, applied to the Master under the Act for an order to exhibit interrogatories to examine themselves and the defendant Carpenter, but the Master declined to give any such leave, doubting whether it was within his province to allow a party to be examined as a witness in the cause. The plaintiffs thereupon, with the consent of the defendant, now applied to the Court for an order for leave to exhibit interrogatories as already stated.

Roupell and Piggott for the motion.—The decree was, that the Master should be at liberty to examine on interrogatories as he might think fit; and evidence having been gone into in the Master's office, it was proposed to examine the plaintiffs and one of the defendants under the provisions of the Act to Amend the Law of Evidence (stat. 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99), which is applicable to all cases, and to suits pending at the time. We may examine witnesses, and come to this Court for that purpose, for Lord Denman's Act (6 & 7 Vict. c. 85), enacts that "In Courts of Equity any defendant to any cause pending in any such court may be examined as a witness on the behalf of the plaintiff, or of any co-defendant in any such cause, saving just exceptions."

R. Palmer and Smythe contra.—The bill was filed in May 1842, and Lord Denman's Act was passed in 1843, putting an end to incapacity of a witness from crime or interest, and rendering the defendants in a Court of Equity examinable as witnesses, "saving just exceptions;" but providing that nothing in the Act should apply to or affect any suit, action, or proceeding brought or commenced before the passing of the Act. So that Lord Denman's Act does not apply to this case, and even if it did, it would exclude the evidence in the present case. Now the scheme of the late Act, 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99, is to leave existing cases to the operation of Lord Denman's Act, except in one case, and that is in the first clause, which repeals the provision in Lord Denman's Act, sec. 1, against thereby rendering competent any party to any suit, action, or proceeding individually named in the record, &c., that is, in all cases to which Lord Denman's Act applies, namely, where the suit was commenced since the passing of the Act. It enacts, in short, that Lord Denman's Act shall govern all cases since that Act passed, but does not make it retrospective. Then comes the second section, which is comprehensive enough in its language, but is not retrospective.

Roupell in reply, said there had been decisions at law holding the Act to be retrospective, and the terms of the second section were large enough.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said he would express no opinion at present, but he had great doubts whether, according to the practice of the Court, he could entertain the question at all. The Master ought either to object to or accept the evidence tendered, and then the parties should come to the court upon exceptions. But to come there and say the Master doubted whether he would receive the evidence, and to ask the Court to decide, is not the regular course. If the Court was to act under those circumstances, it would be introducing great irregularity. His Honour had suggested this in the course of the argument to counsel, and though an arrangement should be made by consent between the parties, no such arrangement could give him jurisdiction. He would not express any opinion upon the point in question without giving it more consideration, but if he still felt the preliminary objection, on the matter being mentioned again, as strongly as he did then, he would make no order on the motion.

The matter was subsequently mentioned, but his Honour refused to make any order.

VICE-CHANCELLOR TURNER'S COURT.

Friday, April 30.

KER v. RUXTON.

Husband and wife — Separation deed — Separate estate.

A husband, in a deed of separation from his wife, B. covenanted with trustees to assign upon certain trusts for her benefit one-half of all property coming to her or him in her right, and it was agreed that the other half should belong to him absolutely. One of the trustees, by will, gave a share of her property to A. a married lady, for her separate use for life, with a general power of appointment on her decease. She gave another share to B. (the wife who was separated from her husband) for her separate use for life, with remainder to her children. By a codicil she revoked the bequest of this last share, and directed B. should have her share the same as A. to be at her own disposal, independent of her children, so that no part of it should be under trust, but to be "entirely at her own disposal, to give to any of her children who may be kind and dutiful to her:"

Held, first, that the husband's covenant did not extend to the property so bequeathed to his wife for her separate use, so as to entitle him to have a moiety of it; and Held, secondly, that the wife (B.) took an estate for her separate use during her life, and that she had a general power of appointment.

This was a suit instituted for the purpose of ascertaining the true construction of a deed of separation, and of a will and codicil. Mrs. Hay had three daughters—Mrs. Ker, Mrs. Ruxton, and another lady, Mrs. Rhode. After the death of Mr. Ruxton his widow married Mr. Artley. By her first husband Mrs. Ruxton had eight children. Before the second marriage a settlement was executed, but it was not affected by the questions in the suit. After the marriage between Mr. and Mrs. Artley a separation between them took place, and a deed, dated the 9th of July, 1842, was prepared, to which she and her husband were parties, as were Mrs. Hay, her mother, and another person, in the character of trustees on behalf of Mrs. Artley. By this deed, Mr. Artley covenanted with the trustees that the wife should be at liberty to retain for her absolute use all her jewels, trinkets, ornaments of her person, wearing apparel, &c.; and he also covenanted that he would assign to the trustees, or to such persons as Mrs. Artley should appoint, one half of all the real or personal estate to which she or he, in virtue of his marital right, should or might during the said intended separation become seised or possessed of or interested in. And it was by the same indenture covenanted that the remaining moiety of all such property should belong absolutely to Mr. Artley, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns. Two days later, namely, on the 11th of July, 1842, Mrs. Hay made her will, by which, after giving various specific legacies, she directed that her trustees, Mr. Rhode and Mr. Ruxton, should hold the whole of her residuary real and personal estates, as to one-third part, in trust for such persons and estates as her daughter, Mrs. Ker, should by deed or will appoint, and in default of appointment for Mrs. Ker during her life to her separate use, and after her decease in trust for her executors and administrators; and as to one other third part on similar trusts for the benefit of the testatrix's second daughter, Mrs Rhode; and as to the remaining one-third part in trust to raise thereout 300*l.* and to pay the same to Mrs. Artley for her separate use, or as she alone should appoint; and subject to raising and paying this sum of 300*l.* the residue of the remaining third part was to be paid to Mrs. Artley during her life to her separate use, without power of anticipation; and after her decease in trust for her eight children equally, or such of them as should survive the testatrix and attain the age of twenty-one years. The testatrix made a codicil to her will, dated 10th Aug 1843, by which she revoked all the dispositions she had made respecting the third part of her residuary estate in favour of Mrs. Artley, and directed and declared as follows:—"At my decease my said daughter, Mrs. Artley, may have her share of my funded property the same as her sisters, to be at her own disposal independent of her children, so that no part of it shall be put under trust as mentioned in my will, but to be entirely at her own disposal to give to any of her children, the Ruxtons, who may be kind and dutiful to her." Mrs. Hay having died several questions were raised, and among them what interest Mrs. Artley took under the will and codicil, and also how far her interest, whatever it was, was bound by the covenant in the deed of separation that is, whether she was bound to join in any assignment she might make of one moiety, and whether she was entitled absolutely to the other moiety.

Stuart and Faber, for Mrs. Artley.—The codicil only gives an unlimited power of disposition over the reversion of the property, subject to the life-interest to the separate use of Mrs. Artley. That codicil, by referring, as it does, to the dispositions in the body of the will in favour of the other daughters of the testatrix, clearly shews an intention that Mrs. Artley, like Mrs. Ker and Mrs. Rhode, her sisters, should take an estate for her life to her separate use, and that the unlimited power of disposition should be subject to that life-estate.

Rolt and Greene for Mr. Artley.—There is an absolute gift by this codicil to Mrs. Artley, not in favour of her children, but in favour of any one she chooses. The words referring to the Ruxtons do not raise a precatory trust, and she takes absolutely. If her children can take any thing it must be by her disposition in their favour, at her absolute will and pleasure; and if no such disposition be made, then they take under the codicil. The true construction, however, is that the whole one-third is placed at her entire command, and therefore subject to the rights of Mr. Artley, and bound by the covenant in the deed.

Sir W. P. Wood, Kenyon Parker, Chandless, Southgate, Allnutt, and Mackinson, were for the trustees and for other parties.

The cases of Prichard v. Ames, 1 Tur. & Russ. 222; Tyler v. Lake, 2 Russ. & Myl. 183; Douglas v. Congreve, 1 Keen, 410; and Blacklow v. Laws, 2 Hare, 49, were cited.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I am of opinion that the covenant in the deed of separation does not affect property afterwards coming to the wife, given to her for her separate use. The covenant secured to Mrs. Artley all linen and other articles which are usually known and considered as paraphernalia; but as it was contemplated that she would also become entitled to certain other property, there was the further covenant to convey or assign one-half of all real or personal estate to which she or he in her right should during the separation be entitled. The husband only covenants to "assign," not to join in or otherwise confirm any assignment. It is, therefore, only on the property on which his assignment could have any operation that this covenant was intended to operate. If I had any doubt on the point, the case of Douglas v. Congreve would be a sufficient authority; but this is a stronger case, for the wife, Mrs. Artley, is a party to this deed. This clause, therefore, does not give to the husband a moiety of the property, which after the separation should come to the wife for her separate use; and what makes this case still stronger, is, that the property here is derived from a person who was a trustee named in, and a party to, the very deed which contains the covenant in question. With regard to the questions as to the 300*l.* legacy, concerning which it was argued that the codicil changed the previous gift of that sum into a mere power of appointment over the whole, thereout of which it was raiseable, I am of opinion that the codicil operates thus: it places Mrs. Artley in exactly the same position as the two other daughters with regard to their respective third shares. The testatrix intended to extend the benefits previously given by her will. By her will she had thus disposed of Mrs. Ker's share, viz. she had given her a general power of appointment over it, subject to the life estate given to her for her separate use, and in default of appointment it was to go to her executors, administrators, and assigns; and the testatrix had made similar dispositions as to Mrs. Ruxton's share. But as to Mrs. Artley's share, the testatrix had by her will given her a general power of disposing only of 300*l.* part of it, and had given the bulk of it to Mrs. Artley's children, subject to their mother's life interest; she had reduced Mrs. Artley to the position of being a tenant for life of her third, with no disposing power, excepting as to the 300*l.* Taking up that position, she says in her codicil "Mrs. Artley is to have her share" (i. e. the one-third part, which in my will I have given to her and her children), not to go on the trusts mentioned in my will, but "the same as her sisters, and to be at her own disposal," i. e. with the same power of appointment as that previously given to Mrs. Ker and Mrs. Ruxton as to their shares, "independent of her children," i. e. the power of appointment is to be general. "So that no part of it shall be put under trust." If there was nothing more, this would be intelligible enough, but she adds the words "as mentioned in my will," i. e. the trusts for the benefit of herself for life, with remainder to her children. "But to be entirely at her own disposal to give to any of her children, the Ruxtons, who may be kind and dutiful to her." That is, the Ruxtons are not to take under the codicil, but under the appointment. I must, therefore, declare that the fund is subject to her general power of appointment and to her estate for life. It would be premature to say anything as to the rights of those in remainder: all I can now do is to dispose of it during her life for her separate use. There ought to be a sufficient portion of the assets retained in Court to indemnify the trustees against any breach of the covenants in the deed of separation, and if the parties cannot agree as to the amount before the decree is drawn up, there must be a reference to the Master to ascertain it.

VICE-CHANCELLOR PARKER'S COURT.

BARKER v. BARKER.

Will—Construction—Vesting.

A testator, by his will, gave to trustees 22,000l. upon trust, to invest, and to pay the interest to his daughter, A. B. for life, and after her death in trust as to the principal sum, "to divide the same equally between the children of A. B. who should be living at the time of her decease, and the lawful issue of such of them as should be then dead leaving issue, so as that the issue of each child so dying should take the part or share which their deceased parent would have taken if living, ... to be paid to all such children and issue upon their respectively attaining, and in case they should live to attain, the age of twenty-one years." And the testator directed the interest in the meantime to be applied for the benefit of such children and issue. A. B. left only two children her surviving, but C. D. one of her children, died in her lifetime, leaving four children, of whom two only survived A. B. the other two having died in her lifetime infants:

Held, that the fund was divisible into thirds, one to be taken by each of the surviving children of A. B. and that the remaining third was to be divided between the four children of C. D.

Philip Protheroe, by his will dated the 30th of August, 1803, bequeathed as follows: "I give and bequeath unto my sons, Edward Protheroe and Philip Protheroe, my executors hereinafter named, the sum of 22,000*l.* of lawful money upon trust to place the same out at interest, on such security or securities as they shall think proper and approve, and to pay the interest and income arising therefrom as the same shall be received unto my daughter, Elizabeth Barker, wife of William Barker, for and during the term of her natural life, and for her proper use and benefit, and from and after her decease, then in trust, as to the said principal sum of 22,000*l.* to divide the same equally between all and every the children of my said daughter, Elizabeth Barker, who shall be living at the time of her decease, and the lawful issue of such of them as shall be then dead, leaving issue, so as that the issue of each child so dying shall take the part or share which their deceased parent would have taken if living, and so as that such issue of each child shall take equally share and share alike, to be paid to all such children and issue upon their respectively attaining, and in case they shall live to attain, the age of twenty-one years; and in the meantime I order and direct that my said executors shall apply all or any part of the interest and income of the same sum of 22,000*l.* for and towards the support, maintenance, and education, or otherwise for the use and benefit of such children and issue respectively as my executors shall think fit." The testator died in Sept. 1803. Elizabeth Barker died on the 4th of August, 1844, leaving only two children, viz. Mrs. Miller and Susan Barker, her surviving. Besides these children Mrs. Barker had six others, all of whom, excepting one, died in her lifetime without leaving issue. Philip Barker, one of Mrs. Barker's children, died on the 13th of May, 1838, having had five children, of whom four survived him. Of these four children two died in Mrs. Barker's lifetime, infants, and the other two survived her, one having attained twenty-one and the other being an infant. The question submitted by this special case for the opinion of the Court was, as to the interests which the children of Philip Barker took in the bequest of 22,000*l.*

Russell and Metcalfe for the plaintiff, the son of Philip Barker, who had attained twenty-one.

Elmsley and Carter for the infant child of Philip Barker.

Bacon and C. Hall for the residuary legatees.

Piggott for parties in the same interest.

Walker and Hanson for the administratrix of the infant children of Philip Barker.

Metcalfe in reply.

The following cases were cited:—First, as to the time when the class was to be ascertained, Kevern v. Williams, 5 Sim. 171; Bennett v. Merriman, 6 Bea. 360; and Beck v. Burn, 7 Bea. 492: and, secondly, as to the vesting being contingent upon attaining the age of twenty-one, Bolger v. Mackell, 5 Ves. 509; Knight v. Cameron, 14 Ves. 389; Massey v. Hudson, 2 Mer. 130; Lister v. Bradley, 1 Hare, 10; Packham v. Gregory, 4 Hare, 396; Bull v. Pritchard, 5 Hare, 567; and Masters v. Scales, 13 Bea. 60.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said the questions in this case were two. The first was, what was the class of persons who took under the gift contained in the will; and the second was, whether the individuals of that class did or did not take interests which vested at the death of the tenant for life. The gift was after the death of the tenant for life, "to divide the same equally between all and every the children" of the tenant for life who should be living at the time of her death—and as to them no question arose—"and the lawful issue of such of them as should be then dead, leaving issue." Two constructions had been contended for: one, that the issue of a child who were to take were a class to be ascertained at the death of the child whose death was contemplated; the other construction was, that the class were to be ascertained at the death of the tenant for life. As he had before said, his Honour rejected the construction, which would include a child dying in the life of the person whose death was contemplated, for the gift seemed to be confined to the class of issue left by the child. The Court had to determine between the two constructions which he had mentioned; and it was a question of considerable doubt and difficulty. The general rule of law was not to import a contingency into gifts of this kind, and there could be no doubt, if the gift had stood alone, "to the lawful issue of such child as should die in the life of the tenant for life leaving issue,"—that the class would include all the children left by the child who died, and would not be confined to the children who happened to be in existence at the time of division. That was the general rule. The question was, whether, in the words of the will, could be found enough—not upon a conjectural ground merely—to take the death of the tenant for life as the period for ascertaining the class, and not the death of the stirps concerning whose issue there was this question. His Honour did not think there was enough in this will so to confine the gift. If the words "leaving issue" could be read as referring to issue living at the death of the tenant for life, then no doubt that might be the period for ascertaining the class. Having considered the words as carefully as he could, he thought "leaving issue" meant at the death of the child in question, and not at the death of the tenant for life, and that consequently the time for ascertaining the class was the death of such child. No doubt the testator, with respect to the children of the tenant for life, said that those only were to take who were living at the period of division of the property. It might very well happen that grandchildren, whose parents were dead, might have had issue in the life of the tenant for life, and making the gift to the grandchildren conditional in the same way, might take it away altogether in that event, without substituting their issue. He could not see how to import this additional contingency into this gift. The class to take, therefore, were the children left by Philip at the time of his death, who were four in number. Mrs. Miller and Susan each took one-third, and these four children of Philip took the remaining one-third between them. The next question was, whether these children left by Philip took vested or contingent interests, there being a clear gift to them, and he thought that this was the ordinary case of a gift, with a direction to pay superadded to it, which had not the effect of divesting the gift, although words of contingency were attached to the direction to pay at the age of twenty-one years. A gift to parties, to be paid to them at twenty-one, was not materially different from a gift to be paid to them if they attained twenty-one, or in case they attained twenty-one. His Honour, therefore, thought that these interests vested in the children of Philip, who survived him; and he might observe, that it seemed hardly possible to distinguish this case from Masters v. Scales, 13 Bea. 60, but he must say that he considered that the questions upon this will were very doubtful.

VICE-CHANCELLOR KINDERSLEY'S COURT.

Tuesday, July 20.

BROWNE v. PAULL.

Trust—Discretionary power of sale—Jurisdiction—Infant.

Generally the Court has no authority to direct a sale of the real estate of an infant, or to convert it, merely upon the notion that it would be for the benefit of the infant.

But where a testator had given all his real and personal estate to devisees in trust for certain purposes, and with the consent of an annuitant (his wife), to sell and dispose, and after her decease on their own authority to sell and dispose of all or any part thereof, and to invest the proceeds upon the trusts of the will, and the devisees in trust had renounced probate and disclaimed:

Held, that the Court had jurisdiction to direct a sale of such real and personal estate on bill filed by the infants, taking interests under the testator's will to carry the trusts of the will into execution.

And a purchaser of a portion of the real estate under the decree of the Court, Held liable to complete his purchase.

This was a motion by a purchaser under a decree for sale in the cause, to be discharged from his purchase of lot 26, on the ground that there was no jurisdiction in the Court to order the estate to be sold, and that thereby there was an alleged defect of title.

Charles Harwood by his will, dated the 7th of July 1841, gave all his real and personal property to Richard Knight and Thomas Burlton, their heirs, executors, &c. upon trust, out of the rents and profits of his said estate and effects, to pay an annuity to his wife for life, and subject to and charged with such annuity, upon trust to convey and assign, or transfer all his said freehold, leasehold, and other estate and effects unto and equally between his eight children (naming them), when and as they severally attained the age of twenty-one years; and in the meantime with certain trusts for the maintenance, education, and advancement of the children; and the will contained the following power:—"Provided also, and I do further declare and direct, that it shall be lawful for the trustees or trustee for the time being, of this my will, at any time or times, with the consent of my said wife, in writing, during her life, and after her decease, of their or his own authority, to sell or dispose of all or any part of my said freehold, leasehold, or other estate or effects, either by public sale or private contract, and to convey and assign the same when sold to the purchaser or purchasers thereof, and to invest the moneys to arise therefrom, and stand possessed thereof, and of the dividends, interest, and proceeds to arise therefrom upon the trusts aforesaid, or as near thereto as may be."

The will then provided for the appointment of new trustees, and for the indemnity of the trustees and executors, and it concluded by appointing Mrs. Harwood and the trustees executrix and executors thereof.

The testator died on the 9th of July 1841. His widow alone proved the will. Knight and Burlton, the executors and devisees in trust, renounced probate, and disclaimed the trusts of the will.

No new trustees had been appointed under the power for that purpose in the will. The bill was filed by the testator's children, all of whom were then infants, as some of them were now.

A decree had been made directing the usual accounts and other references, and subsequently a decretal order had been made referring it to the Master to inquire if it would be for the benefit of the infants that the real estate should be sold, and if so, to proceed to a sale. The Master having found that it would be for their benefit, a sale had been proceeded with in the usual way, and the party now moving had been declared a purchaser of one of the lots at such sale.

W. P. Jolliffe, in support of the motion to discharge the purchaser from his purchase, relied mainly on Calvert v. Godfrey, 6 Beav. 97, as deciding that the Court had no authority to convert or sell an infant's estate upon the idea that such sale would be for the benefit of such infant, and that consequently no complete title to the land could be made to him, the purchaser. That the devisees in trust having disclaimed, the Court would not carry out a mere discretionary trust.

Craig and Pownall, contrà, contended that the present case was dissimilar in its circumstances from Calvert v. Godfrey. In that case the owner of the estate ordered by the Court to be sold, had died intestate, and consequently no power of sale could have been given. Here, on the contrary, the testator had himself provided for a sale under certain circumstances.

Jolliffe in reply.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said, he did not think Calvert v. Godfrey governed this case. In the propriety of that decision he quite acquiesced. Here no trustees had been appointed in the room of those who had disclaimed. Now supposing those trustees had not disclaimed, but conceiving as they might have done, there were other difficulties in the case, and had come to this Court to carry out the trusts of the will under the decree of the Court,—could it be said that the Court then would not have had jurisdiction to refer it to the Master to report if a sale would be beneficial, and if so, to proceed to a sale? He thought not; here there was by the testator's will a proviso for a sale; and he (the Vice-Chancellor) thought there was nothing to prevent the Court from executing the trust, the trustees of the testator having disclaimed, and no others appointed in their room. He considered it a general rule that where trustees refused to accept the trusts, the Court would see that those trusts were properly carried into effect. Here the testator had ordered that the nature of the property might be converted, if in the exercise of a proper discretion. He thought the purchaser would be quite safe in accepting the title.

No order on motion. The purchase-money to be paid into Court.

Trustee Relief Act—Practice—Costs.

Where a trust fund has been paid into court under the Trustee Relief Act, the costs of an application by the tenant for life for payment of the dividends to her ought not to come out of the corpus of the fund.

In this case a sum of 6,000*l.* Consols, which, by the will of a Mr. George Bangley, was given to trustees, upon trust for a Mrs. King for life, for her separate use, and after her death, and in default of children, in trust for three charitable institutions, had been paid into court, under the Trustee Relief Act, by the sole surviving trustee.

The trustee and the tenant for life now petitioned for the payment to the tenant for life of the dividends of the trust fund during her life, and that the costs of the petition might be paid out of the corpus of the fund.

There were no children of the marriage, and the charities had not been served with the petition.

Goren, for the petitioners, cited, as to costs, Ross's Trust, 15 Jur. 241, V.C. Lord Cranworth, and Re Field's Settlement, Rolls, 11 June, 1852, 19 Law T. 253, in both of which cases the costs of an application such as the present had been ordered to be paid out of the corpus of the fund, and asked that if necessary the petition might stand over so as to enable the charities to be served.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said,—Even if the parties entitled in remainder were here I should not make the order asked for. There is a difference of opinion as to the practice to be adopted in these cases; I conferred, not long ago, with the other equity judges on this very point, and there is not, I regret to say, an unanimity of opinion on the subject. Until the practice is settled, I shall act upon my own view of what is right. I do not think it right that the parties entitled in remainder should bear the expense of an application which is solely for the benefit of the tenant for life. This application does not in any way relate to the corpus, but is for the sole benefit of the tenant for life. I do not think that the analogy drawn in the case of Ross's Trust between the costs of such applications as the present and the costs of an administration suit is a sound one. The costs of paying the fund into court, and the costs of all applications which have reference to the corpus, are properly payable out of the corpus, in the same manner as the costs of ascertaining and realising the fund in an administration suit are payable out of the estate. Such applications as the present are, however, more analagous to applications by parties entitled to specific funds after they have been carried over to a separate account, in which case the costs of an cation by a tenant for life of any one such specific fund would have to be paid by such tenant for life, and would not be payable out of the corpus of the fund, and I think I must follow the same rule in this case.

MACKENZIE v. THE SLIGO AND SHANNON RAILWAY COMPANY.

Joint-stock Company—Winding-up Acts—Order for dissolution, effect of—Suspension of right to sue until proof of debt before the Master—Pleas in bar.

To an action against an incorporated railway company commenced after the passing of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 108, and before the passing of 13 & 14 Vict. c. 83, the defendants pleaded in bar—1st, that the Lord Chancellor had made an order for the dissolution of the company under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 45, and before the passing of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 108: 2ndly, that an official manager had been appointed, that no permission had been given by the Master to commence or proceed with the action, nor had the plaintiff proved his debt before the Master:

Held, upon demurrer, that both parties were bad—1st, because the order of dissolution alone did not take away the right of action; and 2ndly, because the appointment of the official manager only suspended the right of action until the plaintiff had proved his debt before the Master, and only entitled the defendant to an order for a stay of proceedings until that had been done.

Declaration in debt upon an award. The writ was issued on 8th March, 1850. 4th plea. That defendants were incorporated by Act of Parliament in August 1846; that on the 10th April, 1849, a petition was presented for the dissolution of the company under the Winding-up Act (11 & 12 Vict. c. 45), and an order made by the Lord Chancellor for its dissolution on the 17th May, 1849.

5th plea. That on the 2nd June, 1849, before the commencement of the action, an official manager was appointed; that no permission had been given by the Master to commence or proceed with this action; and that the plaintiff had not proved or exhibited or made any proof of his debt before the Master.

Demurrer to both pleas.

Tuesday, June 1.—Raymond in support of the demurrer. The stat. 11 & 12 Vict. c. 45, did not apply to railway companies incorporated by Act of Parliament; and the Amendment Act 12 & 13 Vict. c. 108, makes the intention of the Legislature upon that subject quite clear.

Wordsworth, contrà, referred to sec. 30 of 13 & 14 Vict. c. 83, as giving validity to all proceedings which had taken place under any previous order of dissolution.

Raymond.—That only gives validity to the proceedings from the day on which that Act passed, viz. August, 1850; and therefore, when this action was brought the plaintiff could not prove his debt before the Master. Supposing, however, that the Winding-up Act of 1848 applies to this case, still the pleas are bad. The fourth plea is no answer to the action, because it clearly was not the intention of the Legislature that the winding-up order should at once put an end to all the liabilities of the company. (He referred to secs. 50, 52, 53, 58, 70, and 73, as shewing that the continuance of actions, notwithstanding the order, was contemplated.) Nor is the fifth plea an answer to the action. It is founded upon sec. 73 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 45, which provides that after the appointment of an official manager no creditor shall, except so far as the Master shall permit, have power to commence or proceed with any action until after proof, or exhibiting such proof as he may be able of his debt before the Master; and that it shall be lawful for a judge, upon summons, to order a stay of proceedings until after such proof. The effect, therefore, is only to suspend the action; and the remedy given is a stay of proceedings by order of a judge. It would be strange if this could be pleaded in bar to the action, which was commenced at a time when, by the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 108, the proceedings before the Master had been stopped altogether. (Hitchcock v. May, 6 Ad. & E. 943; Edwards v. Sherren, 11 Mee. & W. 595.) [Lord CAMPBELL, C.J.—The very scope and object of the stat. 13 & 14 Vict. c. 83, is retrospective. COLERIDGE, J.—It takes up the previous proceedings as valid, and says that they may be proceeded with. Then if the proceedings under the Winding-up Act are valid, do they not prevent such an action as this?] No; the defendant ought to apply to a judge for an order staying the proceedings until proof. Moon v. Durden, 2 Ex. Rep. 22; and Marsh v. Higgins, 19 L.J. 297, C.P. are strong authorities against construing Acts of Parliament so as to deprive parties of vested rights.

Wordsworth, contrà.—Sec. 30 of 13 & 14 Vict. c. 83, is quite conclusive as to the validity of the proceedings under the Winding-up Act. (Ex parte Barber, 1 McN. & G. 176.) And that being so, the plaintiff is prohibited from commencing as well as from proceeding with any action previously commenced. (Prescott v. Hadow, 5 Ex. Rep. 726; Macgregor v. Keily, 4 Ex. Rep. 801; Thompson v. The Universal Salvage Company, 3 Ex. Rep. 310.) In this case the official manager was appointed before the commencement of the action.

JUDGMENT.

Lord CAMPBELL, C.J. now delivered the judgment of the Court.(a)—In this case, upon a demurrer to the fourth plea in bar of the action, the question has been raised whether the dissolution of the company under the Joint-Stock Companies Winding-up Act, 11 & 12 Vict. was a bar to the action. And upon the demurrer to the fifth plea, the question is raised, under sec. 73 of the same Act, whether the action—no proof of the debt having been made or exhibited before the Master—was wrong. We are of opinion that there ought to be judgment for the plaintiff on both these demurrers, the pleas being bad. There is no provision in the statute taking away the common law remedy for a debt, on dissolution under the statute; on the contrary, by sec. 58 it is enacted that nothing in the Act shall alter or affect the rights and remedies of creditors; and, with respect to prohibiting any action after an order for dissolution until proof before the Master under sec. 73, it is clear that no bar to the action is created, but a suspension until proof is made of the debt; after which the creditor is at liberty to proceed with the action, as was decided in Prescott v. Hadow, 5 Ex. 730. All that the 73rd section provides is a power, whereby there may be a suspension of the action until after proof, by application for an order to stay proceedings. Full effect is given to all the other parts of the section by holding that the action may be stayed by order until after proof, but is not barred altogether. Therefore, judgment will be for the plaintiff.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

REG. v. THE INHABITANTS OF LONGWOOD.

Poor-rate—Waterworks for district of two town ships—Reservoirs and apparatus in each—Restrictions on supply and charge—Commissioners' rate for one township.

Upon appeal by Commissioners of Waterworks, created and carried on under two Local Acts, for the purpose, under certain restriction of price, of supplying with water the townships of L and H. against a rate for the relief of the poor of L. made on them in respect of their occupation of the waterworks in L: the Sessions found that the sum of 190l. was the rateable value per annum of all the reservoirs, pipes, and other apparatus of the company in L. taken in connection with and as part of the entire waterworks in L. and H and that the amount was made up of the sum of 300l. being the net annual value which the Sessions assigned to the reservoirs, and the sum of 190l. being the net annual value of the pipes and other apparatus in L. as shewn by the appellants and found by the Sessions. 2. That if the whole works in L. ought to be assessed at their intrinsic value in that township, and with reference to the profit that could be derived from them in L. alone, without taking into account their connection with the works in H. their net rateable value ought to stand at 150l. and no more. 3. That a yearly tenant of the entire waterworks, if relieved from the restrictions contained in the commissioners' Acts of Parliament, and able to exercise his discretion as to the amount of waterworks and rates, might calculate with reasonable certainty on a gross revenue of 3,000l. from the works, and that, after deducting the sum of 800l which the Sessions considered to be the fair average of the current annual expenses allowable under the circumstances: and the sum of 1,100l which was proved and admitted by the respondents to be a proper annual deduction in respect of repairs, renovations, and tenant's profits; the residue of the 1,100l. represents the net rateable value per annum of the entire works. 4. That if such yearly tenant is to be considered as subject to the restrictions in the Act, he could make no profit at all by his tenancy. The statutable restrictions were to furnish water gratuitously in case of fire, and for use on the highway; 10,000 gallons for watering the streets; and to the consumers at certain specified rates, so calculated that the amount of the water-rents in any one year should not, after payment of the annual expenses, exceed 7½ per cent. upon the amount of the debt which should be owing by the commissioner in respect of the waterworks:

Held, per Coleridge, J. that the rent ought to stand at 490l. which must be taken to be the proportion of the sum of 1,100l. mentioned in the third finding as representing the net rateable value per annum of the entire works, apportioned by the Session to L. on the principle mentioned in the third finding.

Held, by Wightman and Compton, JJ. that the case suggested by the Sessions of a tenant entitled to charge any rate he might please for water, did not furnish a criterion for the amount of the rate in respect of property of this peculiar description, but that as the sum of 490l. was the estimated net rateable value per annum of all the reservoirs, &c. in L. in connection with and as part of the entire works in L. and H. it was the proper amount of the rate.

Upon hearing the appeal of the Commissioners of the Huddersfield Waterworks against a rate or assessment made for the relief of the poor of the township of Longwood, in the said riding, allowed on the 30th of March, 1850, it was ordered that the said rate appealed against be amended by reducing the assessment upon the said appellants to the sum of 490l. as the net rateable value of the reservoir, banks, pipes, lands, and hereditaments in the said town of Longwood, and that the difference between that sum and the sum paid by the appellants upon such assessment be refunded, subject to the opinion of the Court of Q. B. upon the following

CASE.

On an appeal by the Commissioners of the Huddersfield Waterworks against a rate made on or about the 30th of March, 1850, for the relief of the poor of the township of Longwood, in the West Riding of Yorkshire, in which the said commissioners were rated at the sum of 1,010l. for and in respect of certain reservoirs, banks, pipes, lands, and hereditaments, situate in the said township of Longwood, the sessions held at Pontefract, in the said riding, in April, 1851, allowed the appeal, and reduced the rate to 490l. subject to the opinion of this Court.

The said commissioners are occupiers of the abovementioned lands and hereditaments, upon part of which the said reservoirs and pipes are constructed and laid. The commissioners purchased the said lands, and constructed the said reservoirs and pipes under and by virtue of an Act of Parliament passed in the seventh and eighth years of the reign of Geo. 4, intituled "An Act for supplying with Water the Town and Neighbourhood of Huddersfield, in the West Riding of the County of York." This Act, and also another Act passed in the eighth and ninth years of the reign of her present Majesty Queen Victoria, intituled "An Act to alter, enlarge, and amend an Act for supplying with Water the Town and Neighbourhood of Huddersfield, in the West Riding of the County of York," accompanied this case, and was considered to form part of it.

The following facts were found by the Sessions:—After the passing of the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, and before the passing of the said Act of the 8 & 9 Vict. two reservoirs, one for the supply of water to the town of Huddersfield, and the other as a compensation-reservoir to prevent injury to certain owners and occupiers of mills in Longwood, were constructed on part of the lands in Longwood so purchased and occupied by the said commissioners, of the dimensions, in the manner, under the powers and provisions, and subject to the conditions and restrictions contained in the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, and which two reservoirs have respectively been used ever since their construction, until the passing of the above-mentioned Act of 8 & 9 Vict. in the manner and subject to the conditions and restrictions, and in strict conformity with the powers mentioned and contained in the said stat. of 7 & 8 Geo. 4. And since the passing of the Act 8 & 9 Vict. the commissioners have constructed another reservoir in Longwood, and also occupied the same in manner and subject to the conditions and restrictions, and in strict conformity with the powers mentioned and contained in both the abovementioned statutes, as far as the same are respectively applicable. The commissioners appointed under the above Acts have borrowed, under the powers thereby given to them, money amounting to 20,000l. and have laid down pipes and other conveniences in Longwood for conveying water to the township of Huddersfield, by means of which a constant and ample supply of water has been and is provided under the said Acts to the said township of Huddersfield. The commissioners have received the rents, which by their said Acts they have been from time to time entitled to demand, for such supply of water to the said township of Huddersfield; and the commissioners have, from time to time, applied rents so received to the purposes of the said Acts; and the said water-rents have been reduced by the commissioners to one-half the amount which was originally charged by them for such supply of water, by authority of the said Acts, to the said township of Huddersfield. The compensation clauses which were inserted in the said Acts to prevent injury to individual owners and occupiers of mills in Longwood have been strictly observed and fulfilled by the commissioners, and the compensation reservoir has been made by them as aforesaid for the exclusive use of the said owners and occupiers of mill property in Longwood, and has been used by them accordingly, on part of the land for the occupation of which the commissioners are now rated, by which the said mill property and the said mill-owners have been protected from injury. The said mill-owners obtaining water or deriving benefit from the said compensation reservoir, do not pay, nor have they ever paid, any rent or consideration in money or otherwise to the said commissioners; every thing required to be done, observed, or performed by the said commissioners by the above Acts of Parliament, or either of them, either for the reservation of the rights of the inhabitants of Longwood, or other parties mentioned in the said Acts, or either of them, or for any other purpose whatever, has been done, observed, and performed by the said commissioners. The works bring no water to Longwood, but they detain water in that township in winter, and the supply of water in that township in winter and the supply of water to Longwood has not been interrupted since the passing of the above Acts, or of either of them. The said owners of mill property in Longwood have been benefited by the works made under the said Acts. The Session also found —1st. That the above sum of 490*l*. is the estimated net rateable value per annum of all the reservoirs, pipes, and other apparatus of the company in Longwood, taken in connection and as part of the entire waterworks in Longwood and Huddersfield, and that the amount is made up of the sum of 300*l*. being the net annual value which the Sessions assigned to the reservoirs, and the sum of 190*l*. being the net annual value of the pipes and other apparatus in Longwood, as shewn by the appellants and found by the Sessions. 2nd. That if the whole works in Longwood ought to be assessed at their intrinsic value in that township, and with reference to the profit that could be derived from them in Longwood alone, without taking into account their connection with the works in Huddersfield, then their net rateable value ought to stand at 150*l*. and no more. 3rd. That a yearly tenant of the entire waterworks, if released from the restrictions contained in the commissioners' Acts of Parliament, and able to exercise his discretion as to the amount of water rents and rates, might calculate with reasonable certainty on a gross revenue of 3,000*l*. from the works, and that after deducting the sum of 800*l*. which the Sessions considered to be the fair average of the current annual expenses allowable under the circumstances, and the sum of 1,100*l*. which was proved and admitted by the respondents to be a proper annual deduction in respect of repairs, renovations, and tenant's profits, the residue of 1,100*l*. represents the net rateable value per annum, of the entire works. 4th. That if such yearly tenant is to be considered as subject to the restrictions in the Act, he could make no profit at all by his tenancy. 5th. That the total outlay of the commissioners in Longwood has been 115-189th parts of the entire outlay, in the two townships. That the present actual value of the respective works in the two townships may be assumed for the purposes of this case to be equal. That the area occupied by the reservoirs and the apparatus (consisting of mains and pipes), in Longwood, is 28 acres and a quarter, out of which the reservoirs comprise 27 acres, and the apparatus one and a quarter acres; and the area occupied by the like apparatus in Huddersfield is seven acres. That the length of the apparatus of mains and pipes in Longwood is to the length of the like in Huddersfield, in the proportion of five to twenty-six, thence it follows that, if the total net annual value be apportioned in the ratio of the outlay, the rateable value of the whole works in Longwood will be 660*l*. and a fraction. If it be apportioned in the ratio of the actual value of the respective works in the two townships, the rateable value of the works in Longwood will be 550*l*. If it be apportioned in the ratio of the area or acreage occupied by the whole works, the rateable value of the works in Longwood will be 880*l*. and a fraction. 6th. If the reservoirs be rated separately at the value specified above, and deducted from the total net value of the entire works as found above, and the residue be apportioned in the ratio, either of area or the lengths of the apparatus in the respective townships, then the net rateable value of the whole works in Longwood will, on the first supposition, be 441*l*. and a fraction. If the Court of Q. B. should be of opinion that the rateable value of the property and works of said commissioners in Longwood should be fixed at either of the other sums so found by the Sessions as above mentioned, the said sum of 490*l*. is to be altered to such sum as this Court may decide to be such rateable value, and the judgment of the Sessions to be altered accordingly. If the Court of Q. B. should be of opinion that the sum of 490*l*. is the proper rateable value of the property and works of the said commissioners in Longwood, the judgment of the Sessions to stand confirmed.

JUDGMENT.

Friday, June 18.—COLERIDGE, J.—In this case, argued before my brothers Wightman, Crompton, and myself, the question was, at what amount the Commissioners of the Huddersfield Waterworks ought to be rated for the relief of the poor in respect of certain reservoirs, banks, premises, lands, and hereditaments, situate in the said township, and the Sessions have found that 490*l*. is the estimated net rateable value of the premises above mentioned, taken in connection with, and as part of the entire waterworks in Longwood and Huddersfield. It was contended upon the argument for the respondents, that the rate must stand for the amount at which they are assessed, unless it could be shewn that they ought to stand higher, and it was contended that this was shewn in the following finding of the Sessions: "That a yearly tenant of the entire waterworks, if released from the restrictions contained in the Commissioner's Acts of Parliament, and able to exercise his discretion as to the amount of water-rents and rates, might calculate with reasonable certainty on a gross revenue of 3,000*l*. which, after making the proper annual deductions, will leave the sum of 1,100*l*. as the net rateable value per annum of the entire works." The Sessions having found that, the respondents insisted that, in order to shew the true rateable value, the tenants must be considered to be subject to the statutable restrictions, which are understood to be an obligation to furnish water gratuitously in case of fire, and for use of the highway; 10,000 gallons for watering the streets, and to the consumers at certain specified rates, so calculated "that the amount of the water-rents in any one year do not, after payment of the annual expenses, exceed 7½ per cent. upon the amount of the debt which shall be owing;" the effect of which would be, that when the debt was extinguished, the rents would be equal to the expenses. The cases mainly relied on, and from which the true principles are to be gathered, are Reg. v. Longwood and Reg. v. Kentmere. In the former case, which related to the same subject, and in which the preliminary facts were stated in the very same words that are now used, the only point decided was the rateability of the commissioners; but the Court came to their decision in this way,—"If private speculators," said they, "had invested capital for the supply of water at a profit, and had so become occupiers of the premises in question, in Longwood, they would have become rateable (Reg. v. The Overseers of Mile-end Oldtown), and the money paid for the rate would be part of the costs of the supply, and would fall on the consumer. The private Acts enable a portion of the inhabitants, by commissioners, to obtain the supply without the intervention of a water company; but, as far as respects the rights of other townships, this portion of the inhabitants, by their commissioners, stand in the situation of an ordinary water company, and have no greater right to exempt from rateability a portion of land in Longwood, and so to obtain water at a less cost than such a company would have had." (13 Q.B. 125.) The Court, therefore, arrived at the conclusion, that the commissioners were rateable, by considering them as the representatives or trustees for and as identical in interest with a certain portion of the inhabitants of Huddersfield, and not merely as public officers acting for the public, and having no interest but as members of the public. In Reg. v. Kentmere this view was adopted, and the rateability of the commissioners was there established. These cases appear to me to have been decided with great propriety, and I think that they ought to govern our decision upon the question immediately before us. It is contended that the measure of the rateability is the amount of rents the commissioners in fact receive from the consumers of the water, as they are restricted to that by the private Act, and consequently it must also be contended that, when all the outstanding incumbrances are paid off, and these rents are, under section 74, reduced so that the proceeds therefrom only cover the current expenses, there would then be left nothing on which they could be rated at all. This might be true if the commissioners were like a water company or body of speculators, separate in interest from the consumers, and being also occupiers of property which the Legislature had made wholly unproductive of profit to them; and whether that should be the result of inherent and natural causes, or the act of the Legislature, the same consequence might follow, the subject-matter of the rate would de facto have been limited in the first instance, and gradually cease to exist. The inhabitants of Longwood would have had reason to complain if a portion of the rateable property had been withdrawn from Huddersfield, but this is prevented by looking to the commissioners and the consumers as one body, as trustees and cestui que trust, as they were, and when so considered the compensation clause becomes no more than an agreement between themselves as to the terms on which the latter may enjoy the benefits which are derivable therefrom; these are the supply of water for the various purposes enumerated in the Act of Parliament, and these arrangements have no bearing whatever on the question of rateable value as between themselves and the inhabitants of Longwood. If some munificent person had provided funds to bear the whole expenses of the works so as that the commissioners should supply the water gratuitously to the consumers, it was not contended that thereby the occupation would cease to be beneficial, and the commissioners, for the water supplied to the consumers, would be rated as before. The Sessions found, that if a supposed yearly tenant was to be considered as subject to the restrictions in the Act, he could make no profit at all by his tenancy. That is true, for substantially he can only receive such a return from the consumers as would be equivalent to the expenses. This seems to shew that the restriction can have no bearing upon the question of the amount of the rate. It is then said we may discard that consideration and make the commissioners pay on the actual amount which they might, under other circumstances, receive. The answer is, in substance, that the commissioners are not the occupiers of the property rated, nor do the water-rents represent the rateable value of the land: the consumers are the occupiers really, and they are really rated, and they pay the rate, and the use and enjoyment of the water constitute the rateable value. Indeed, the Court has no difficulty, on the question raised by the third and fourth findings of the Sessions. As to the suggestion made, that the commissioners should pay as an ordinary water company would pay, subject to the ordinary restrictions of every water company, the answers seem to be, first, that they are not an ordinary water company, but an invention to avoid the necessity of a water company, and so to escape the payment of such prices as an ordinary water company would be required to pay; and, secondly, I am not aware that the law imposes or that the Court can take notice of any restrictions imposed on water companies; and for myself, I really do not find, nor does the case find, that they have. But when we come to determine the specific question whether the rate is to stand at 490*l*. or anything higher, I feel a difficulty. It is stated to be the estimated net rateable value per annum; if so, it is a rent taken on the principle stated in the third finding, for that 1,100*l*. is made to represent "the net rateable value per annum of the entire works." If 190*l*. be the proportion of the 1,100*l*. which the Sessions has attributed to Longwood, then 490*l*. is the right sum, and has been arrived at on the right principle, at least the whole sum of 1,100*l*. has clearly been arrived at on the right principle; whether the proportions of the two townships are or are not, we have no means of ascertaining; they are not calculated on the same facts. Still, with respect to Longwood, 490*l*. may be what the Sessions have stated it to be, the right proportion of the 1,100*l*.; and I think I am bound to assume that it is, and on this ground I am of opinion that the rate ought to stand at that sum. My brothers Wightman and Crompton have arrived at the same conclusion, although on somewhat different grounds. They do not think the case put by the Sessions, of a tenant who may charge any rates he pleases, can furnish a proper criterion for the amount of the rate in respect of property of this peculiar description, which can have no existence in the case of a tenant, without some legislative restriction being imposed upon him as to the amount of the rate; and they think that a fictitious and impossible value may be put on the land by supposing the case of a water company or a tenant able to put their own price on the water supplied. No such company or tenant can receive the powers necessary to carry on such an undertaking without some restriction as to the price of the water to be supplied. But being satisfied with the view suggested in the third finding of the Sessions, they concur with me in thinking that the rate must stand at 490*l*. the sum which was to be taken as the representative value per annum of the proportion of the entire works in Longwood, and the judgment of the Sessions will be confirmed.

REG. v. THE INSOLVENT DEBTORS' COURT.

Insolvent—Re-hearing—Jurisdiction of Insolvent Debtors' Court in cases originally heard before a County Court Judge.

The Insolvent Debtors' Court has no jurisdiction to re-hear the case of an insolvent originally heard before a County Court judge.

Griffiths moved in last Trinity Term (a) for a rule for a mandamus to the Insolvent Debtors' Court to re-hear the case of an insolvent which had been originally heard before a County Court judge. The application had been made to the Insolvent Court, and refused by that Court on the ground that it had no jurisdiction. He submitted that that Court had jurisdiction. The stat. 10 & 11 Vict. c. 102, s. 10, only substituted the judges of the County Court for the Insolvent Commissioners on Circuit; and the Commissioners on Circuit had no authority to grant a rehearing. The jurisdiction, therefore, of the Insolvent Debtors' Court in London, as to rehearing under sec. 96 of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, remains as before. (Re Willcox, 18 L. J. 241, Q.B. also reported in 13 Q. B. Rep.) Cur. adv. vult.

(a) Thursday, June 3.—Before Lord Campbell, C.J., Coleridge, and Wightman, JJ.

JUDGMENT.

Lord CAMPBELL, C.J. now delivered the judgment of the Court. Upon a motion for a mandamus to the Commissioners of the Court for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors, to hear an application for an order for rehearing the case of an insolvent under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 96, the question raised is whether, in respect of an insolvent heard before the judge of a County Court, and discharged by him under the stat. 10 & 11 Vict. c. 102, s. 10, the Court for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors has jurisdiction to make the order applied for. We are of opinion that this question must be answered in the negative. There is no provision expressly giving power to the Commissioners over cases heard by the judge of a County Court, and the provision in the 96th section of the former Act does not, in terms or in principle, apply to these cases; in terms it does not apply to County Courts, and in principle it was reasonable to vest the power of deciding on a re-hearing in a tribunal in which all, or at least one, of the judges was present who had presided over the former hearing. It would be inconvenient to require a tribunal to decide whether a judge had been deceived by false evidence or otherwise, without any power of communicating themselves with the judge on a matter that depended on what passed in his own mind. The rule must be refused, unless jurisdiction exists in the Insolvent Debtors' Court. It is not necessary to decide that the jurisdiction exists in any other tribunal; we forbear, therefore, to say more with respect to the powers of County Court judges than that the words of the section so conferring jurisdiction on them to hear, originally appear wide enough to comprehend a power of re-hearing, as we think that the words describing their powers do not bring them within the limits of the power formerly exercised by the commissioners themselves.

Rule refused.

STEWART v. THE ANGLO-CALIFORNIAN GOLD MINING COMPANY.

Joint-stock company—Deed of settlement — 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, s. 51.

A scripholder in a joint-stock company did not execute the deed of settlement within three months from its date, although he had no notice of the clause of forfeiture therein for neglecting to do so, whereupon the board of directors, in pursuance of the clause, forfeited his shares. The clause did not expressly require any notice to be given to scripholders.

Held, that the shares were duly forfeited, and that in an action for refusing to allow the plaintiff to execute the deed of settlement, the plaintiff could not object that such clause of forfeiture was illegal, as being ultra vires.

Case.—The declaration stated that the defendants were a joint-stock company, completely registered and formed by a deed of settlement; that the plaintiff became entitled to 210 shares in the capital or joint-stock of the defendants, and that after complete registration of the said company, he, the plaintiff, being so entitled to the said shares, became and was entitled, by virtue of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, to have made out by the defendants a certificate of the proprietorship of each of the before-mentioned shares, specifying therein, &c. [the things required by sec. 51], and to have such certificate, with the common seal of the defendants affixed thereto, delivered to him, the said plaintiff, on demand; that the plaintiff was ready and willing to execute the deed of settlement under which the defendants, as such company, were formed.

Averment of notice of the premises, and request by the plaintiff to permit him to execute the deed, and demand of a certificate of proprietorship of each of the before-mentioned shares.

Breach.—That the defendants, although a reasonable time had elapsed, would not suffer or permit the plaintiff to execute the deed of settlement; and that the defendants would not, on demand, or at any other time, cause a certificate of proprietorship of each of the before-mentioned shares to be delivered to the plaintiff, but refused so to do.

Pleas.—2. That the plaintiff did not become, nor was he entitled to the said shares in the said capital or joint stock of the defendants, in the declaration mentioned, modo et formâ.

3. That the plaintiff did not become, nor was he entitled under or by virtue of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, to have made out by the defendants such certificate of the proprietorship of each of the said shares in the declaration mentioned, or to have such certificate, with the common seal of the defendants affixed thereto, delivered to him, the plaintiff, on demand, modo et formâ.

The case was tried before Lord Campbell, C.J. at the sitting after last Hilary Term.

The following was the clause of forfeiture in the deed of settlement:—That the share or shares of every subscriber who should not execute the deed of settlement within three months from the date thereof, should be forfeited if the board of directors thought fit, and the amount paid upon such share or shares should become the property of the company.

The defendants refused to permit the plaintiff to execute the deed, on the ground that the shares of the plaintiff had been forfeited by the board of directors, in conformity with the above clause; but the only notice of the provision of the deed was one sent to the plaintiff a day or so before the expiration of the three months. And in consequence of not having executed the deed, it was contended that the plaintiff was not entitled to the certificate of shares under sec. 51 of 7 and 8 Vict. c. 110. The jury gave a verdict for the plaintiff, finding that he had no reasonable notice from the defendants of the deed, requiring him to execute it within the period of three months from its date.

Bramwell, in Easter Term, obtained a rule nisi to set aside the verdict and enter it for the defendants on the second and third issues.

Thursday, April 29.—E. James, Paterson, and J. Thompson, shewed cause.—The points made were, 1. That the clause of forfeiture implied that the defendants were to give three months' notice to subscribers before the defendants could enforce it. 2. That there was no power to forfeit the shares if the subscribers did not sign the deed. 3. That the clause of forfeiture was ultra vires and void. 4. That the forfeiture should have been specially pleaded.

The plaintiff's counsel referred to ss. 7, 26, 38, and 51 of 7 and 8 Vict. c. 110, and cited Banwell Iron Company v. Barnett, 8 C B. 406; Ashpitel v. Sercombe, 5 Ex. 147; and Vyse v. Wakefield, 6 M. & W. 412.

Tuesday, May 4.—Bramwell and Gray, in support of the rule. 1. All subscribers are bound by the provisions of the deed of settlement when it has been executed by one-fourth of the subscribers at its date, and has been approved of by the registrar. 2. If the deed is not a proper deed, the remedy of a subscriber to the company is an action to recover the deposit paid, or perhaps an action for not preparing a proper deed; but there is no ground for an action for refusing to allow the plaintiff to sign the deed in this case. 3. The plaintiff was bound to inform himself of the contents of the deed at his own peril. 4. The plaintiff was not entitled to the certificate of shares by sec. 51, because not a shareholder within meaning of interpretation clause, not having executed the deed of settlement. (Sparkes v. The London Waterworks Company, 13 Ves. 428.)

Cur. adv. vult.

JUDGMENT.

Friday, June 18.—Lord CAMPBELL, C.J.—In this case a rule was granted on a point reserved, whether there was any evidence to prove that before the plaintiff requested that he might be permitted to execute the deed of settlement, his shares in the company were duly forfeited. If they were, the defendants are entitled to have the verdict entered for them on the issue on the second plea, that the plaintiff was not possessed of the shares. It appeared that this company was provisionally registered in August 1850; that the plaintiff obtained scrip certificates for shares in the company; that the deed of settlement was completed and executed by one-fourth of the shareholders on the 16th of August, 1851; that it contained a clause which authorised the directors to declare forfeited, the shares of any such scripholder who had not executed the deed within three months from its date; and after the expiration of three months from the date of the deed, and before the plaintiff requested that he might be permitted to execute the deed, the directors declared his shares forfeited; that he had no previous notice from the company to come in and sign the deed; that the company was completely registered in 1851, and afterwards the company refused leave to the plaintiff to execute the deed, on the ground that his shares were forfeited. It was contended before us that this clause of forfeiture was unreasonable and void, and that at any rate it could not be acted on as against a subscriber or scripholder till he had notice of it, and had afterwards refused or neglected to execute the deed. But, looking to the provisions of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, and the nature of the undertakings which that statute was meant to regulate, we think the shares were duly forfeited. There is necessarily authority given by all the subscribers to obtain a certificate of complete registration; and it could not be completely registered unless it be formed by deed or writing, under the hands and seals of the shareholders, which must be signed by at least one-fourth of the persons who at the date of it had become subscribers. This deed must likewise be submitted to the registrar of joint-stock companies, that it may be seen by him to be conformable to the statute, and in other respects unexceptionable, and he must arrive at that before the certificate of complete registration is granted. We conceive that no subscriber can ask to be allowed to execute it, and at the same time object to its contents. In the case of Wilkinson v. The Anglo-Californian Gold Mining Company, 19 L. T. 181, we lately held that a subscriber could not partially execute the deed of settlement, excepting the clauses which he objects to. If he execute it absolutely, he must be bound by it, if, on its face, it is not against the law of the land. This is an action for not permitting the plaintiff to execute the deed, and the plaintiff must be supposed to have availed himself of his opportunities of becoming acquainted with its contents, and to have assented to it as it stands. If the deed contains anything contrary to the principles of law or in other respects is objectionable, the plaintiff might possibly recover back the sums he has paid for the scrip from the individuals who compose the company; but in an action against the company for not permitting him to execute the deed he cannot object to it as unreasonable. Then as to the want of notice, the evidence was that he had no notice till the day before the time expired, which the jury found not to be sufficient, and the case stands as if he had received no notice. But no notice is required to be given by the deed which confers upon the directors an absolute power to declare forfeited the shares of the subscribers who do not execute the deed within three months from its date. Therefore if the deed be valid no notice was required. In truth, the subscribers have ample means of becoming acquainted with the peril which they run of the shares being forfeited if they delay the execution of the deed. In this action no doubt the plaintiff's title to the shares, in the sense in which the word is used in declaration, could not be denied on the ground that he had not executed the deed, and therefore could not be a shareholder within the definition of the term laid down in the interpretation clause; but as the shares were duly forfeited the verdicts on the second issue will be entered for the defendants.

Rule absolute to enter the verdict for the defendants on the second issue.

(Before ALDERSON and PLATT, BB. and COLERIDGE, WIGHTMAN, ERLE, and CROMPTON, JJ.)

HEATH v. UNWIN.

Patent—Infringement—Improvement upon a patent.

A composite substance includes its elements, and the use of the elements is a use of the composite, so as to be an infringement of a patent for the use of the composite substance:

The use of the elements of a composite substance, if in the process the composite is itself formed, is not the use of an equivalent for that substance, but the use of the substance itself.

H. took out a patent for certain improvements in the manufacture of iron and steel, and in his specification he claimed, fourthly, "the use of carburet of manganese in any process whereby iron is converted into cast steel;" and in the description of his process he said he proposed to make his improved steel by introducing into a crucible broken steel, or malleable iron, and carbonaceous matter, along with from one to three per cent. of their weight of carburet of manganese, and melting them together. It was afterwards discovered that the same result was produced at a much less expense by putting oxide of manganese and carbonaceous matter instead of carburet of manganese into the crucible with the iron. The defendant made use of this new process, and an action was brought against him for infringing the patent. It was proved at the trial that in this process the oxide of manganese and the carbonaceous matter first combined together, and formed a carburet of manganese, and that afterwards in the same process, but at a higher temperature, the carburet combined with the steel, and produced the desired result. The learned judge directed the jury that this was not evidence of an infringement:

Now held (dissentientibus, Alderson, B. and Coleridge, J.) that there was evidence of an infringement which ought to have been submitted to the jury:

That the patent was for the use of carburet of man-ganese in the converting of iron into steel, and that the description of the modus operandi given by the patentee in his specification, was only one instance of how it might be used, and did not limit the patent; that the defendant's process was only a neater and cheaper modus operandi, and that in that process he had used the carburet of manganese, and had directly infringed the patent:

Held by Alderson, B. that in the specification the patentee claimed only the use of the carburet of manganese in the particular way described by him; that the oxide of manganese and carbonaceous matter not being, at the time of the patent, known to ordinarily skilful chemists as equivalents of carburet of manganese for all purposes, were not included in the specification; that even if the patentee knew that they were, his specification did not impart that knowledge to the public, and that the use of them, therefore, was a new discovery, and did not infringe the patent.

Held by Coleridge, J. that a specification to be perfect must specify directly or impliedly all the chemical equivalents of the chemical means expressly stated, and that the patentee cannot withhold the knowledge of one of two equivalents, as that might be for his own benefit at the expense of the public, that although, at the time of the patent, it was known what were the component parts of carburet of manganese, it not being known that the component parts applied in the manner they have been applied by the defendant were equivalents to the carburet itself applied according to the specification, such application of them was a new discovery, and an improvement upon, not an infringement of, the patent.

Quære, whether, supposing the defendant's process were an improvement upon the process of the patentee, a patent could be taken out for such improvement? See judgment of Crompton, J.

Case for the infringement of a patent for certain improvements in the manufacture of iron and steel. The defendant pleaded (inter alia) not guilty.

At the trial before Cresswell, J. at the Middlesex Sittings, on the 30th of November, 1850, it appeared that the patent in question was taken out by Mr. Heath, the plaintiff, since deceased, in the year 1839, and that by his specification he had declared the nature of his inventions to be as follows:—"First, the extraction of pure cast-iron from certain ores of that metal, without the intervention of any earthly alkaline or saline matter to form a vitreous flux, cinder, or slag; secondly, the formation of cast-steel, by fusing the said pure cast-iron along with malleable iron, or certain metallic oxides, in such proportion as may decarburate the cast-iron to a certain degree, and by completing the decarburation in a suitable cementing furnace; thirdly, the use of a certain portion of oxide of manganese in the process of converting cast-iron into malleable iron by the process of puddling; and, fourthly, the use of carburet of manganese in any process whereby iron is converted into cast-steel." And the plaintiff described the last process in these terms:—"Lastly, I propose to make an improved quality of cast-steel by introducing into a crucible bars of common blistered steel, broken as usual into fragments, or mixtures of cast and malleable iron, or malleable iron and carbonaceous matter, along with from one to three per cent. of their weight of carburet of manganese, and exposing the crucible to the proper heat for melting the materials, which are, when fluid, to be poured into an ingot mould in the usual manner; but I do not claim the use of any such mixture of cast and malleable iron, or malleable iron and carbonaceous matter, as any part of my invention, but only the use of carburet of manganese in any process for the conversion of iron into cast-steel." Before Heath's discovery in 1839, it was practically impossible to produce cast-steel capable of being welded with iron, except Swedish and some other iron of the very best quality, and the price of cutlery was consequently much enhanced, it being necessary to use in its manufacture shear steel, which is formed by an expensive process of manipulation under a forge hammer from bar steel (i.e. bar iron carbonised in a converting furnace), which contains a portion of earthy matter to be got rid of before shear steel is produced. It was therefore very desirable to form cast-steel capable of being welded with iron, and several attempts were made to effect this by the use of oxide of manganese. In order to form common bar steel, iron, mixed with carbonaceous matter, is melted in a crucible, and having thus absorbed a quantity of carbon, is run into bars. This is again formed into cast steel by being broken up and exposed to a very high heat, until it becomes liquid; being again run into bars, it is called cast-steel. Bar steel is sometimes called blistered steel, from the appearance it represents after the carbonizing process. It was thought that if oxide of manganese were placed in the crucible or earthen pot together with the bar or blistered steel, it would, upon fusion taking place, alloy itself with the steel, and form cast-steel, capable of being welded with iron; but, upon experiment, it was found that the oxide of manganese, having an affinity for the earthy matter of the pot, formed with it a kind of glass, and caused it to crack. Mr. Heath, by a series of experiments, discovered that carburet of manganese (which is the product of oxide of manganese and coal tar, or carbonaceous matter, exposed to an intense heat in a pot lined with charcoal) put into the pot with the blistered steel, did not cause the pot to break, but alloyed itself with the steel and formed a steel capable of being welded, and of a very superior quality to any before produced. Mr. Heath took out a patent for this, and for some time continued to manufacture carburet of manganese at a considerable expense for the purpose of producing welding steel in this way. It was afterwards, however, discovered, both by him and by the defendant, that if oxide of manganese and coal tar or carbonaceous matter were placed in the pot together with the steel, the same result would take place. The defendant availed himself of this, and at a much less cost produced the same quality of steel. Mr. Heath in the year 1843 brought an action against him for an infringement of his patent, on the ground that the oxide of manganese and the carbonaceous matter being put together with the steel into the pot first formed carburet of manganese, and in that state mixed with the steel, and that therefore this was a use of carburet of manganese in the conversion of iron into cast-steel, and an infringement of his patent. In this action, under the direction of Lord Abinger, he was nonsuited. In 1844, he commenced another action, which was tried before Parke, B. and at which scientific witnesses gave it as their opinion that the carbonaceous matter and the oxide of manganese would first form carburet of manganese, and that afterwards that would combine with the steel, and a verdict was found for the plaintiff, leave being reserved to the defendant to move to enter a verdict for him, on the plea of "not guilty." The case was fully argued afterwards before the Court of Ex. and Parke, B. delivered the judgment of the Court in favour of the defendant, in which it was held that the patent was obtained for the use of one peculiar combination of carbon and manganese, i. e. carburet of manganese, and for the use of it in that state, and that the defendant not having used that substance in the mode described in the specification, had clearly not directly infringed the plaintiff's patent; and, secondly, that he had not indirectly infringed the patent, inasmuch as it was quite clear that he never meant to use the carburet of manganese at all, he not knowing and there being no reason to think that prior to that investigation any one else knew, that that substance would be formed in a state of fusion, and inasmuch as it was a mere matter of speculative opinion (though after verdict it must be assumed to be a correct opinion) amongst men of science that it would, but was clearly not an ascertained and still less a well-known fact. And that there was, therefore, no intention to imitate the patented invention. And that the defendant could not be considered to be guilty of an indirect infringement, if he did not intend to imitate it at all. In 1850 the present action was tried, and Cresswell, J. directed the jury that there was no evidence against the defendant on the issue of not guilty, and that they must find a verdict for the defendant, he considering himself bound by the decision of the Court of Ex. A bill of exceptions was thereupon tendered, and a writ of error brought.

Sir A. Cockburn, Q.C. (with whom were Bramwell, Q.C. and Webster), for the plaintiff, after stating the facts as above, contended that the defendant in using the oxide of manganese with carbonaceous matter in the conversion of iron into steel, had infringed the plaintiff's patent. That in using the elements out of which the carburet of manganese was formed in the manner described by the scientific witnesses, he had, in fact, used the carburet itself, and had thereby infringed the patent. That the compound includes the elements, and by mentioning the compound in the specification the patentee implicitly mentioned the elements.

T. Jones (with whom was Deighton) for the defendant, argued that there was no evidence of an infringement. It is a matter of speculation, a mere theory that the carburet is first formed, and then unites with the steel, and this is not sufficient to support a verdict of guilty. Even if the jury had found that the theory was a fact, the law would not recognise such an infringement, as it rests only in opinion, and as there may be a difference of opinion. The law will not recognise an act as wrongful unless it is clearly so in its essence and nature. [ALDERSON, B.—Suppose, when all three substances are brought together, from the two being acted upon first by a lower heat a carburet is formed, and then in the same process, but at a greater heat, the combination of the carburet with the other, and that this result takes place, is that an improvement, or is it an infringement—the forming of carburet of manganese itself being an expensive process?] It is an improvement, and was not known at the time of the patent being taken out. The strength of the defendant's case is that mentioned by Baron Alderson. The plaintiff must make out that the formation of the carburet in the manner described is an established recognised fact. The use of the carburet of manganese, in a separate and distinct state, is that which is really patented, and the patent is confined to the use of it as a distinct substance. We do not use it as a distinct substance. We use the oxide of manganese and carbonaceous matter which has the same effect, and that it has the same effect is a new discovery, the use of the carbonaceous matter with the oxide of manganese in the way we use it was not known. Heath's carburet of manganese costs 780*l.* a ton. What we use costs 7*l.* a ton. If he had known of it he would have used it. If he knew it and suppressed the knowledge, his patent would be void. [ALDERSON, B.—Was it known that the three substances being heated together in the pot two would first form the carburet of manganese?] No. And that, namely the modus operandi, is the very point in question. (Barber v. Grace, 17 L. J. Ex. 122.) The Lord Chief Baron, in his judgment in that case, says, "cylinders were never dreamt of," so here this process was never dreamt of. This steel, moreover, can be made without carbonaceous matter. [Sir A. Cockburn.—No. The carbon is got out of the highly carbonized steel.] Then we must not use highly carbonized steel because carburet of manganese may be formed.

Sir A. Cockburn, in reply.—The only question is whether the defendant has used carburet of manganese in his process; whether he intended to use it, or knew that he was using it, has nothing to do with the matter. There was evidence to go to the jury; for the scientific witnesses shewed clearly that the carburet would be formed. A patentee may not know to what extent his discovery may be carried, but if a discovery cheapening his process is made, the inventor must make his terms with him. His discovery is the foundation, and the other has only built a superstructure upon it. I submit that, at all events, the question ought to go to a jury.

Cur. adv. vult.

JUDGMENT.

CROMPTON, J.—This was an action for an infringement of a patent. The only question which is now material to be considered arose at the trial, on the plea of "Not guilty," and the learned judge who tried the cause directed the jury according to the decision of the Court of Ex. in a previous case between the same parties that there was no evidence of infringement. A bill of exceptions was tendered against this direction, and we have now to consider whether there was any evidence of infringement which ought to have been submitted to the jury. For present purposes we must assume that the invention patented was novel and useful, and the only question is, whether there was any evidence of infringement to go to the jury. It will be first necessary to see of what the invention consists. The patentee, after mentioning other inventions which are not material, declares his invention to be the use of carburet of manganese in any process whereby iron is converted into cast-steel. In the subsequent part of his specification he states what that operation is, as follows. [His lordship read the plaintiff's description of his process as above set out.] He states his claim with reference to this invention to be the employment of carburet of manganese in preparing an improved cast-steel. The two substances are to be placed together, forming (as proved by the evidence) alloy. This being the invention, one mode of carrying it out is particularised in that part of the specification in which the patentee specifies his modus operandi, and shews how he brings the two substances together by introducing them into the same crucible. It is important to distinguish between the invention and the particular mode of working it described in the patent. There may be other modes than that pointed out by the patentee of bringing the two substances together, which would, I apprehend, be an infringement of the patent if they involved the use of carburet of manganese in the process of the conversion of iron into cast-steel. The question is, whether, what the defendant was proved to have done, was not evidence of the use of carburet of manganese in the process of the conversion of iron into cast-steel, although the operation was carried on in an improved mode, different from that described in the specification, and originally adopted by the plaintiff. It appeared from the evidence that the plaintiff had first worked his patent by preparing the carburet of manganese from coal tar and oxide of manganese, and by then using the carburet so prepared in the process of converting the iron into steel in the manner described in the specification. He afterwards found that the same advantage was attained by taking oxide of manganese and coal tar, and putting them into the crucible in which the steel was melted; and witnesses in the employ of the plaintiff stated that he discovered that the using the carburet in the way I have described would answer the same purpose as making the carburet first. Strong evidence was given by several scientific witnesses that when the coal tar and the oxide of manganese were put into the crucible, a carburet of manganese was formed from them before the melting of the steel. They said the carburet of manganese would be first formed, and would immediately alloy itself with the steel, and that the carburet would be formed at a lower temperature than that at which steel was melted, and they said in this way, when the carburet of manganese was employed in the manufacture of steel, it was an improved process. It appeared that the plaintiff had been in the habit of making up coal tar and manganese into packets to be used in the new method. Some of these packets had been supplied by him to the defendant. The defendant was admitted to have manufactured cast-steel, by using the oxide of manganese and carbonaceous matter introduced into the pot at the same moment with the steel. I think that this was evidence of using carburet of manganese in the process of converting iron into steel, and was evidence of a distinct infringement of the patent. It was a neater mode of carrying out the invention by making the carburet in the crucible instead of preparing it out of the crucible and then introducing the carburet and iron into the crucible together, and in both operations the two substances are brought together and the alloy is formed. The question does not seem to me to be one of imitation or of equivalent, but whether there is not evidence of the direct use of the carburet for the purpose of manufacture, though in a neater mode than that described in the specification. I do not agree with the suggestion that the invention was the putting the two substances in the crucible together in the exact manner pointed out by the plaintiff, but I think that the discovery claimed is the use of the carburet in the manufacture, and that it is not limited to the mode of working mentioned in the specification, which I think the plaintiff gives merely as a means of working his invention. The discovery of the new mode of making the carburet in the pot in the course of the process so as to be ready to alloy with the steel in a subsequent part of the process may have been a discovery and an improvement on the plaintiff's invention, for which a patent might perhaps have been taken out, and if taken out by a stranger the plaintiff could not have used the new method without infringing the patent for the improvement. On the other hand the new method could not in such case have been carried on without infringing the plaintiff's patent, if, as I think, it was an improved and neater mode of bringing the two substances together, being a use of carburet in the state of carburet in the manufacture of steel. I do not attribute any weight to the fact of the plaintiff himself being the discoverer of the new mode, or of the defendant having had it communicated to him by the plaintiff. However much these facts might affect the moral justice of the case, they do not seem to me to alter the law. If the new plan was a distinct invention, the defendant might have used it, whoever was the inventor. If, on the other hand, it was the use of carburet in the process of manufacture, it would be an infringement of the plaintiff's patent, even if the defendant himself had invented the improvement. I think there was abundant evidence from which the jury might infer that in the new method the carburet was first formed in the crucible from the materials so as to be in the distinct state of carburet before the user of it in the manufacture of steel commenced, and that after its formation it was used as a carburet of manganese in the process of converting the iron into steel, and I think that from such state of facts it was competent for the jury to find that the patent had been infringed by the defendant. I think that the judgment should be reversed and the venire de novo awarded.

Platt, B. This was an action on the case charging the defendant with an infringement of the plaintiff's patent, and on the issue joined on the plea of not guilty, the learned judge directed the jury at the trial that the matters deposed to by the plaintiff's witnesses were not evidence of that infringement. The plaintiff having excepted to that direction, and brought his writ of error, the question arises whether, on the matter adduced in support of the plaintiff's case on the trial, there was such evidence. It appeared that the plaintiff's patent was for an improvement in the manufacture of steel, by the use of carburet of manganese, in the process of converting iron into that metal. By the specification he claimed as part of his invention the use of carburet of manganese in any process whereby iron was converted into cast steel; and he describes the mode by which he obtained fine cast steel from simple iron, by the use of carburet of manganese. It was admitted at the trial between the plaintiff and the defendant, that since the date of the patent the defendant had manufactured cast steel by using oxide of manganese and carbonaceous matter, introduced into the melting-pot at the same moment with the steel,—the three ingredients, oxide of manganese, carbonaceous matter, and steel, being, however, separate and apart, and not in combination with either of the others. It is also admitted, that since the date of the patent, the defendant had manufactured cast-steel, by using only, I think, oxide of manganese and highly carbonised steel, introduced separately into the pot at the same time; and the testimony of chemists at the trial tended to shew that in each of these two processes carburet of manganese would be formed, and would become the active means of effecting the improved manufacture. Surely, whether the carburet or its constituent parts separately are put into the melting-pot, could not make any difference if those parts afterwards combined, and in their combined state acted in the same manner on the subject of the manufacture. By the defendant's selection of substances he put into the melting-pot, he collected together oxygen, carbon, and manganese. The relative affinities sufficed to lead to the natural expectation that they would, on the application of the proper heat, combine, and in that combination form the carburet required. This may constitute a different manner of manufacturing carburet of manganese, but however manufactured, if the defendant used it in the conversion of iron into cast-steel, he, in my judgment, infringed the patent. Whether the chemical testimony was credible or not, is not a matter for our consideration. We are required to consider and determine whether, coupled with the admissions on the trial, it was evidence, and evidence to be left to the jury, of the defendant having used carburet of manganese in the process for the conversion of iron into cast-steel. I think it was, that the ruling of the learned judge was incorrect, and that the venire de novo should be awarded.

Erle, J.—In this case the question is, whether there was any evidence of an infringement of the plaintiff's patent for the use of carburet of manganese in the process of converting iron into cast-steel, whether there is any evidence, and whether there was evidence that the defendant, by heating the elements of carburet of manganese with iron, formed, first, the carburet, and then cast-steel. If this be true, the defendant would, in my judgment, be guilty of a direct infringement. But assuming this to be doubtful, there was also evidence that he has indirectly infringed this patent for the use of a substance in a process by the use of a known chemical equivalent for that substance in that process. At the time of the patent the patentee made the carburet by heating the carbon and manganese till the carburet was formed, and then heated the carburet with the iron to form the cast-steel. He afterwards discovered that if the elements of the carburet were heated with the iron, the same result would be obtained and one heating would be saved. He communicated the effect of this discovery to the defendant, by selling to him a packet containing the elements of the carburet to be so used, and the patentee knew at the time of the patent the elements from which he formed the carburet, and from that knowledge was induced to use these elements as equivalent to the substance mentioned in the specification. There is thus some evidence that the defendant infringed the patent by the use of a chemical equivalent for the patented substance, which was known to be so at the time of the patent. But I am further of opinion, that a patent for the use of a substance in a process is infringed by the use of a chemical equivalent for that substance, known to be so at the time of the use, if used for the purpose of taking the benefit of the patent and of making a colourable variation therefrom. Taking the instance put in the argument in this case in the Exchequer, if the patent was for the use of soda in a process, and by a subsequent analysis sodium and oxygen were discovered to be the elements of soda, the use of sodium and oxygen in the patented process, for the purpose of being equivalent to soda in that process, would appear to me to be an infringement, although the analysis of soda was subsequent to the patent. On these grounds it appears to me that there ought to be a venire de novo.

Coleridge, J.—My brother Wightman being ill, has desired me to read his judgment.—"I cannot come to the conclusion that there was no evidence for the jury in this case, that the defendant in the action had infringed the plaintiff's patent, and if there is any evidence the plaintiff is entitled to judgment upon this bill of exceptions, and to a venire de novo. The action was on the case for infringing the plaintiff's patent for certain improvements in the manufacture of iron and steel. The defendant pleaded not guilty, and several other pleas, but the question arises on the plea of not guilty. The plaintiff in his specification declared that one of his improvements was in the use of carburet of manganese in any process whereby iron is converted into cast-steel, and he claims that as his invention. It appears by the evidence that the use of carburet of manganese in the manufacture of steel was unknown before the plaintiff's invention, and that it was a most important improvement; and by the specification the plaintiff states the mode in which he applied carburet of manganese to the iron or steel, but states expressly that all he claims as his invention is the use of the carburet in any process for the conversion of iron into cast-steel. It appears by the evidence that the carburet may be applied in three ways: one, by making the carburet first, and then introducing it into the melting-pot with the iron or steel to which it is to be applied, and this was the mode stated in the specification; another, by putting the ingredients which were to form the carburet into the pot at the same time with the iron or steel, in which case the carburet is formed in the pot before it acts on the iron or steel, and this was the mode adopted by the plaintiff subsequent to the patent and the specification; and, thirdly, by putting oxide of manganese into the pot with the steel so highly carbonised that, at a high temperature carburet of manganese would be formed, and produce the same effect on the steel as if either of the other processes was used. It was admitted that the defendant had adopted both of the last modes in using carburet of manganese in the manufacture of steel. In each of the three modes the same materials are used, and the same effect is produced by the same means, namely, by the action of the carburet of manganese on iron. The materials are the same in each—iron, manganese, and carbonaceous matter, which two latter must unite before they act upon the iron; and in all the three the union of the carbon and the manganese takes place before the united substance acts upon the iron. The mode adopted by the defendant is not by using chemical equivalents. The material combinations are the same as those of the plaintiff, with this difference, that his carburet is formed in the same pot in which the iron is, and that by the plaintiff's specification the carburet is formed before it is put into the pot, but in both the carburet must be formed before it can act upon the iron. By the mode adopted by the defendant, and which indeed the plaintiff of himself had adopted, one heating suffices for the whole process; whereas by the mode in this specification the oxide of manganese and carbon must first be converted into carburet by the action of one fire, and then there must be another fire to produce the action of the carburet on the iron. The plaintiff's patent, however, is not for the mode of preparing the carburet of manganese, but for the use of it in any process whereby iron is converted into cast steel. The process by which the defendant makes his carburet may be an improvement on that mentioned in the specification; but when made, he uses it for the same purpose, and with the same effect as the plaintiff. Both the plaintiff and the defendant operate on the iron and produce the same effect upon it by the same agent, namely, carburet of manganese, and it is for the operation of that agent on iron in the process of converting it into steel, that the plaintiff has taken out his patent. I think, therefore, there was evidence for the jury that the defendant had infringed the plaintiff's patent, and that there should be a venire de novo."

I have now to read my own judgment. The only question in this case is, whether there was any evidence for the jury of an infringement of the plaintiff's patent, and this must be considered on the assumption that the plaintiff's specification was unexceptionable—a condition which it will be found very important to bear in mind in the examination of the evidence. Limiting myself to all that is in question in the present case, I may state that the specification, to be perfect, must be taken to specify implicdly all the chemical equivalents of those chemical means expressly stated for producing the promised result, which were at the time of specifying known to ordinarily skilled chemists, or to the patentee himself. The latter of these seems to me to be as necessary as the former. If the inventor of an alleged discovery, knowing of two equivalent agents for effecting the end could by the disclosure of one preclude the public from the benefit of the other, he might for his own profit force upon the public an expensive and difficult process, keeping back the simple and cheap one, which would be directly contrary to the good faith required from every patentee in his communication with the public. Now the plaintiff thus describes the process which he claims: "I do it," says he, "by introducing into a crucible bars of steel broken into fragments, mixtures of cast and malleable iron, or malleable iron and carbonaceous matter, along with from one to three per cent. of their weight of carburet of manganese." He then declares that he does not claim the use of the mixture of cast and malleable iron, or malleable iron and carbonaceous matter, as any part of his invention, but only the use of carburet of manganese in any process whereby iron is converted into cast steel; and in the first enumeration of his claims he repeats: "I claim the employment of carburet of manganese in making and preparing an improved cast steel." This being the specification and the claim, it appears now, upon the evidence that the same result may be produced as certainly and far more cheaply by substituting for the carburet of manganese oxide of manganese and coal tar, a carbonaceous matter, which being thrown into the crucible with the iron, affords a very strong ground for believing that carburet of manganese is formed before the iron is in a state of fusion, and before, therefore, any mixture of the two takes place. The difference is, that instead of the formed composite substance being thrown into the crucible in certain proportions to the iron and carbonaceous matter, the ingredients of such substance are introduced which in one and the same process, but in an earlier stage of it, form a composite substance, which then applies itself to the iron, and produces the desired result. There can be no doubt, I think, that an equivalent has been used. If that equivalent were known at the date of the specification to the plaintiff or ordinary chemists—those, I mean, who would bring to the reading of the specification such knowledge as must be presumed in those to whom the patent must be taken to be addressed—then it is within the specification, and the use of it is an infringement. If not, the contrary conclusion follows, and the use of it is an improvement in virtue of a new discovery, and the knowledge I speak of is of course not the knowing what were the component parts of carburet of manganese, but the knowing that the component parts thus applied were equivalents to the thing itself, applied according to the specification for producing the desired result. This limitation seems to me to be required by common sense and common justice. Unless it be imposed, I see no means of knowing whether the latter process is or is not within the specification, and unless I know that, I have no means of distinguishing improvement from infringement. Whether the equivalent be in its nature near to or remote from the thing itself, seems to me in principle wholly immaterial, and equally so that the one should be so nearly identical with the other as, that in themselves, the component parts may be of composite substances. The new conclusion may be deducible from known and specified premises, and in strict reasoning, therefore, involved in them; still, he who first puts the premises side by side, and deduces the conclusion, is the inventor. Many of the greatest and most unquestionable discoveries resolve themselves into no more than this. Having applied these principles to a careful examination of the evidence, I cannot perceive that there was anything to shew either that chemists or the plaintiff himself, at the date of the specification, had any knowledge of the equivalents which the defendant has used, although there is evidence that at a later period the defendant may have gained that knowledge from the plaintiff himself. I think, therefore, that the ruling of the learned judge at the trial was correct, and that the judgment ought to be affirmed.

ALDERSON, B.—The first question is, I think, what really is the invention described and claimed by the plaintiff in his specification. He describes the process thus:—"I do it," he says, "by introducing into a crucible bars of steel broken into fragments, mixtures of cast and malleable iron or malleable iron and carbonaceous matter, along with from one to three per cent. of their weight of carburet of manganese." And he adds that he claims the use of carburet of manganese in any process for the conversion of iron into steel. Now we are all aware that carburet of manganese was a well-known substance existing before the patent, and the specification describes it as being introduced into the crucible with steel or iron, and as it is to be introduced in a given proportion of weight with the steel or iron, I do not myself see how any language could more accurately express to those who read it that the patentee really meant to take two existing substances, to weigh them, to take their definite proportion of weight the one to the other, and then introducing those definite proportions of carburet of manganese and of steel into the crucible, to proceed specified is this which I have described. But I fully agree also that according to the due administration of the patent law, every specification is to be read as if by persons acquainted with the general facts of the mechanical or chemical sciences involved in such invention. Thus if a particular mechanical process is specified, and there are for some parts of it as specified other well-known mechanical equivalents, the specification of those parts is in truth a specification of the well-known equivalents also to those whose general knowledge we refer to, namely, mechanics and readers of specifications. And so it is with chemical equivalents also in a specification which is to be read by chemists. But it may be that there are equivalents, mechanical or chemical, existing, but previously unknown to ordinarily skilful mechanics or chemists. These are not included in the specification, but must be expressly stated therein. These are, in fact, new discoveries in themselves, wholly independent of the specification, which omits them, and for these there is no specification or patent at all. They may be used by all persons without infringing the patent. These are the principles upon which I hold that this question must be determined, and which we must look to and be governed by when we answer the question here, whether there is any evidence of the infringement of this patent by the defendant, and I propose, therefore, referring myself to these principles to consider the evidence which has been given, and which is stated on this record. It is clear that there is no evidence here that the defendant melted carburet of manganese with the broken steel or iron, by taking each of those existing substances in a separate state, and putting them into a crucible, and then applying heat. He has not, therefore, directly, and in terms infringed the patent. But I have before shewn that an infringement may be if a defendant use a known chemical or mechanical substance, equivalent to the very thing pointed out, for the equivalent being known as a part of the general knowledge of the world, he who by his specification describes the ingredients which he uses describes impliedly also all their known equivalents, and so does, in fact, communicate to the world by his specification the knowledge of the invention, and on this knowledge thus expressly or impliedly communicated, he who afterwards infringes the patent really acts. But this depends upon the equivalent being a known equivalent before. If the equivalent be not before known, he who discovers de novo the equivalent, if it be better than the original for which it was the equivalent, has, by the use of the equivalent, improved upon, not infringed the original invention. That is the case here. Carburet of manganese is to be taken, and melted with broken steel or iron. This is the invention. An improved steel is the result. Now carburet of manganese is an expensive ingredient, produced by an additional process from oxide of manganese and carbon. There is no evidence that oxide of manganese and carbon were known to be at the time of the specification (which time and not the time of the use is the material time to look at) exactly and under all circumstances an equivalent in chemistry to carburet of manganese. They did produce it, but only after having been subjected to a special process, which was an expensive one; but it is now found that by putting these ingredients with the broken steel or iron into the crucible they produce the same effect when melted as the carburet of manganese with the broken steel or iron did before this fact existed, and a scientific reason is to be found for it. It is said now, therefore, that these ingredients melted together at a lower heat than will melt steel or iron do in the crucible first form carburet of manganese, and then, secondly, there being the carburet of manganese formed and existing in the crucible with unmelted steel or iron, the subsequent melting of these two substances together forms the good steel. It seems clear, therefore, that this order of formation in the crucible is of the essence as to the success of the operation, and that this order of formation under these circumstances was utterly unknown at the time of the patent and specification. I agree that there is now abundant evidence to shew that these materials thus treated do thus form, and form in succession an equivalent chemically for the carburet of manganese, although the evidence even now fails altogether as to the existence of the two substances in definite proportions in the crucible, such as are mentioned in the specification; but I can find no evidence on the record that at the time of the plaintiff's patent and specification, this was well known to persons ordinarily skilled in chemistry, and unless this fact be added, I think there is no evidence for the jury of the infringement of that peculiar process which, by the specification, the plaintiff has claimed to be his invention, for the specification by which he does state his invention does not communicate, if read by any ordinarily skilful chemist of that day, the know-plaintiff did not then know it himself, nor did any one else then know it. If they know it now it is in consequence of a new discovery alone, for which no patent has been taken out, and no specification enrolled. I apprehend that nothing is an infringement now which would not have been an infringement immediately after his specification was enrolled. The knowledge of the equivalent must be the knowledge the world had before the experiments now called infringement, were first made. I think, therefore, that the judgment ought to be affirmed, but as the majority of the Court are of a different opinion, the judgment must be reversed, and a venire de novo awarded.

BRISTOL DISTRICT COURT.

Thursday, March 11.
Re WILLIAM WOOD.

Absconding bankrupt—Extraordinary expenses.
The Court will sanction and direct payment out of the estate on petition of extraordinary expenses incurred by the assignees in the payment of a reward for the bankrupt's capture, and sending an officer abroad, when the expenditure has resulted in a great accession of property to the estate.

This was the petition of Messrs. Chope and Gilbert, the trade assignees, and it prayed the payment out of the estate to the assignees of the costs, charges, and expenses incurred by them in sending an officer to Glasgow, London, and various places in England, and to New York, in search of the bankrupt, who had absconded, and of a reward of 100*l.* which had been offered for his apprehension, together with the costs incurred in his capture and bringing him before the Court at Bristol, amounting together to a considerable sum, the amount to be ascertained by taxation by the registrar in the usual way.

W. Bevan, for the petitioners, in support of the application read an affidavit, from which it appeared the petition for adjudication was filed, by the present petitioner, Gilbert, on 15th January last, under which Wood was adjudged bankrupt on the following day. That the bankrupt absconded, and never surrendered. That the petitioners, in conjunction with several of the creditors, caused diligent search to be made for him and traced him to Glasgow, whence it was discovered he had embarked with his family, under an assumed name, in the steam-ship Glasgow for New York, on the 8th of January last, with a considerable sum of money and property in his possession; they had also offered 100*l.* reward for his apprehension. The evidence then went on to state that the bankrupt so left the country with intent to defraud his creditors, and to avoid surrendering; and that the petitioners, with the concurrence of the principal creditors had adopted these prompt and energetic measures as well for the protection of the estate as for the interests of trade generally, and to prevent a recurrence of gross frauds upon the mercantile community, of which they were members. It also appeared that the ship in which the bankrupt had embarked put back to Glasgow from stress of weather, when the bankrupt was captured, and a considerable sum of money, with other valuable property, found in his possession; he was from thence brought before the commissioner, and surrendered, was examined, and made a full disclosure of his estate; giving up the money and pro- ... and disclosing the places ... property were deposited, ... possession of by the ... was now claimed by the officer who apprehended the bankrupt. Under these circumstances, it was asked that the expenses so incurred, and which had resulted so favourably to the estate, including the 100*l.* reward, might be defrayed out of the assets.

The petition was unopposed; and it was stated the creditors concurred in the prayer.

Mr. Commissioner HILL.—I think there cannot be a doubt as to the propriety of this application. In fact, it was the promptitude which was displayed that caused so great an accession of property to the estate. Take the order. Ordered as prayed.

Re WILLIAM WOOD.

Fraudulent bankrupt—Prosecution—Offence conditioned by subsequent conduct.
Where a bankrupt commits a penal offence within sec. 253 of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation ... by obtaining goods with intent to defraud ... owners, but the assignees and creditors are satisfied, from subsequent conduct and delivery up of property to the estate, and do not press for an adverse judgment, the Court, although it refrains from ordering a prosecution under the 215th section, will nevertheless mark its sense of the guilty conduct by adjourning the last examination sine die, without protection, and refusing a certificate altogether; and the duty of the Court is not limited by the views which creditors may take of a bankrupt's conduct.

This was a sitting for the last examination of the bankrupt, at which he was present. The balance-sheet shewed an amount due to unsecured creditors of 6,214*l.* 10s. 8d.; assets in possession and available, about 4,400*l.* The facts above stated having been referred to as having transpired on the previous examinations of the bankrupt, and it having also been found that the bankrupt had obtained goods under false pretences, rendering himself liable to the penal claims of the Consolidation Act.

W. Bevan, for the assignees, now stated that those gentlemen had various private examinations of the bankrupt from time to time, and were satisfied of the correctness of the balance-sheet, which had been well tested, and neither they nor the creditors desired to press the case further against the bankrupt.

Mr. Commissioner HILL.—Under the very peculiar circumstances of this bankruptcy the assignees, I presume, have looked at the accounts themselves with great suspicion, so as to be satisfied that they now have a complete knowledge of the bankrupt's affairs.

The official assignee (Miller) said that was so, and that the assignees had paid very great attention to the matter.

Mr. Commissioner HILL.—I have then to pronounce upon this examination, and the question immediately before me is, whether the bankrupt upon this his last examination can pass. Upon a full consideration of all the circumstances, I am of opinion that he ought not to pass, but must be adjourned sine die; and I proceed to give my reasons for this decision. It appears from the proceedings before me, that the bankrupt, William Wood, in the most deliberate, artful, and systematic manner, with a long and continued desire to defraud his creditors, fled from the country, carrying with him a large sum of money, and having converted, as he thought, another sum in a manner in which it could not come into the power of his creditors. Under these circumstances, the obvious course was to order him to be prosecuted for felony. I have not done this, and I do not intend to do so; but in refraining from that course, I feel that I take upon myself a grave responsibility. I am induced, however, to forbear from the representations which have been made to me by those who are the greatest sufferers by this bankrupt. But, short of prosecution, all severity must be used against this man to mark the sense which the Court entertains of his guilty conduct. He is not like a man of limited education, or one who was in want of food or clothing; on the contrary, he was in a state of life in which he was protected from the motives which sometimes lead men to swerve from the path of rectitude, he had the advantage of an education and an early training in an honest course. It is utterly impossible that he should ever be put in a situation in which he will have the means of defrauding other tradesmen; he must never be armed with a certificate to enable him to enter into trade again. Many persons infinitely his superiors in moral worth, are labouring for their daily bread by occupations laborious and exhausting. To their situation let this man be reduced; let him go and do likewise. At least this Court will furnish him with no assistance. Let him esteem it as a privilege, that he may thus gain his livelihood in company with those the least of whom is infinitely his superior in all that constitutes true respectability. He departs from this Court under the stigma of felony, for felony is not created by punishment, or by conviction, but by established guilt. A man who is a felon is so, though he may never have been convicted or prosecuted. I am glad that I shall never see this man again. Let him depart. He has much to be thankful for in the lenity of those friends whose feelings he has tortured, and who have suffered under the degradation he has inflicted upon his family and his friends.

Adjourned sine die, without protection.

THE RECTOR AND CHURCHWARDENS ST. JOHN'S, WALBROOK, v. THE PARISHIONERS THEREOF, AND ALL OTHERS IN GENERAL.

London City Improvement Acts, 1847-1850 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 280, and 13 & 14 Vict. c. 56)—Burial ground—Faculty to remove boundary-wall of, refused.

The mayor and corporation of the city of London proceeding under the powers given them by two Acts of Parliament (the 10 & 11 Vict. c. 280, and the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 56), directed a new street to be made from Cannon-street to St. Paul's Churchyard, and projected other improvements in the neighbouring locality, for the completion of which it became necessary to remove the wall of the burial-ground of the parish of St. John's, Walbrook. It was proposed to rebuild the wall on a different site, not far from its original position, and to remove also, so as to place it within the new wall, a certain tomb, at present standing in the north-east corner of the burial-ground; any bodies that might be disturbed by the proposed alterations were to be re-interred in some suitable place.

It appeared from the affidavit of the vestry-clerk of the parish, that at a vestry meeting an agreement had been made between the parish and the mayor and corporation of the city of London, for the purpose of carrying out these alterations on terms advantageous to the parish, and that very few bodies were ever now interred in the burial-ground, and that the family to which the tomb in question had belonged, was extinct.

It also appeared that by an Act subsequently obtained by the corporation (14 & 15 Vict. c. 91), entitled "The City of London Sewers Act, 1851," having for its object to continue "The City of London Sewers Act, 1848," and to alter and amend the same, it was provided in the 32nd clause "that after any churchyard or burial-ground should have ceased to be used for the interment of the dead, it shall be lawful for the commissioners, with the consent of the Bishop of London, to be signified by any instrument in writing under his hand and seal, to enter into such arrangements as may be agreed upon with the incumbent and churchwardens of the parish in which such churchyard or burial-ground may be situated, for the appropriation thereof, or of any part thereof, to public improvements, or to enlarge and improve the public streets." Other clauses followed, giving powers, in such a case, to remove and re-inter bodies without any faculty for that purpose, and to level and alter the ground, &c. at the expense, under certain limits, of the commissioners. Upon this it was suggested, that had the burial-ground of St. John's, Walbrook, been wholly discontinued as a place of sepulture, then, under the Act last referred to, the entire ground or any part of it might have been appropriated to the enlargement of the adjacent streets or any other recognised public improvement without the aid of the Court; but as the major part of it was proposed to be still retained as a burial-ground, the smaller portions proposed to be taken away, though not required, nor for at least eighty-five years past used for interments, could not be detached from the main body of the ground, however ample the remaining portion might be for the burials required by the parish, except under the authority of a faculty to be granted by the Court for that purpose.

Sir J. D. Harding, Q.A. under these circumstances, applied to the Court for a decree, with intimation to issue, calling upon the parishioners, &c. to shew cause why a faculty should not issue for making the proposed alterations. He cited Steeren and Hollah v. St. Martin's Organs, 2 Add. 255, in which a faculty was granted to take down a building erected for the performance of divine service, &c. in the French language, upon the site of a church destroyed in the fire of London.

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—If this case comes within the statute referred to, 14 & 15 Vict. c. 91, it is clear that the application should be made, not to me, but to the Bishop of London, who may consent in the manner pointed out in the 32nd section. But if the case does not come within that statute, and the application is rightly made to me, can I grant a faculty to desecrate this piece of ground? Upon principle I do not think I could grant such a faculty; but the point has been settled by authority, for I distinctly remember an application of this kind being rejected by Sir Wm. Wynne, in the parish of Ewelme, in Surrey, where he observed that no thing, save an Act of Parliament, would enable him to apply consecrated ground to secular purposes. And I also remember Sir C. Robinson refusing an application of the same kind respecting consecrated ground in some parish in Colchester. Sir W. Wynne's authority is binding on me; and both here and in Rochester I have constantly refused to grant faculties for these purposes. I must reject this motion, however desirable it may be, as advantageous to the public or to the parish, that these improvements should be effected.

CAMPBELL and OTHERS v. THE PARISHIONERS OF PADDINGTON and OTHERS.

Faculty to build a vestry-room on consecrated ground granted.

Since 1824, the parochial business of the parish of Paddington has been managed by certain parishioners elected for the purpose, under the provisions of 5 Geo. 4, c. 126, but as the population and business of the parish increased, it was found that the building originally used for holding the vestry meetings was inconveniently small. At meetings duly held, on the 2nd of March and 4th of May, 1852, it was resolved, in accordance with the recommendation of a committee appointed by the vestry, to remove from the present building, to obtain a site for the erection of a new vestry-room and appropriate offices, and that a certain piece of ground purchased by the parish in 1843 was the most eligible site that could be procured. This piece of ground, however, had been consecrated as a burial-ground, but no bodies had been interred, nor was it intended to be used as a burial-ground. The Bishop of London is the patron of the perpetual curacy and parish church of Paddington. A decree with intimation issued, and was served in the usual manner, and Middleton now moved the Court to decree a license or faculty for erecting suitable buildings for holding vestry and other parochial meetings on this piece of ground.

DR. LUSHINGTON.—If this application was for the purpose of applying this consecrated ground to purely secular purposes, I should, notwithstanding the consent and convenience of all the persons interested, and of the parishioners, hold myself obliged to reject it; for I should be bound by the case of St. George's, Hanover-square, v. Stewart, 2 Str. 1126, where a prohibition was granted in a case in which it was proposed to erect a charity school-room on part of the churchyard. But I have considered the present case a good deal, and I think I can find a distinction between a school-room, which is used for purposes merely secular, and a vestry-room, which may be used for religious purposes. I shall, therefore, grant this faculty, but I do so with no inconsiderable doubt; and it must be taken liable to all the consequences which may follow, if there should happen to be proceedings taken in other Courts WISDOM v. THE MAYOR, ALDERMEN, AND BURGESSES OF DUBLIN.

Absence for seven years—Presumptive death—Renewal of lease—Compensation.

A lease for lives was made, renewable during the period of seventy years, each life to be added within twelve months after the fall of the previous life; one of the lives was not heard of during a period of eighteen years; immediately previous to the expiration of the seventy years the lessee presented a petition for a renewal, nominating a new life in the place of the cestui que vie, who had gone abroad:

Held, that he was entitled to have a renewal, there being no fraud.

Held, that the lessee was not bound to make application for the renewal in the twelve months after the presumption of death had arisen.

Held, also, that the lessors were not entitled to compensation for the presumed dropping of a life every seven years.

This was a cause petition to compel the renewal of a lease. The petition stated that by indenture of the 6th of Nov. 1764, the Corporation of Dublin leased to the Earl of Mornington a plot of ground, to hold for three lives, and for the life of such other person or persons as should thereafter be nominated and appointed during the continuance of a lease granted to a person of the name of Thomas Pooley, which was to determine at the feast of Easter 1781, and for the lives of such other persons as should be nominated and appointed, and from thence during the term of seventy years. The new life to be nominated within twelve months after the fall of each life, a peppercorn fine to be paid on each renewal; and if the rent and duties were not paid, and the life nominated, within the twelve months, the corporation were to be at liberty to refuse to renew. The interest of the Earl of Mornington having by assignment vested in Peter Wilson, the Corporation of Dublin granted, on the 8th of July, 1778, to Peter Wilson a renewal of the lease of 1764, for the lives of his three sons, William, Richard, and David Wilson, with the same covenant for renewal as in the previous lease; in addition to which this lease contained a recital in these words: "And whereas the said Peter Wilson, at Easter assembly, 1777, on account of the fall of the life of Arthur Gerrard Wesley, and also on account of the great inconvenience that might arise in ascertaining the lives in being, the said Garrett Earl of Mornington and Lord Wellesley being abroad, did petition the said Lord Mayor, &c. to have a new lease of the said premises made to him in his own name, for the lives of his three sons, &c. upon the same terms of the said hereinbefore recited lease. Upon which petition it was ordered that a new lease of the said premises should be granted to the said Peter Wilson for the lives in the said petition set forth, on his surrendering the lease granted to the said Earl of Mornington, subject to such covenants as Mr. Recorder should advise." The petition stated several subsequent renewals of the lease in similar terms, the last of which bore date the 3rd day of June, 1820, and deduced the title to the petitioner, and then charged that Joseph Wilson, one of the costui que vies named in the therein-before stated renewal of the year 1820, went to America some time in the month of March 1825, and is now dead, or must be presumed to be dead. That for some time after the said Joseph Wilson left Ireland he corresponded with his cousin, Richard Wilson; but that although letters have been frequently written by Richard Wilson to Joseph Wilson, no reply has been received from him since the year 1833. The petitioner, on the 28th of August, 1848, presented a memorial to the Lord Mayor, &c. praying, under the circumstances already mentioned, a renewal, and nominating a new life. The prayer of the memorial was refused in consequence of there being no evidence of the death of Joseph Wilson.

Green, Q.C. with him Francis Fitzgerald, Q.C. and R. R. Warren, contended that the petitioner was entitled to a renewal, the presumption being that the life was dead since the year 1840; they cited Sweet v. Anderson, 2 Bro. P. C. 256; Lannon v. Napper, 2 Sch. and Lef. 682; Kensington v. Phillips, 5 Dow. 61; Fitzgerald v. Vicars, 2 Dru. and War. 298; Shore v. Lord Darnley, App. to Lyne (case 6), p. xviii; Peal v. Hamilton, 1 Ridg. P. C. 180; Vesseau v. Doe dem. Knight, 2 Mee & W. 910; Lord Palmerston v. The Corporation of Dublin, Lyne on Leases, App. p. lxxiv, case 20.

Christian, Serjt. and Sir C. O'Lochlan, for the corporation, cited —— v. Napper, 2 Sch. & Lef. 682; Harris v. Bryant, 4 Russ. 89; M'Alpin v. Swift, Ball & B. 285.

Thursday, Dec. 18.—The Lord CHANCELLOR.—This is a petition to obtain the benefit of a covenant for renewal contained in a lease made by the corporation of Dublin. The covenant in the lease of 1778 is that upon which the petitioner must rely. [His lordship stated the terms of the covenant and the facts of the case.] This case does not rest upon the ordinary provisions contained in leases for lives with a covenant for renewal Lord Palmerston v. The Corporation of Dublin was of that class, and therefore does not apply. The case rests upon the ordinary equity of the Court in cases of accident. The case of the petitioner is that, though he cannot comply with the terms of the covenant, he is prevented from doing so by unavoidable accident, and is, therefore, entitled to a renewal of the lease. The cases of Sweet v. Anderson, 2 Bro. P. C. 256, and Shore v. Darnley (ubi sup.), are authorities in favour of the petitioner on this part of his case. The statutes 19 Car. 2, c. 6, Eng.; 7 Wm. 3, c. 18, s. 1, Ir. do not apply to the case of a tenant seeking a renewal. Ferman v. Lord Ormonde, Beat. 355, Ir. Rep. is a distinct authority that this doctrine of relief will apply to a contract for a renewal for a limited time. Taking these three cases together they establish the proposition that this is a case to which the Court should apply the doctrine of relief in case of accident. I do not think there is any case shewing that a party relying upon the death of the absent party is bound to make inquiries or institute proceedings in a foreign Court as to the existence or not of the life. The rule of this Court, in cases of accident, is stated by Sir A. Hart in Ferman v. Lord Ormonde, and in Harris v. Bryant. The other question is, whether the tenant was bound to come to the Court the moment the statutable death took place, that is, within twelve months after the year 1840. The authorities shew that, though the statute enables the Court to say that the absent party is dead, it affords no evidence of the period of his death, and for aught we know he may be now alive. This objection was taken in Sweet v. Anderson, and Shore v. Lord Darnley, but seems to have received no countenance. The expiration of the seven years does not conclude the party in all cases, and if the cestui que vie returned, the petitioner would be remitted to his rights. It is for these reasons difficult to hold that under such circumstances the petitioner should be debarred of relief. Compensation has been asked for, and the case of M'Alpin v. Swift, 1 Ball & Beat. 285, was relied upon by the respondent. I do not think this is a case for compensation; none would have been claimed of Mr. Wilson had he within twelve months claimed his right of renewal.

MARIANSKI v. CAIRNS.

Evidence—Practice—Tendering admissible evidence for improper purpose—Mis-entry of verdict on postea—Judge's notes.

An issue was sent to trial, "whether A. (plaintiff) was, at the respective dates of twenty documents, of weak mind; and whether B. (defendant), taking advantage of such weakness, procured A.'s signature to these documents, or any of them, by fraud or intimidation;" and a verdict was entered on the postea thus,—"The jury gave a verdict for the plaintiff on the said issue:"

Held, this verdict was too ambiguous to be applied, but it seemed to be merely a misentry by the clerk of N.P. and that the proper recourse was to the judge, to ask him to correct the verdict according to his notes.

At the trial of the same issue, certain account-books kept by A. were tendered by his counsel, the purpose not being stated, but they seemed to have been used for an improper purpose. B.'s counsel objected that they were inadmissible generally, but the judge admitted them:

Held, the books were admissible, if properly used, under the issue, and as no objection had been taken to the summing up, it was to be presumed the judge directed the jury to make the proper use of them.

Semble, if, at N. P. a document tendered, but excepted to, and afterwards admitted, and used for an improper purpose, yet, if the document be admissible for a proper purpose under the issue, no exception lies to its admission, but the proper course is to except to the judge's summing up, if he does not confine the jury to that use of the document as evidence which alone is proper.

This was an appeal from the Court of Session, in Scotland. A suit was instituted by the respondent, as the representative of the late Alexander Fairservice, to set aside certain securities, purporting to have been granted by the latter for sums of money advanced to him by Marianski, the appellant. Fairservice had two daughters, one of whom is the respondent, and the other, in 1839, married Marianski, who thereupon, with his wife, continued to live in the same house with his father-in-law. Old Fairservice died, seven years after, at a very advanced age, leaving his property, upwards of 20,000*l.* equally between his daughters. Shortly after his death, however, Marianski made out a claim against the executor for a sum of about 10,000*l.* which he alleged was due to him by the testator. In support of this claim, M. represented that he possessed twenty documents as securities for these debts, some of which were in the form of deeds, attested and signed by the testator; others were bills of exchange accepted by him, and bearing to be for value received; the rest were letters or acknowledgments for money lent. Ultimately, issues were directed by the Court for trial in the following terms:- "Whether at the dates, when the signatures and indorsations of Alex. Fairservice were attached to the writings No. 1, 2, 3 (and so on to No. 20), or any of them, the said A. F. was of weak and facile mind, and easily imposed upon; and whether the defendant, taking advantage of his said weakness and facility, did by fraud, or circumvention, or intimidation, procure or obtain the said signatures and indorsations, or any of them, to the injury of the plaintiff." In course of the trial, certain private account-books, and extracts of the same, containing entries of his income and expenditure, kept by Fairservice, and in his handwriting, were tendered in evidence. "Whereupon," says the bill of exceptions, "defendant's counsel objected to the admissibility of the said documents as evidence in the cause, in respect that any written statements or books made or kept by the deceased A. F. in whose right the present suit was raised, was not competent evidence for plaintiff." The judge overruled the exception, and allowed the plaintiff's counsel to ask the witness to read those entries which purported to state the transactions of Fairservice at particular dates. A similar objection as to oral evidence was raised, and overruled—as when plaintiff's counsel asked a witness "whether N. had said he had paid certain expenses himself," alluding to expenses which one of the alleged fraudulent documents purported that Marianski had advanced the money to pay. A bill of exceptions having been tendered, which the Court disallowed, this formed the first half of the present appeal. No objection was taken by defendant's counsel to the judge's summing up, and the jury returned a general verdict for plaintiff, which was entered on the postea thus, "Whereupon the said jury did then and there find a verdict for the plaintiff on the said issue." The second part of the present appeal complained, that this general verdict was too indefinite to form the foundation of a correct judgment, and that it was left uncertain, whether it applied to all the documents and all the means specified in the issue. On both the above grounds, viz. disallowing the exception and the improper verdict, the defendant now appealed, and moved to set aside the verdict, and to have a new trial.

The case was argued in July, 1851, before Lord Chancellor Truro and Lord Brougham.

Sir F. Kelly and Bethell (and Anderson) for appellant.

1. As to the bill of exceptions. This suit might have been maintained by Fairservice himself when alive, to set aside these documents, and we may suppose that he had tendered his own books and declarations as evidence. That would have been to allow a plaintiff to manufacture his own evidence, and put in books, which the defendant had never heard of. [Lord TRURO.—Unless you could shew these books were accessible to Marianski, who lived in the same house. Thus in actions against railway directors, a prospectus lying on the table in the room may go to the jury, to raise a presumption that defendant had notice.] It ought to have been first clearly proved, that defendant knew of these books, whereas there is here no such evidence. The purpose for which the books were tendered, was to contradict the documents relied on by Marianski, to shew, for instance, that the 50*l.* for which M. produces Fairservice's acceptance was in reality lent by F. to M. instead of the reverse. This was clearly an improper purpose. [Lord TRURO.—But it does not appear from the bill of exceptions what was the purpose. We must look then to the issue, to see whether these books were admissible. Now if they were tendered to shew the state of mind of F. that was a proper purpose. I argued in the Irish Society v. Bishop of Derry, 12 Cl. & Fin. 641, that if a document is admitted for one purpose it could not be used for another purpose for which it was not tendered, but the House held the other way.] We do not deny that if the books had been put forward for the purpose of shewing testator's state of mind, they were admissible; but having been put in for the wrong purpose of proving the amount of testator's property, the plaintiff cannot now turn round and say, "Oh, I might have used them for a right purpose." The Irish Society case merely shews that if evidence is admitted for one proper purpose, it may be used for every other purpose; but here it was tendered for an improper purpose. In fact, the books could not have been put in here to shew testator's impaired capacity, for they shew the reverse,—that he was a careful man, and quite capable of conducting his own affairs. 2. As to the verdict, it is too uncertain. The issues comprised several distinct points. Thus four of the jury may have thought that the documents were obtained by fraud, other four that they were obtained by intimidation, and other four that F. was of weak mind; or they may have thought that some of the documents were obtained one way and some the other. As the verdict stands, it is impossible to know which of many suppositions is correct. The jury are asked if twenty documents are obtained in three alternative ways, and they answer "Yes," which is, in fact, an evasive answer, and no judgment can be pronounced on such a foundation. (R. v. O'Connell, 11 Cl. & Fin. 155.)

Peacock, Q.C. and H. Hill, Q.C. for respondent.

1. As to the bill of exceptions, the simple question is, were the books and declarations of Fairservice admissible evidence under an issue as to his sanity or state of mind. Though it does not appear distinctly for what special purpose they were tendered, yet they were clearly admissible evidence, and we must presume they were put in for a right purpose. The whole acts and writings of a person go to the question of sanity. (Wright v. Tatham, 5 Cl. & Fin. 670.) 2. As to the verdict, it is quite capable of application, and would be a correct verdict in this country. Thus in trespass for breaking a house and garden, the two being distinct trespasses, if the verdict was for plaintiff that would mean defendant was guilty of both. (Ladd v. Thomas, 4 Per. & D. 9.) So the common-sense meaning of this verdict is, that all the documents were obtained by fraud and intimidation. (Com. Dig. Pleader, s. 26.33.) It is the every-day practice here to include fraud and intimidation under one count. (Robson v. Luscombe, 2 D. & L. 859; Goram v. Sweeting, 2 Wms. Saund. 205.) But, at all events, it was impracticable to plead with greater certainty and minuteness in the present case, and the law yields to circumstances. Marianski kept Fairservice entirely under his control, and nobody but himself could know whether it was fraud or intimidation that was practised, but it must have been one or other of these means. Want of certainty in such circumstances is dispensed with, and the verdict is not bad on that ground. (R. v. O'Brien, 1 Den. Cr. C. 9; R. v. Sarah Willis, Ibid. 80; R. v. ——, Russ. & R. 489; Steph. pl. 367.)

Anderson replied. Cur. adv. vult.

Lord TRURO.—It will be observed that these issues are not in the form in which issues are usually directed. Issues from the Courts of Law in this country are so framed as to present a single question to the jury—an affirmation with a negation, and admitting of a distinct answer by the verdict of the jury. I, however, have seen issues, even in this country, from Courts of Equity, which have assumed something like the form of those in question; but it has led to no inconvenience, for this reason, that issues from the Courts of Equity, being merely to inform the conscience of the Court, and to afford collateral assistance, they are always accompanied by a direction and permission to the learned judge to make any special indorsement that may be necessary, and when, therefore, it has become necessary to distinguish the parts of the verdict applying to only certain parts of the issues, that has been done by indorsement upon the postea. Now, the question raised by the objections taken at the trial is this: in an issue relating to the state of mind of an individual, are his declarations and conduct evidence I must ask, by what test do you always try, whether of sane mind or of weak mind or not? Shut out his conduct, his declarations, and his acts, and what is the test by which you are to try the state of his mind? How do you try it in a criminal case, or in any case? The mistake seems to me to be this: the learned counsel seems to have mistaken the substance of these issues. If the issue had been, whether Fairservice was indebted to Marianski in this amount, what F. had said or done about this not in the presence of M. or to his knowledge might be subject to objection. But when the question is weakness, or imbecility of mind, or insanity, there is, in truth, no other means and no other species of evidence pertinent to that issue, but the man's sayings and his conduct. Look at it as applied to this case. You want to know, with reference to certain documents signed by him, the state of his mind and the state of his memory. Suppose he almost at the same instant writes in his book, that he has paid certain sums of money out of his own resources, and also writes on a piece of paper to Mr. Marianski that he has paid them for him, and that it is a debt due to him, what would you say to such a case as that? Suppose you find on the same subject inconsistent conduct at the same period of time, so as to evidence that either the man has no memory at all, or that some most extraordinary fatuity must have attached to him, in order to induce conduct so opposite and inconsistent. I put the illustration, because it is of a character which applies to the case. He is supposed to have drawn money from his bankers on a certain day. He has entries in his book of payment on a certain day: he has, almost contemporaneously, admissions which purport to be admissions of those very payments by Marianski. But, without adverting to the particular evidence in the case beyond this, that it is a question as to Fairservice's declarations and as to his entries, the exception taken to that is general: that no declarations, that no entries on his part, no writing on his part, can be evidence. That exception is much too wide. It was only evidence to shew the state of his mind. If used as evidence of the truth of the entries, as evidence connected with the existence of the debt, the exception would have been to the abuse of it—to an improper mode of dealing with it, and not to its admissibility itself. But that evidence being properly receivable with regard to the state of his mind, I take it for granted that it was properly used, and your lordships cannot doubt but that the learned judge, in summing up to the jury, told them to what part of the issue it was applicable, and to what extent it might be used as supporting that issue. There is no exception to the summing up of the learned judge. The argument has run here as though this was used, in order to enable a man, by his own declarations, to defeat a claim made against him of a pecuniary nature. If used for that purpose, it was proper matter of objection. But looking to the intelligence of the learned counsel below, and seeing that there was every disposition to preserve the utmost regularity in the proceeding, one cannot doubt that, if the learned judge had left it in the manner which has been argued at the Bar, it would have been a matter of exception. It therefore comes to this: the summing up of the learned judge is free from objection; this was pertinent evidence to the issue if properly used; therefore the House may take it for granted, as every appellate tribunal must take it for granted, that that which might be properly done in the jurisdiction below, was properly done, more particularly when the parties are understood to have taken every objection which was fairly open to them, and no objection was taken to that. Then the evidence is admissible, and the exception is undoubtedly too large, but that is the less material, the evidence being admissible. The second exception with respect to any objection to the summing up, and it therefore appears to me, that the interlocutor disallowing the bill of exceptions must be confirmed. The second matter of objection to which the interlocutor appealed against relates to is the application of the verdict. Now it will be observed, that the issues are no doubt framed in an objectionable manner. If the issue, instead of being "whether the said documents, or any of them had said "whether the said documents were respectively obtained by fraud," it would have got rid of the objection; but looking at it as it is, it is said that there is a great difficulty in applying the verdict to the issue, so as to make that verdict the foundation of a correct judgment. The first issue directed is, "Whether Mr. Fairservice was of weak and facile mind, and easily imposed upon." The second is, "Whether the said documents, or any of them, were obtained by fraud, or circumvention or intimidation." "Verdict for the plaintiff." My lords, there is this mistake, instead of entering the verdict of the jury according as it must have been understood to have been pronounced, the officer's note of that verdict was entered. It will be perfectly well understood at your lordships' Bar, that although the clerk at Nisi Prius takes the "verdict for plaintiff" or "for defendant," the postea is entered up, "and the jury, upon their oaths, say that the defendant did this, that, or the other," embodying in the entry on the postea that which is the substance of the finding. The learned judge says to the jury, if you are of opinion that such and such facts occurred, then you will find your verdict for the plaintiff; "If you are of opinion that such and such other facts occurred, you will find your verdict for the defendant." When you come to make the entry upon the postea, though the clerk takes a note of the verdict, as being for the plaintiff or defendant, you expand it, and make it in substance an answer to the question put, just as when you ask a witness, Was so and so present? "Yes" is his answer. But if you had to state that man's evidence, you would not put his answer "Yes." You would state "The witness said that A. B. was present." So that here this appears to me to be little more than a misprision of the clerk in making the entry. Suppose the judge directed the jury thus: "Gentlemen, in whatever verdict you give you must be unanimous. You cannot find a verdict for plaintiff or for defendant, upon the ground that some of you think that five of the documents were obtained by fraud, and others of you think that the rest of them were obtained by intimidation, and so dividing yourselves you all agree that the twenty documents were obtained by some of these means, but you differ with regard to the means as applicable to certain sets of them. You cannot find your verdict at all for the plaintiff in such a case, but if you are unanimously of opinion that the whole of these twenty documents were obtained by the same means, being unanimous as to the documents and being unanimous as to the means, you may find your verdict for the plaintiff; or if you are of opinion unanimously, that certain of these documents were obtained by given means, and others were not, you may give your verdict for the plaintiff with regard to the documents, numbers one to ten, and for defendant with regard to documents from ten to twenty." Supposing the learned judge so directed the jury, this issue, notwithstanding the form in which it is framed, would admit of such a summing up as might be the foundation of a correct verdict. Are your lordships to presume that there was a correct summing up in this case? No doubt you are, and are bound so to do, there being no objection to it, and no reason upon earth why the common principle should not prevail of presuming things to be rightly and properly done, until you have some ground presented for inferring the contrary. Now, it will be observed that, when this case comes on before the Court below to apply the verdict, they have the report of the judge's summing up, and they have then the answer of the jury. There is no doubt that below the judge reported that which, independent of any character belonging to the learned individual in the particular case, any judge competent to his duty would do. He would report,—"I directed the jury that they must be unanimous; and that if they were of opinion so and so and so and so and so, they could find a verdict generally for the pursuer." Reporting, that the judges below had the answer of the jury,—"Verdict for plaintiff." What does that verdict mean? You must resort to the summing up, to know what "verdict for plaintiff" means. It means, that each and every of the respective documents was obtained by such and such means. Then, when the Court had so assumed, the proper mode of entering up and applying the verdict upon the record would have been to have stated, not "verdict for the plaintiff," generally, but that the jury found that the said documents mentioned were obtained by such and such means. It seems to me, therefore, that this is a mere informal entry of the verdict. What is the course in such a case? Why, it is a perfectly well known one. It is, that, perceiving a verdict which appears to be inapplicable to the issue from its uncertainty and its ambiguity, you refer to the judge who tried the cause, that the verdict may be entered according to the substance of the actual finding, which he may do by his notes. It is not at all too late to do that; and it has been of frequent practice. My lords, there are several cases in which it has been done after a judgment of reversal. In one case which I may mention, a modern one, Richardson v. Mellish, 7 B. & C. 819; 3 Bing. 334, S. C.; in which I was of counsel, the Court of C. P. had given judgment against a motion for arrest of judgment. A writ of error was brought in the K. B. and the judgment was reversed. Application was made to the C. P. to amend the record by the judge's notes. I objected, the judgment being reversed. That was held not to be a valid objection, and the Court of C. P. amended the verdict by Lord Gifford's notes; and in a remarkable case, for Lord Gifford had ceased to be a judge of the Court at the time, being then Master of the Rolls; but they sent for his notes, and they used his notes to correct the entry of the verdict. The parties then went to the Court of K. B. to ask the K. B. to alter the record in that Court, to make it correspond with the record as it stood in its amended state in the C. P. and then to amend and alter the judgment of reversal to a judgment of affirmance. Some doubt was entertained, and it was fought with considerable spirit. It was a large verdict, and the Court were induced to make a special entry of these circumstances; upon which a writ of error was brought to this House, and the objection was again raised at the Bar; but the House held that this was matter of practice of the Court below, of which they could take no notice, and the judgment was affirmed. So, my lords, we find in several other cases, though I need hardly refer to them, because in Tidd's Practice, tit. "Verdict," you will find the matter all laid down, with a note of several cases. But I will just mention one case, in order to shew how strong the practice is, because it was a criminal case, and the man was executed. That is mentioned in Short v. Coffin, 5 Burr. 2730, where it is said that, in the case of Mr. Francis, after the entry of the judgment of attainder, the verdict was altered according to the judge's notes, and the man executed. Now the cases, as I have before mentioned, are very numerous. There is a very strong one, Harrison v. King, 1 B. & Ald. 161. The amendment was refused there; but why? It was after a judgment of reversal, and eight years after the trial; and the ground upon which it was refused was, that coming so late, you had to trust to the judge's memory and recollection; and where, as Lord Tenterden said, the gentlemen at the Bar might have left the Bar, whose assistance might be necessary to make the entry correspond with what had actually taken place at the trial. It was merely on account of the delay that it was refused in that case, and there, also, after a judgment of reversal. There is another case of Eddowes v. Hopkins, 1 Doug. 376. In fact, it is almost waste of time to refer to the cases, they are so numerous. It is a matter of constant practice, and your lordships find it laid down in Tidd's Practice, that it may be done at any stage of the proceedings. It is in the discretion of course of the Court below, who will exercise, it is to be supposed, a sound discretion on the subject. Then, my lords, how does the case stand? Here is an issue which, if properly conducted, would lead to a verdict which might be the proper foundation of a judgment, but here is an ambiguous verdict. The proper course, and the course sanctioned and called for by practice, seems to me to be, to let this case stand over, in order to furnish an opportunity for an application to the Court below to amend the entry of the verdict according to the judge's notes. It is in that learned judge's discretion, always meaning, of course, not an arbitrary discretion, but one governed by law, and by fact, and by justice, whether he will amend it in the way in which he may be asked. If he thinks fit to alter the entry of the verdict, then it will be for the Court to say, whether they will amend the application of that verdict, in which case the record in this House will be amended to correspond with it, and the House will give judgment according to the record in its amended state. At present, therefore, I should recommend your lordships not to act upon the ambiguous verdict as it stands, but to overrule the exception so far as it applies to the admissibility of the evidence, and to let the case remain over for ultimate judgment, until there has been an opportunity to make the application which I have mentioned. Such appears to me to be the correct view of the case sanctioned by principle and practice, and I think it is the safest course for your lordships to pursue.

Wednesday, June 9.

MONCKTON v. THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

Practice—Drawing up order after death of party.

affected by it—Injunction restraining proceeding on petition of right—Monstrans de droit.

On the hearing of a petition of right, upon which an injunction was granted, one of the petitioners had died, and after the hearing and before judgment was pronounced, the other had also died. Motion to discharge an order (for irregularity) obtained as of course at the Rolls, under which the order made on the petition had been drawn up, nunc pro tunc, refused.

Where two persons are in the same interest, and one dies before judgment, the interest being represented, there is no abatement.

After hearing and before judgment, parties petitioning died: an order made on the petition can be entered nunc pro tunc.

In this case an injunction had been granted by the late Lord Cottenham to restrain all further proceedings in the Petty Bag Office under a petition of right The case is reported in 2 Mac. & Gor. 402, where the facts are very fully stated.

They are very briefly these. Catherine Robson and Isabella Ainsley (who came in before the Master under a decree of 1794, directing an inquiry who were the next of kin of Samuel Troutbeck, in the year 1815) their husbands being dead presented their petition of right, claiming to have restored to them the sum of 400,000*l.* as being, together with interest, the amount of the real and personal estate of the said Samuel Troutbeck, wrongfully seized into the hands and to the care of the Crown, upon an untrue suggestion and surmise that the testator had died without heir or next of kin, and the erroneous judgment and decree of the Court of Chancery made in pursuance of such untrue suggestion or surmise. In the year 1813, the Master had reported that only one person (not either of the above parties) had claimed, but which claim had been disallowed, and that there were no next of kin or heir-at-law, and the property having, in 1815 and 1816, been accordingly paid to the officer of his Majesty's Treasury, an order was made in the year 1825, upon the petition of Catherine Robson and Isabella Ainsley and their husbands and another person, with the consent of the Attorney-General, referring it again to the Master to make the general inquiry as to the next of kin and heir-at-law of the testator. These parties having made their claim before the Master, it was by his report of June 1827, disallowed. Exceptions were taken to this finding and overruled; but upon an appeal an issue was directed which produced a verdict against the claim. A motion for a new trial was refused, and a similar motion having been made in 1833 upon the ground of the discovery of new evidence, that motion was also refused. All those orders were, upon an appeal to the House of Lords, affirmed in 1843.

The petition of Mrs. Robson and Mrs. Ainsley in 1846, received the usual indorsement "Let right be done," and the usual commission having issued, the return found certain facts confirmatory, as the petitioners alleged, of their case; whereupon they insisted that the Attorney-General was bound to meet their case upon that return by plea, traverse, or demurrer, which in effect would be to continue the litigation at law, and to try the cause upon the strength of these ladies' case alone.

Accordingly, in the year 1848, a petition was presented by the Attorney-General, in the suit of Monckton v. The Attorney-General, praying that those parties might be restrained by injunction from taking any proceedings in the office of the Petty Bag of the Court of Chancery to confirm the verdict taken upon such inquisition, or from taking any proceedings at law on the verdict or inquisition, or any proceeding arising out of or incident thereto, or from using the same proceedings, or any of them, except under the order and direction of the Court as a Court of Equity, in the suit or such suit, or other proceeding in Chancery as the Court should direct. On the hearing, Lord Cottenham made an order according to the prayer of the petition, adding only "the petitioners being at liberty to institute such proceedings, or to make such application in this honourable court relative to the matter of the said petition of right as they might be advised."

At the hearing of the petition, upon which that injunction was granted, one of the parties prosecuting the petition of right had died, and the other had also died before the judgment was pronounced. Lord Cottenham's order was drawn up nunc pro tunc under an order of course at the Rolls. The representatives of Mrs. Robson and Mrs. Ainsley having commenced proceedings under a writ of monstrans de droit to carry out the remedy given them by the finding under the inquisition, the Attorney-General presented this petition to restrain that proceeding, which, as it was alleged, was in contravention of the order of 1848, pronounced by Lord Cottenham. There was a motion also on behalf of the representatives of the suppliants to discharge Lord Cottenham's order and the order at the Rolls for irregularity.

Stuart, Rolt, Page Wood, W. M. James, and Anstey, appeared for the several parties.

The following cases were cited:—Lee v. Lee, 1 H. 617; Fallowes v. Williamson, 11 Ves. 312; Boddy v. Kent, 1 Mer. 364; Sheffield v. The Duchess of Buckingham, Cases temp. Lord Hardwicke, 676; Davies v. Davies, 9 Ves. 461; Bertie v. Lord Falkland, 1 Dick. 25; Eastwood v. Glenton, 2 M. & K. 280; Ex parte De Vismes, 6 Jur. 911; Sellas v. Dawson, 1 Atk. 263; Rex v. Hornby (the Banker's case), 5 Mod. 30; Kirk v. The Bromley Union, 2 Purton Cooper, 177; Staunforde on the King's Prerogative, and the argument of the Lord Keeper Somers in the Banker's case, 14 State Trials, 39.

Stuart, in reply.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, in giving judgment, said, that the first question raised was a point of practice,—what was the effect of a judgment pronounced, after one of the persons, alive at the hearing of a cause, had died? Two persons were in the same interest, one only was alive at the hearing, but the interest was completely represented; then, before the judgment was delivered, both persons had died. His lordship had always thought that the judgment dated from the conclusion of the hearing, and in that opinion he was borne out by what Lord Eldon decided in Davies v. Davies. There Lord Eldon held that the death of one of the defendants after the hearing, and before judgment, was not material; and the case of Kirk v. The Bromley Union was a clear authority that judgment might be given, notwithstanding the death of the party affected after the hearing. It was, indeed, a rational construction, and the law of abatements had been productive of so much delay and expense that he should have been slow to decide otherwise. Where all parties had been substantially heard there was very little danger in following the practice. Lord Cottenham, his lordship considered, had decided the point; and if he (Lord St. Leonard's) had then to decide it for the first time without authority, he should probably have decided that the judgment might be carried out by entering it, as had been the case, nunc pro tunc. That question being so decided, and the order of Lord Cottenham being in existence, he could not, until it was reversed, refuse to continue the injunction. That order of Lord Cottenham might, it was true, be reheard, but before it could be reheard, it was necessary that permission for a rehearing should be obtained, and his lordship would not, when made, be disposed to grant it. Mrs. Robson and Mrs. Ainsley might have had a claim on the private benevolence of the Crown, but they had no right on which they could found their claim. There had been a failure of representation, and in such case the writ of right could give no relief, and it was therefore strange that such a writ should have been conceded. A writ of right was a remedy against the Crown when no other relief could be obtained; but the parties here had other remedies, and which they had failed to establish, and they had failed, too, not in one instance, but in every court in which they had endeavoured to establish it. The matter had been properly decided. Lord Cottenham had so thought, and had so decided; and his lordship was not disposed to grant any facility for new experiments, which would lead to fresh expenses without any useful result. With respect to the remedy by monstrans de droit, his lordship did not see how it could produce any beneficial result. Nobody ever had a more perfect opportunity of litigating any right upon every point than these parties; they had tried every method and had failed in all. If they could have shewn a title superior to that of the Crown there would have been something to try, but they had nothing to offer but a denial of the right of the Crown, without being able to sustain any of their own. Conceiving that the writ of right had been too hastily granted, and that on that account these parties might have been induced to institute further proceedings, his lordship made no order as to costs.

Injunction granted as respected the proceedings by monstrans de droit on the same terms as the injunction granted by Lord Cottenham, and the motion to discharge the orders for irregularity refused.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

Reported by OWEN DAVIES TUDOR, Esq. of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law.

(Before the LORDS JUSTICES.)

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Ex parte WRAGGE, re WRAGGE.

June 1, 5, 7, 8, 9, and 10.

Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849—Conduct of a trader—Refusal of certificate—Bankers when insolvent receiving deposits.

Bankers continued to trade and receive deposits, knowing that they were deeply insolvent:

Held, affirming the decision of the commissioner, that they were not, under the 198th section of the Bankrupt Act, entitled to certificates of conformity; but, with the consent of the assignees and opposing creditors, personal protection, as far as it might be available, was granted to them.

Quære, whether the Court can grant protection to bankrupts, to whom certificates have been refused, as against all creditors?

This was a petition by way of appeal from the order of Mr. Commissioner Balguy, of the 1st May, 1852, refusing, under the 198th section of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, the bankrupts, Mr. Francis Rufford and Charles John Wragge, certificates of conformity, and it prayed that the said order might be reversed or varied, and that certificates, or, in any event, protection from arrest, might be granted to the petitioners.

The 198th section is as follows:—"That forthwith after the bankrupt shall have passed his last examination, the Court shall appoint a public sitting for the allowance of his certificate (whereof, and of the purport whereof, twenty-one days' notice shall be given in the London Gazette, and to the solicitor of the assignee), and at such sitting the assignees, or any of the creditors of such bankrupt, who shall have given to the registrar of the Court three clear days' notice in writing of his intention to oppose, may be heard against the allowance of such certificate; and the Court, having regard to the conformity of the bankrupt to the law of bankruptcy, and to his conduct as a trader before as well as after his bankruptcy, and whether the allowance of such certificate be opposed by any creditor or not, shall judge of any objection against allowing such certificate, and either find the bankrupt entitled thereto, and allow the same, or refuse or suspend the allowance thereof, or annex such conditions thereto as the justice of the case may require."

It appeared that some time previous to the year 1810, Mr. Philip Rufford, together with the petitioner, Francis Rufford, his son, carried on in partnership the Bromsgrove Bank, under the firm of Rufford, Biggs, and Rufford, and Philip and Francis Rufford and Charles John Wragge carried on the Stourbridge Bank in partnership together, under the firm of Rufford, Biggs, and Rufford. The Bromsgrove Bank, up to the period of the bankruptcy, was under the direction of Francis Rufford, and the Stourbridge Bank under that of Mr. Wragge. With regard to Mr. Philip Rufford, he was a gentleman far advanced in life, and had taken no part in the control or management of either of the banks, and the commissioner suspended his certificate for twelve months from the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, when a third-class certificate was to be delivered to him. Mr. Philip Rufford did not appeal from the decision of the commissioner. It appeared that the bankrupts commenced business with a very small capital, viz. Mr. Philip and Francis Rufford each, with 2,500*l.* nominally, and Mr. Wragge with that sum in cash. One ground upon which the decision of the learned commissioner turned (and which may be briefly noticed, although their lordships' decision proceeded on another ground) was, the improper and the speculative nature of the investments made by the bankrupts of the large deposits which were intrusted to them.

In one instance advances to the amount of about 90,000*l.* were made by the Bromsgrove Bank to Messrs. Fardon and Gossage, who carried on large chemical works in the neighbourhood of Bromsgrove. These works were subsequently transferred to a company called the British Alkali Company, of which Mr. Francis Rufford was a large shareholder and chairman (Mr. Wragge being also a shareholder), for upwards of 100,000*l.* Messrs. Fardon and Gossage, continuing shareholders to a considerable amount, and, as such, being without capital, required and obtained large advances from the Bromsgrove Bank, to the amount, in 1841, of 67,000*l.* at which time that bank arranged to take in full discharge for that sum, from Messrs. Fardon and Gossage, their shares in the British Alkali Company, shares in the White Lead Company, the Disc Engine Company, and other patents. Ultimately, in 1851, it appeared that upwards of 100,000*l.* had been advanced by the Bromsgrove Bank on the account of this speculation, and that there was then due to the bank for interest and other charges the additional sum of nearly 60,000*l.* while the shares of the British Alkali Company and the White Lead Company were almost valueless, and the Disc Engine Patent, although apparently an invention which might, if brought into use, be productive, was not then available for the purposes of bringing in any revenue.

Again in 1841, the Stourbridge Bank took to the Churchbridge Colliery for a bad debt, and it was found out when worked to be a losing concern.

Another speculation, in which Mr. F. Rufford and Mr. Wragge joined, was the Bloxwich Colliery. In the first instance they advanced 10,000*l.* between them out of the moneys of the Stourbridge Bank, and in 1846, the colliery had become indebted to the bank in the sum of 34,000*l.* and in 1851, at the time of the bankruptcy, in the sum of 43,000*l.*

In the year 1845, they closed their account with Messrs. Spooner and Attwood, to whom at that time there was a balance of nearly 40,000*l.* owing from the Bromsgrove Bank, but there was a balance in favour of the Stourbridge Bank of 7,000*l.* They then transferred their account to Messrs. Glyn, Halifax, and Mills, who, in 1847, began to complain that they had overdrawn their accounts, and their complaints continued without intermission until they refused to honour their notes, and the parties were declared bankrupts in June 1851. It appears from the accounts of the two banks, that in the year 1849, if not long before, they were both deeply insolvent, and from the circumstances and letters noticed in the judgment of their lordships, it appears that the bankrupts, although they knew that such was the case, continued to receive deposits down to the time of their bankruptcy, and, in fact, during the six months preceding the bankruptcy, the Bromsgrove Bank received fresh deposits to the amount of 7,200*l.* and the Stourbridge Bank to the amount of 8,500*l.* At that time the debt due to Messrs. Glyn and Co. reached the sum of 70,000*l.*; but what with current bills which were productive, and securities which they from time to time obtained from the bankrupts, they would sustain no loss whatever, but would absorb all that could properly be considered the substantial and certain property of the two banks, leaving to the body of the creditors such divisible assets only as might be raised from balances owing. At the time of the bankruptcy the Bromsgrove Bank was indebted to the Stourbridge firm to the amount of 120,000*l.*; and although it appears that Mr. F. Rufford had exercised considerable influence over Mr. Wragge, who managed the Stourbridge Bank; still Mr. Wragge must have been aware of the advances which created the debt.

With regard to the private expenditure of the bankrupts, it appeared that Mr. Francis Rufford had, although unmarried, been living at the rate of 3,000*l.* a year, was a member of Parliament, and had spent between 3,000*l.* and 4,000*l.* in a contested election at Worcester. The expenditure of Mr. Wragge, who was a married man with a large family, appears to have been moderate.

Sir W. Page Wood, Atherton (of the Common Law Bar), and Renshaw, in support of the appeal, urged upon the Court that a third class certificate would be a sufficient punishment for the petitioners; that with regard to Mr. Francis Rufford, he had been led into speculations which turned out unfortunately, from an over-sanguine temperament; that he was willing to give up all his time to the winding up of the affairs of the banks, and to alleviate the distress occasioned by the bankruptcy as far as it was in his power, by giving up all his future property as the Court might think fit to order. On behalf of Mr. Wragge it was submitted that he had been misled or over-persuaded by Mr. Francis Rufford; that his private expenses had been on a most moderate scale; and that the case of the Stourbridge Bank stood upon a different footing from that of the Bromsgrove Bank. On behalf of both, it was contended that they did not believe their affairs desperate; they had still hopes of retrieving them (as many eminent firms, it was said, had done), until the time when they became bankrupts. [Lord Justice Knight Bruce.—The great question is, whether they continued to receive deposits at the bank when, as honest men, they ought not to have done so.] True, but the bankrupts had been guilty of no dishonesty; their speculations, though perhaps unsuccessful, and even rash, ought in the award of punishment, which to a certain extent they merited, to be distinguished from cases where the parties had been guilty of the grossest fraud and dishonesty. A refusal of a certificate would confound them with such persons. A third class certificate would sufficiently testify the censure of their imprudence by the Court; or if that was refused, protection to their persons ought to be granted. Dornford's case, and Johnson's case, 15 Jur. 278; 20 L. J. N.S. 6 & 7, Bank.; 16 Law T. Rep. 346; Wakefield's case, 17 Law T. Rep. 55; Holthouse's case, 18 Law T. Rep. 84; Ex parte Jardine, 1 Fonb. 182; 16 Law T. Rep. 305; St. Alban's Bank, 1 Fonb. 81; and Martyn's case (not yet reported), were cited and commented on.

Swanston and Huddleston (of the common law bar) for the official and creditors' assignees, contended that as the bankrupt had engaged in reckless speculations, and had, although they were for several years in a state of deep and increasing insolvency, continued to receive deposits until the very day of their bankruptcy, their conduct was such as traders as disentitled them to certificates. And with regard to Mr. Francis Rufford, his personal expenditure, in his circumstances, was altogether unjustifiable. [Lord Justice Knight Bruce.—Suppose we were to come to the conclusion that the certificates ought to be refused, should you object to our granting personal protection?] We should not.

Bacon, for some opposing creditors, contended that certificates ought not to be granted, although the creditors would offer no opposition to personal protection being granted.

Sir W. Page Wood in reply, amongst other grounds upon which he urged the Court to grant third-class certificates, stated that he feared the protection which the assignees and creditors were disposed to consent to the Court granting would not be available for all purposes, and that the bankrupts would still be liable to arrest at the hands of those creditors who had not come in under the bankruptcy.

Lord Justice Lord Cranworth.—This is a very distressing case, and if further consideration would have been of any use, we would have taken further time to look at the examinations used in evidence; but the truth is, that the point we have to decide does not depend on a very nice construction of the particular passages to which our attention has been drawn, but depends rather upon those general principles which have been discussed in the able arguments which have been addressed to us. The question is, whether these gentlemen, Mr. F. Rufford and Mr. Wragge, or either of them, are entitled to a certificate under the 198th section of the Bankrupt Act. The learned commissioner having heard the case and refused the certificates, Mr. F. Rufford and Mr. Wragge have appealed to us, and the question is whether they have made out such a case as to warrant our saying that the commissioner is wrong. It is our duty, and it is a very painful one, to say that they have failed in establishing such a case, and we think, therefore, that the commissioner was right. It is said that he proceeded on several grounds, one of which was, that the parties had laid out money on improvident investments as bankers; but it is not necessary for us to consider how far the investments were of such a character; for, independently of that, we think that the bankrupts had not so conducted themselves as to warrant the granting of a certificate, that they had misconducted themselves as traders, by going on trading and receiving deposits after they must have known they were utterly and hopelessly insolvent. Sir W. Page Wood said this is often the case with men who afterwards retrieved their affairs, and recovered themselves, but I hope this is a somewhat exaggerated representation, caused by the sanguine view which he takes of his clients' case; but I must observe that although that may be sometimes the case, it would be no justification for such conduct, and least of all in the case of bankers, because every one must know that the misery produced in a neighbourhood by the failure of a bank is so great that one almost shrinks from contemplating it, and it appears to have been the case in the present instance. The question is, did the bankrupts continue to carry on their business as bankers when they must have known that they were hopelessly insolvent, and that misery and ruin must be the consequence of their continuing to do so? I think it is impossible to answer that question otherwise than affirmatively. At the time of the bankruptcy there were assets of the Stourbridge Bank to the amount of four shillings in the pound, and in the Bromsgrove Bank to the amount only of one shilling in the pound, not taking into consideration the expenses of the bankruptcy. So that, looking at the facts of the case in the most favourable light, they continued as bankers to receive deposits, knowing that if their whole affairs were wound up there would not be more than five shillings in the pound, and that, in my opinion, is conduct utterly unjustifiable. That was the state of the assets when the bankruptcy took place in 1851, and there was no great difference from the state of their assets in 1849, and at the time of the bankruptcy. When had the parties a knowledge of this state of affairs? There is abundant evidence to shew that the truth of the case was perfectly manifest to their minds. In September Mr. Wragge came to London to Messrs. Glyn and Co. and had an interview with Mr. Glyn and his solicitor, and Glyn consented to make further advances with great reluctance, because on the 19th Wragge writes to Mr. F. Rufford, that if Mills had been there they would not have got the money. That was the state of things in September. On the 7th of October, Wragge having returned into the country, and at the instance of the Glyns, investigated the state as well of the Stourbridge as of the other bank, writes a letter to Mr. F. Rufford, in which he says, "I cannot see my way without something important and immediate from the engine." "Engine" means the patent right in the disc engine, the result of which is always doubtful; but to rely upon that, however useful and ingenious the disc engine might be in order to make up the deficiency, was absurd. An investigation takes place, various letters pass on the occasion, and Glyn requiring further information, writes into the country; and I was much struck by the letter of the 12th of October from Wragge to Rufford, saying that the "answer to Glyn must be written with great care." But all letters ought to be written with great care; but I cannot help seeing that he meant "Answer truly, but let it be such an answer as shall lull suspicion." It was an answer written with great care—the whole truth was not discovered—it was not suggestio falsi, but suppressio veri. The correspondence goes on with Messrs. Glyn and more assistance is obtained, but if at that time Mr. Wragge had looked into the affairs of the banks he would have known, and must on the evidence be taken to have known, that the Stourbridge Bank owed 225,000*l.* and had no more than 4s. in the pound, and the Bromsgrove Bank owed 227,000*l.* and had less than 1s. in the pound of assets. Having ascertained this they continue to receive deposits from rich and poor, but with a perfect knowledge that if all demands were made on them at once, there was not the remotest hope of paying them in full. This state of things continued for a year and a half before the bankruptcy, and I must say it is conduct in traders such as clearly disentitles them to the benefit of certificates. It is said that by refusing the certificates we shall be placing the bankrupts in the same category as the bankrupt in the case of St. Alban's Bank, which was clearly a breach of trust, a misappropriation of a bill, and confounding them with the bankrupts in Holthouse's case, who bought goods on credit, and immediately sold them at lower prices, conduct something analogous to swindling. And in one sense this is true, so far as the refusal is to be regarded as a punishment; but this is a misfortune incident to all laws that partake of a penal character. It is impossible that persons shall not sustain the same amount of punishment, though their faults may not be precisely equal. If not, no person could be hanged except for the worst kind of murder. If we are to make nice distinctions, and say that if the moral guilt of one bankrupt be somewhat less than the moral guilt of another, we will not visit both alike, we might as well say that if one murder committed is not of equal aggravation with another, that one has circumstances of extenuation which another has not, in cases of murder, you cannot possibly execute any murderer of the less atrocious dye. I do not agree to that, and to such an extent the principle must be carried, if the appellants' case is to be decided on the argument adduced. Human laws cannot make such nice distinctions, especially laws relating or analogous to criminal justice. But I do not agree that we have to inflict a punishment; the case is whether the conduct of the parties as traders is such as entitles them to a benefit in the shape of a certificate, giving them protection from their creditors; it is rather withholding a benefit from them which good conduct might have entitled them to, rather than awarding to them a punishment. I think, however, with regard to this case, the interests of society require that we should not cast any doubt on the judgment of the learned commissioner, and that we ought to refuse a certificate to both these gentlemen; for though distinctions have been attempted to be made between their cases, and stress laid upon the difference of their temperaments, we cannot go into those niceties. I think it utterly impossible to believe that two persons who day by day, and almost hour by hour, were in communication with each other by letter and personally, can either of them be ignorant of all that was known to the other; both of them must have known that in truth their affairs were desperate; and if they did not, they must have wilfully closed their eyes to the truth; and I am much struck with Mr. Wragge's answers in his examination, for when he was asked as to the state of their affairs in 1849, he did not venture to say that he believed that the banks had the means of paying their debts; that they were not, in fact, insolvent. There is no objection raised on the part of the assignees to protection being granted to the bankrupts, and I am of opinion we ought only to grant it by consent as far as it can be made available; it is not necessary to discuss the question. It is available against creditors coming in under the statute, but whether it may avail against the Common Law right of any creditor not coming in under the bankruptcy, it is not part of our duty to speculate. Our judgment must simply be to dismiss the appeal, qualifying the order in regard to protection so far as it is consented to by the assignees and the opposing creditor.

Lord Justice Knight Bruce.—Acceding entirely to what has just been said by my learned brother, I wish to be distinctly understood as not departing from anything said or done by me in the cases of Wakefield, Dornford, Johnson, and Martyn. If I had been persuaded that there had been any error in all, or any of those cases, on my part, I hope I should have been prompt to have stated it; but having since the commencement of the argument considered those four cases, I adhere to them as decided by myself, observing only in passing as to Dornford's case that my only doubt was, whether he had not been too severely dealt with by the commissioner. My opinion ultimately was that he was not. The present case is importantly distinguishable from each and every of those cases. The present case is distinguishable not only by the fact, that these gentlemen were bankers in a populous neighbourhood, but also on other grounds. The bankruptcy happened in June 1851, and it is not necessary to go farther back with the history of those gentlemen or the banks than the autumn of 1849, and I do not think that it would be of any advantage to the bankrupts to go farther back. Commencing at that period, I have to ask myself these questions:—"Is it or is it not clearly proved that, in the autumn of 1849, these parties then were, on a just and reasonable view and estimate of their assets and liabilities, deeply insolvent? On the evidence, that question can only be answered in the affirmative. Again; did they at that time know the state of their affairs, and that they were insolvent? It may be a proper question to consider, what was their own estimate of the state of their assets? might they not have supposed the state of their assets more favourable than it really was? I cannot answer that question favourably to the petitioners—they knew no other word could represent their affairs than "insolvency." But they might say it was only a temporary insolvency, and that they might reasonably hope for improvement of the state of their assets, and for assistance from their friends, excusing, if not justifying, their continuing to transact business. However, from the statements in the books and other evidence, as rational men they could not, and, in point of fact, they did not, consider their situation as one of hope. This, then, was their situation in 1849; they continued, however, to carry on business, to issue notes, and to receive deposits from rich and poor, till 1851. Then it is to be asked, did their position in that interval improve? The answer upon the evidence is, it did not, and this includes in it the fact that they were during the whole of that time trading while deeply insolvent. Consistently, then, with that gentler estimate of their conduct which any man would wish to take, and attributing it to fear of exposure—to the dislike which most men have of looking at what is disagreeable—to the weakening nature of difficulties, these gentlemen went on; and it is not necessary to characterise their conduct by any harsh term, for who in a state of success and prosperity shall venture to say what would be his own conduct under similar circumstances? "Let him who standeth take heed lest he fall." Still, the interests of society at large preclude the exercise of any private feelings, and require that such conduct should be marked with reprehension, and we have no doubt that we are acting rightly in affirming the decision of the learned commissioner, of the correctness of whose judgment no doubt ought to be entertained. Let the appeal be dismissed, but the assignees and opposing creditors consenting, let the bankrupts have protection. My own impression is, that protection will be available for all purposes, although I no not bind myself to that expression of opinion.

The costs of the assignees were ordered to be paid out of the estate; and 50*l*. were also allowed out of the estate to the opposing creditors for their costs.

VICE-CHANCELLOR TURNER'S COURT.

Tuesday, Jan. 13.

JONES v. STARKEY.

Policy—Cargo—Equitable lien—Charge.

An account was opened with a bank on the agreement that the customer might overdraw to a stated amount, but that if he overdrew beyond he should find security. The account was overdrawn beyond the agreed amount, and the bank required security, whereupon the customer wrote a letter to the manager, stating that the arrival of a particular ship would put him in funds to enable him to adjust the account, and he inclosed a policy on the cargo of that ship for 5,000*l. indorsed payable to the manager in case of loss. The bank filed a bill for the purpose of having the bills of lading of this ship delivered up, and to have their lien or charge realised by a sale of the cargo. The defendants demurred to the bill for want of equity:*

Held, that there was not such a specific appropriation of the cargo as gave the bank a lien on it in preference to the other creditors of the customer, for that to create a lien on property there must be a clear agreement for the specific appropriation of it.

This was a bill filed by the registered public officer of the Liverpool Borough Bank against Messrs. James and John J. Starkey, trading at Liverpool under the firm of James Starkey and Co. and at San Francisco under the firm of Starkey, Brothers, and Co. the former being conducted by James Starkey and the latter by John J. Starkey, in California. James Starkey and Co. kept an account at the Liverpool Borough Bank, under an agreement that the firm should be allowed to overdraw to the extent of 3,300*l*. but should not overdraw beyond that amount without providing security for the amount beyond the 3,300*l*. In May 1851 the account of James Starkey and Co. was overdrawn 8,570*l*. beyond the 3,300*l*. or in all the overdrawn account was 11,870*l*. The only security the bank held was for about 3,500*l*. of the 8,570*l*. On the 23rd and 24th of May interviews took place between the manager of the bank and James Starkey, at which, the bill stated, "the manager urgently pressed on him the necessity of forthwith repaying some portion of the advances, and of reducing within further limits the account." On the last-mentioned day, James Starkey addressed a letter to the manager, in the following words:—

"Dear Sir,—With reference to our conversation this morning, we observe that the date of our order on Starkey, Brothers, and Co. for 3,000*l*. was 14th February, so that you ought to hear from them in a fortnight, and receive the amount within the current half-year. This order or credit was passed, in conformity with Starkey, Brothers, and Co.'s letter of the 1st September, authorising such, and of course we naturally went upon this as an accepted security, in the same degree as the previous transaction of 3,000*l*. with you. The arrival of our pearl-shell vessels, the Nereus and Hellespont, now both overdue, will enable us to reduce the account within its understood tother, which it now exceeds by about 1,000*l*. this article now paying a profit of between 400*l*. and 500*l*. per cent.; we shall have the bill of lading of 200 tons ditto, per Lalla, in time to make our balance creditable on 30th proximo; and finally, the arrival of the Tagus will put into our hands 8,000*l*. net, which will enable us to adjust the account, and what is more, to carry on with satisfaction to you and comfort to ourselves. The Tagus left Honolulu on the 14th January, to load shell and oil at Tahiti, which had been previously prepared, hence direct to Liverpool, so that the bill of lading will not anticipate the arrival of the vessel. We enclose your policy on her cargo, cost 5,000*l*. and we are about to cover 4,000*l*. more as profit."

The sum of 3,000*l*. mentioned in this letter was an extra credit on bills drawn by Jas. Starkey and Co. on Starkey, Brothers, and Co. which bills were then overdue. The policy of insurance referred to and inclosed in the same letter was endorsed, "In case of loss, pay to Wm. Cross, esq. Borough Bank, Liverpool, or order," and such endorsement was signed "James Starkey and Co."

The bill having stated the foregoing facts, alleged that the bills of lading of the Tagus had arrived, and were in the hands of the defendants, and that the ship was daily expected in port, and that a large balance was due from the defendants on their overdrawn account, for which the plaintiffs, according to the agreement, ought to have security; but they had none, excepting an equitable lien on the cargo of the Tagus, which they asserted they had, under the circumstances aforesaid; that the Bank had applied to James Starkey and Co. for the bills of lading, but the firm alleged that they could not part with the same, on the ground, as was the fact, that they were in insolvent circumstances, and could not defeat the rights of their other creditors, the bills of lading being assets applicable to the payment of the creditors. The bill prayed the delivery up of the bills of lading, and that the plaintiffs' lien or charge on the cargo might be realised by a sale of the cargo on the arrival of the ship in port. To this bill the defendants demurred for want of equity.

Bacon and Selwyn, in support of the demurrer.—The letter of the 24th of May, 1851, coupled with the indorsement on the policy, does not amount to such a lien or charge on the cargo as entitles the Bank of Liverpool to preference over the other creditors of the firm of James Starkey and Co. To constitute an equitable assignment, there must be an engagement to pay out of the particular fund or property, as was held in the case of Watson v. The Duke of Wellington, 1 Russ. & Myl. 602. All that the letter mentions is a florid idea of the value of the prospects of the firm, but as to an express appropriation of the profits of any part of the mercantile speculation there is none. It is well known to every banker and merchant that a transfer of a ship and cargo, or a ship or cargo, must be effected in a particular manner, where such a transfer is intended; and here, considering the facts as admitted, they shew that no such purpose was intended. All that fairly can be inferred from the letter is this—'If the voyage is prosperous, if the ship arrives safely, there will be ample funds to pay the amount overdrawn, and more to carry on our transactions in future with satisfaction to you and with comfort to ourselves; but if there should be a loss of the ship, the policy will be a security for 5,000*l*."

Eddis, for the plaintiff.—The true construction of the letter is that the writer engages to apply the proceeds of the cargo in the liquidation of the amount overdrawn. Had it not been so, there was no necessity for the great particularity in the description of several cargoes, nor in that especially on board the Tagus. Reason for the assignment of the policy there was none, because the ship was daily, if not hourly, expected in port. When the letter was written the bills of lading had not arrived, and the letter itself shews that the reason for no undertaking being given to assign the bills of lading was, that the cargo itself might arrive as soon as the bills of lading themselves. The learned counsel cited and commented on the cases of Nicholson v. Hooper, 4 Myl. and Cr. 180; and Ex parte Bedaile, 3 M. D. & De G. 109.

Bacon was not called on to reply.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I think the demurrer in this case must be allowed. There is, perhaps, no general rule applicable to the decision for the present case beyond this, that to constitute a lien there must be a clear agreement, and I think it extremely doubtful whether the letter of the 24th May, 1851, contained any agreement at all. It is clear we must bear in mind the original agreement between the parties, according to which the firm of James Starkey and Co. were bound to give security to the bank for the excess of what their account with the bank should be overdrawn beyond the 3,300*l*.; and we must also, it is clear, bear in mind what passed at the interview immediately preceding the letter of the 24th of May, and to which that letter referred. It does not appear, and there is no allegation, that the bank applied for any further or additional security; but the application made was for repayment, that the overdrawn balance might be reduced to the original limits of 3,300*l*. Then came the meeting of the 23rd May, at which, according to the plaintiff's own statement in his bill, "the said Wm. Cross, the manager of the said bank, urgently pressed upon the said James Starkey the necessity of forthwith repaying some portion of the said advances, and of reducing within proper limits the said banking account." There is no mention of any proposition for securing the amount overdrawn, or any portion of it. Then we come to the letter of the 24th May. Now, independently of the terms of the letter, it is strange that, if the intention of the writer had been to create a security, this letter should contain no expression of any such intention. It does refer to a deposit of the policy of assurance, but it does not refer to any deposit or proposed deposit of the bills of lading, nor to any mode of assignment of the ship or cargo; nor does it contain or refer to any agreement to give a security throughout, though there is an agreement to give a security in the meantime, namely, until the safe arrival of the vessel at the end of her voyage. But there is no proposition for delivery of the bills of lading when the vessel shall arrive, which we should naturally expect to find, if the cargo as well as the policy had been intended to be given as a security. The writer appears to me to enumerate in this letter the assets of the firm which might be expected to be applicable to the payment of their debt,—namely, in the first place, the Californian order of the amount of 3,000*l*.; then the cargoes of the Nereus and Hellespont, the Lalla, and finally of the Tagus. Then come the words in the letter—"The bill of lading will not anticipate the arrival of the vessel;" words, which were relied upon as being evidently an excuse for not sending the bill of lading, and implying, therefore, that the firm felt that they would have been bound to send the bill of lading if it had been in their power. I admit that the words are open to that construction; they might have been used in such a sense; but they are at any rate open to a double construction, and the whole letter may be very well taken to mean, "You are quite safe, for as the bills of lading will not anticipate the arrival of the vessel, we cannot transfer her cargo to any other party, and when she arrives, we shall be in ample funds to pay you; and to guard against any loss before she comes into port, we send you the policy of insurance on the cargo, endorsed to yourselves." No doubt it was intended to create a charge upon the policy for 5,000*l*. and no doubt that charge was created; but I do not think that leads to a necessary inference that the cargo was also intended to be specifically appropriated for the benefit of the bank. I will not say that whenever equivocal words are used, this Court will decide against your lien; but the leaning of this Court certainly is against creating partial liens in mercantile transactions on the strength of equivocal expressions.

VICE-CHANCELLOR PARKER'S COURT.

Reported by GEO. S. ALLNUTT, Esq. of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law.

Friday, Feb. 20.

THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY v. RUSHOUT.

Application to Parliament—Injunction—Pleading—Parties.

Where the directors of a railway company were irregularly entering into contracts with reference to a scheme for an extension line, the Court, at the instance of shareholders, granted an injunction to restrain the application of the company's funds to the payment of costs occasioned by the scheme, or in promoting the Bill in Parliament, and also to restrain the directors from entering to contracts in the name of the company, with reference to the said scheme, &c.; but the Court declined to restrain an application to Parliament to enable the company to make the extension line.

The Great Western Railway Company being empowered by the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Railway Company's Act to hold shares in the latter company, took the shares in the names of four persons as trustees, who became the registered owners thereof. The Great Western Company, on behalf of themselves, and other the shareholders of the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Company except the defendants, filed a bill against the directors of that company, the company itself, and the four trustees as defendants.

Held, that the suit was properly framed, although the Great Western Company were only equitable shareholders.

The bill in this case was filed by the Great Western Railway Company on behalf of themselves and all other shareholders in the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Company, except such of the defendants as were shareholders therein, against the directors of that company, the company itself, and the persons in whose names shares were standing as trustees thereof, for the Great Western Railway Company as defendants, and it prayed for the injunction now moved for. The motion was, that the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Railway Company, and the directors thereof, might be restrained from using or applying the name, seal, funds, and moneys of the company for or towards the payment of any costs, charges, or expenses of, or relating to, or in any manner occasioned by the scheme for the extension railway in the bill mentioned, or the soliciting or promotion thereof, or the bill as in the said bill mentioned, introduced or about to be introduced into Parliament, as in the said bill also mentioned, or in anywise connected therewith, or from or by reason of any other bill or scheme for the like purpose, and also from introducing or soliciting the said bill, or any other bill for the like purposes, or using the name or seal of the said company for the introducing or soliciting of such bill, and, in particular, from entering into any contracts, agreements, or engagements in the name or on the behalf of the said company, with reference to the said proposed undertaking, or any other scheme for the like purpose, or the promotion thereof, or with reference to the said bill or any other bill for the like purpose, or the soliciting or promotion of any such bill, and also from excluding Samuel Baker, Frederick Pratt Barlow, Thomas Bulkely, Richard Potter, Henry Simonds, and Thomas Williams, or any of them, or any other of the Great Western directors of the said Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Railway Company, from full and free access to, and inspection of, and obtaining full and complete information touching and concerning all agreements, contracts, reports, correspondence, proceedings, acts, matters, and things made, done, received, passed, entered into, or by any of the directors or officers, servants or agents of the said Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Railway Company, relating to or concerning, or in any manner touching or connected with the said proposed scheme or undertaking, or the solicitation or promotion of the said bill, or any matter antecedent or preliminary thereto respectively, or connected therewith respectively; and also from excluding the said persons before named, or any of them, or any other of the Great Western Directors of the said Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Railway Company from their full and free participation in and management of the affairs of the said Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Railway Company and from full and free access to all the books, and papers, and proceedings of the same company, and of the officers, servants, and agents thereof, and from receiving full information in all respects as to the resolutions, deliberations, and proceedings of all and every of the committees of the same board of directors appointed and to be appointed.

By a provisional agreement dated the 15th of August, 1844, and made between the directors of the Great Western Railway Company and the committee of management of the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Railway Company, the Great Western Railway Company agreed to render assistance to the project of the promoters of the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Railway Company upon certain conditions. That agreement was altered by another agreement, dated the 20th of September, 1844, the effect of which, as stated in the prospectus of the new company, was, that the Great Western Railway Company would, on certain conditions, guarantee 3½ per cent. per annum on the ... capital, with half the surplus profits to ... By the subscribers' agreement of the ... company, it was provided that the company might make further agreements with the Great Western Railway Company to carry the said two agreements into effect, with such modifications as might be advisable. On the 18th of February, 1845, the general half-yearly meeting of the Great Western shareholders authorised the directors to apply to Parliament for the construction of the new line of railway. In 1845 the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Company was incorporated by an Act whereby it was enacted that the capital of the company should be 1,500,000*l.* in 30,000 shares of 50*l.* each; and the company was authorised to borrow 500,000*l.* when the whole of its capital was subscribed for and one-half paid up. By sec. 11 of the Act, the Great Western Company were authorised to subscribe towards and become shareholders in the undertaking to any extent not exceeding 750,000*l.*: and by sec. 12, the Great Western Company were empowered, out of their corporate funds or annual revenue, to guarantee interest after a rate not exceeding 5*l.* per cent. on the shares they might subscribe for, as therein-mentioned, for such periods and upon such conditions as to the redemption of such shares as the holders for the time being of those shares, or the parties in whose hands they were placed as a security, might agree upon. By sec. 13, at all special or general meetings of the company, the Great Western Company might vote in respect of the shares held by them by any shareholder for that purpose deputed by them, except as to any question of the sale or lease of the railway to the Great Western Company, or as to the working or as to the working or using thereof by them. By sec. 15, the number of directors was to be fifteen, of whom six should be appointed by the Great Western Company, the rest by the new company. By sec. 16, the provisions of the Companies Clauses Act as to the election, removal, &c. of directors, were not to apply to the directors so appointed by the Great Western Company. By sec. 23, the directors were not to be reduced in number, except with the consent of the Great Western Company. After determining the line of the new railway, and providing that it should be on the broad gauge, and in certain parts on the narrow gauge also, the Act (sec. 91) made the Great Western Company and the new company liable to the Commissioners of the Navigation of the Severn to indemnify them against damage occasioned by loss of their tolls to a certain amount, and sec. 95 provided that the companies should be severally, as well as jointly, liable to the payment thereby imposed upon them both. The Act also (sec. 128) authorised the new company to lease their line to the Great Western Company, with the approbation of three-fifths of their shareholders, and (sec. 129) the sale of the line in like manner to the Great Western Company. By sec. 130, it was declared that all contracts made previously to the Act between the provisional committee of the new company and the directors of the Great Western Company, with the sanction of a general meeting, should be as valid and binding in every respect as if made subsequently to the Act, and in conformity with its provisions. Sec. 131 provided that if the new company failed to complete their railways within the time thereby limited, the Great Western Company might finish them, and, in certain events, might be required by the Board of Trade and compelled to do so. By sec. 152, in consideration of the probable advantages by the Act given to the Great Western Company, they were from the passing thereof subjected to the provisions of an Act to attach certain conditions to the construction of future railways, &c.

The Great Western Company took 3,600 shares in the new company, in the names of certain persons as registered holders thereof, upon trust for them, as declared by an indenture of the 23rd of March, 1848; and the Great Western Company paid 180,000*l.* in respect of such shares; and they also, under the before-mentioned Act, appointed six members of their own body directors of the new company. The Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Company appointed their chairman and three other persons a committee, to negotiate with the Great Western Company for a lease to the latter company of the line, and, requiring additional capital, they applied to the Great Western Company to enlarge their guarantee, which they agreed to do upon certain conditions. By two Acts passed respectively in 1846 and 1848, the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Company were authorised to raise 22,000*l.* and 750,000*l.* additional capital. By another Act, passed in 1848, certain alterations in the company's line, so as to effect a junction at a particular point with the London and North-Western Railway were authorised; and it was thereby enacted, that it should not be lawful for the said company out of any money by that or any other Act authorised to be raised for the purposes thereof, to pay or deposit any sum of money, which, by any Standing Order of either House of Parliament, then in force or thereafter to be in force, might be required to be deposited, in respect of any application to Parliament for the purpose of obtaining any Act, authorising the company to construct any other railway, or execute any other work or undertaking.

By an Amendment Act of 1850, additional facilities were given to the company for raising the capital authorised to be raised by the previous Acts, and the Shrewsbury and Birmingham Railway Company, the Shrewsbury and Chester Railway Company, and the South Staffordshire Railway Company were authorised to subscribe money to, and to hold shares in, the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Company, as therein mentioned, but it was provided that nothing in that Act contained should affect the rights, privileges, interests, or liabilities of the Great Western Railway Company under the previous Acts.

An agreement was afterwards entered into between the Great Western Company and the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Company, according to which, the latter company were to complete their undertaking between Wolvercot, near Oxford, and a junction with the London and North Western Railway, near Wolverhampton, with a double line of broad gauge, &c., and lease it when completed to the Great Western Railway Company, for 999 years, upon certain terms: and a deed of mutual covenants, embodying such agreements, was duly executed, under the common seals of both companies.

On the 15th of July, 1851, this agreement was adopted, at a meeting of the shareholders of the Great Western Company, but it was adopted by the shareholders in the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Company, subject to a condition that a provision should be added that the Great Western Company should purchase the undertaking on being requested to do so, by the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Company, at any time after four years from the date thereof, upon the terms, and in manner, therein mentioned.

At a meeting of the directors of the Great Western Company, on the 25th of September, 1851, it was resolved, that the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Company, should be informed that the terms of the condition annexed to the agreement were inadmissible, for certain reasons stated in the resolution.

At a meeting of the shareholders of the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Company, on the 28th of October, 1851, this resolution of the directors of the Great Western Company, and also a reply thereto by the directors of the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Company, were submitted for their consideration. The effect of this reply was that the agreement was rejected, and that three alternatives presented themselves: 1st. To make no present arrangement with any party, but to endeavour in the next session of Parliament to obtain an opportunity of meeting the Great Western Company on the merits of the whole case, before a parliamentary committee. 2nd. To enter into an immediate arrangement with the narrow gauge companies north of the Great Western line, if possible. 3. To apply to Parliament for powers to obtain independent outlets for their traffic by joining the Buckinghamshire Railway near Oxford, and the South Eastern and South-Western Railways. A committee was afterwards appointed to consider what measures should be taken for promoting the new company's interest. By the bill which was filed on the 9th of February, 1852, it was stated that the funds, by the various Acts of the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Company, authorised to be raised, were not more than sufficient to complete their undertaking; that a majority of the directors of the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Company, had lately determined to make a narrow gauge extension line from Wolvercot, three miles north of Oxford, to the line of the South-Western Railway, near Brentford, and to employ the name, seal, moneys, funds, and credit of their company, to obtain the necessary powers from Parliament. That on the 25th of November last, a notice was published for a bill to authorise the extension, which notice was signed by the solicitors of the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Company; that the proposed extension was illegal, and would be prejudicial to the interests of the company; and that the scheme for it was without the sanction of their shareholders; that other measures had been taken, and agreements entered into, with a view to the formation of the proposed line, by a majority of the directors of the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Company, and that they had been improperly expending the moneys and pledging the credit of the company for these purposes, and that they had employed the company's name and seal in promoting the Bill. That the subscription contract for the said extension was colourably got up upon the credit of the company; that the 1-11th part of the capital subscribed had been deposited, not out of the moneys of individual subscribers to the undertaking, but the whole, or a large part thereof out of the funds of the company; that in the early part of 1851 the majority of the board of directors appointed themselves a committee, to be called "the general purposes committee," to the exclusion of the Great Western directors, and delegated all their powers to, or that all such powers had been exercised by such committee, and that all the acts of such committee to which the directors named by the Great Western Company were not summoned, were illegal and void; that at a meeting of the entire board of directors of the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Company, on the 28th of Jan. 1852, minutes of the proceedings of the general purposes committee, on the 6th of Dec. last, were read, whereby it was resolved that Mr. Locke should be appointed engineer, to the said extension line, upon certain terms, and four persons named were appointed to be a deputation to canvass the landowners on the proposed line; and a minute of proceedings taken on the 23rd of Dec. 1851, whereby Mr. Fuller was appointed land surveyor, upon certain terms and minutes of the 24th of the same month of the appointment of Mr. Fowler engineer, and of a resolution that the secretary should be authorised to affix the corporate seal to petitions to Parliament, to subscription contracts, and all requisite documents for prosecuting the company's bills in the ensuing session. At the same meeting the directors appointed by the Great Western Railway Company proposed a resolution to the effect that the introduction of the bill being without the knowledge of the shareholders, and contrary to their interests, the name, seal, moneys, or credit of the company be not used, applied, or expended in any manner for the purpose of promoting the said bill, which resolution was negatived, and thereupon a protest of that date was signed by three of the said directors. The bill also stated that at the same meeting it was resolved that, inasmuch as the position of the company rendered it desirable that they should take steps which the Great Western Company might deem hostile, which steps it was desirable should not be made known for some time to the Great Western Company, and which could not be attained so long as the Great Western directors sat at and attended that board, authority should be granted to the general purposes committee to withhold their proceedings from confirmation until, in their estimation, the object desired rendered the withholding such minutes unnecessary; that this "resolution" be brought before every board meeting, and at such meeting the committee be requested to report their opinion of the propriety or impropriety of the confirmation of such minutes, and that the Great Western directors were purposely excluded from the said committee and kept ignorant of all its proceedings. The bill charged that the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Company would not institute proceedings in their corporate capacity for the redress of the aforesaid grievances; that the company had no power to raise capital except by the said Acts of Parliament, and that such capital was insufficient for its special purposes, and the contribution of any of their moneys towards the said extension line would be a misapplication thereof, and would make it impossible for the company to complete their authorised works.

Bethell and G. L. Russell, appeared in support of the motion for the injunction.

Malins, Follett, and Bovill, for the defendants.

Bethell, in reply, as to the form of the suit, and the injunction extending to the use of the name and seal of the company in the application to Parliament.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said, that the first question in this case was as to the form of the suit. The bill was filed by the Great Western Railway Company on behalf of themselves, and all other the shareholders in that company, seeking the relief prayed by the bill. It appeared by the bill and upon the affidavits, that the plaintiffs were not shareholders in their own name; but the bill stated, and it was proved by affidavit, that they had a large number of shares that were standing in the names of four persons, who were trustees for the company, and who were named as defendants on the present record, and in that state of matters it was contended that the company had no such interest as enabled them to maintain this suit on behalf of themselves and all other the shareholders. With reference to that question, his Honour thought that they had an interest to maintain this suit. There was a valid trust, beyond all doubt valid, on which these shares were held for the Great Western Railway Company—they were the only persons, who, under that trust, were interested in the shares. They had, therefore, an interest in what was sought by this bill to protect the property and concerns of this company. It was very true, that for many purposes the company were only bound to regard the legal title. One of the clauses of the Act was, that the company should not be bound to see to the execution of any trust, but they were not asked here to see to the execution of any trust, they were only asked to act on the title, which was a trust executed, and was an equitable title, and not a legal title, and enabling these parties to maintain this suit did not in any way change the jurisdiction on the subject matter, so that he must assume for this purpose that the legal shareholders themselves could maintain this bill. It was not like those cases in which the cestui que trust suing in this court, and making the trustee a defendant, asserted a right against another party which was a right to be asserted by the trustee in a court of law. The trustee, or cestui que trust could sue in this court, and therefore that objection could not apply; and when there was the additional fact that the trustee himself, the person who was legal owner of the shares, was a party to the suit, and bound by the proceedings, he did not see any objection to the frame of the suit. Moreover the Act of Parliament itself assumed that the Great Western Railway Company might have an equitable title in the shares where it provided in the 12th section that having taken these shares, they might guarantee interest on the money necessary to enable them to take the shares on such conditions as the holders for the time being of the shares, or the parties in whose hands they might be placed as security, might mutually agree upon. It appeared that these shares were, in fact, placed in the hands of the trustees, subject to a certain guarantee, and pursuant to that clause, so that the Great Western Railway Company was here precisely in the position that the Act of Parliament regulating the company, which was now before the Court, contemplated, namely, having an equitable title in these shares subject to certain guarantees by other persons who were the owners of the shares, and for these reasons, his Honour thought the suit was properly constituted as to the frame of it. The next question was as to the substance of this application. The object of the application to Parliament, which was the subject of this suit, was to vary the object and scheme of this railway company, and to apply to Parliament for an Act for that purpose. The objects of the Act of Parliament applied for were fully stated in the advertisement contained in the Gazette, which appeared on the 11th of November, and on some subsequent occasions. Now, in his Honour's opinion, having regard to the case that had been referred to, the object of the application to Parliament, as appearing by those notices, was a lawful object, if lawfully pursued. Parliament created this company, and having created this company, and limited it, he thought the power must rest with Parliament to vary the constitution of the company, to control it, to annihilate it, or deal with it as the wisdom of Parliament should think fit. Any argument addressed to the application to Parliament for varying the original object, as being a thing beyond the scope of the Act, should be addressed to Parliament, and not to this Court. He therefore thought, as he had before said, that there was nothing illegal in the object of this application to Parliament, assuming it to be legally pursued by the company. Now, the notice appeared in the Gazette on the 11th of November, and there was a resolution of the general purposes committee on the same 11th of November, directing the solicitor to take measures to lay before Parliament a Bill which was brought before the whole board, and was known to the board of directors on the 19th of November, 1851. It did not appear that that advertisement, or that which was done, was in the least degree necessarily calculated to apprise the parties who represented the Great Western Railway Company of any intention to appropriate the funds of the company improperly in the application to Parliament. He thought, as it had been contended, that they might fairly suppose that the subscribers' contract and the deposits were made, not out of the funds and moneys of this company, but by the moneys of persons who came forward independently; that it was quite competent for those parties, for anything that appeared in this resolution, to come forward with their own moneys, and pledge their own credit, and find the means for going on with this application to Parliament. It did not, therefore, appear to him on the point of acquiescence, that it was at all necessarily known to the parties at that time that there was any intention of improperly dealing with the funds of the company. That brought it down to the 19th of November. Then there were resolutions of the general purposes committee of the 16th, the 23rd, and 24th of December, and on subsequent occasions, from which it appeared that they had [illegible] onerous contracts on the part of the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton, Railway Company, not only for spending money, but binding themselves to pay salaries and incurring other expenses on account of the company at the time he had mentioned. All this was not alleged to be known to the Great Western Railway Company directors, who were directors of the company, until the 28th of January. Now it was clearly not in dispute in the affidavit that the company meant to make use of the funds, and to pledge the credit and enter into contracts on behalf of the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Railway Company for the purpose of promoting this undertaking. It was said that it was to be a temporary use only, but it was nowhere alleged that the expenses, which might be very great, for promoting it in Parliament and other things of that kind, were not meant to be defrayed out of the funds of the company. Now upon all the authorities referred to that was an unlawful application of the funds, an application which this Court would not permit, and he did not see any difference between applying the funds of the company and entering into contracts in the name of the company for this purpose. Upon the authorities that had been referred to there could be no doubt that was a course of things that this Court would interfere to restrain, and his Honour had no doubt, therefore, as far as the injunction was sought as to that, that the injunction ought to be granted. The next question was as to the exclusion of the Great Western Railway Company's directors from the meetings of the board, and the concealment from them of what had been going on. It was said at the bar that that course of proceeding was strictly within the letter of the law. He certainly was surprised to hear that stated, because upon every principle, not only governing bodies of this kind, but private partnerships, where there was a body of persons where the majority was to bind the minority, it was essential to the validity of all their acts that the voice of the minority should be heard; that the minority should have an opportunity of stating their view, and it was not until they had had that opportunity that the acts of the majority became binding on the minority—and he thought Lord Cottenham's opinion might be referred to as shewing that even if the minority had a voice given to them, if there had been a combination among the majority before that voice was received to overbear it, he should consider the acts of such a body illegal, and upon the principles of this Court his Honour thought that would be so. Now, it appeared to him—without stopping to consider how it was in the affidavits before that time, that the resolution of the 28th of January, and what followed it on the 4th of February, appointing a committee for the purpose of carrying into effect the resolution—it appeared to him that course of proceeding was one that the Court had not any difficulty in restraining. Then it was argued that that was a part of the internal regulations of the company which ought not to form the subject of the interference of this Court, but ought to be allowed to be dealt with by the company itself. Now, how could the company deal with it? By a meeting being called of the directors. Of course they would not be parties who would be likely to call a meeting. It would be a long time before the shareholders could call a meeting. It was probable that that meeting might not support the directors in the course they thought fit to pursue, and then they must go for a mandamus, and all this to obtain an object which it was absolutely necessary should be done at once. There could be no doubt whatever that the aid of this Court was properly called in to prevent such a course of proceeding as that. That disposed of all the objects of the notice of motion except one, which was to restrain the defendants "from introducing or soliciting the said Bill or any other Bill for the like purposes, or using the name or seal of the company for the introduction or soliciting of such Bill, and in particular from entering into any contracts, agreements, or engagements in the name or on the behalf of the company in the introduction or soliciting the Bill." That was the point in this case on which his Honour had the most difficulty. He felt the force of Mr. Bethell's argument, which was, that the introduction of this bill could not be considered as having been done on behalf of the company by the body who were intrusted by the company with the care of the common seal for that purpose; it was done by a section of that body, acting, as it appeared to him, on many occasions, illegally, and excluding the voice of the minority. It was that portion of the case that had created much difficulty in his mind how to deal with it; but the order that he should make with respect to the other parts of this application, in the first place, would be to prevent the use of the company's funds or pledging their credit in any way for the purpose of promoting their Bill in Parliament. It would also insure to the Great Western Railway Directors and the whole body of shareholders who had an interest in having the whole board present, that the Great Western directors should have a voice in all the subsequent proceedings relating to the conduct of this Bill in Parliament; and considering that the proceedings of Parliament were now inchoate only, there would be ample opportunity hereafter, pending the Bill in Parliament, for the Great Western directors, having all their powers restored to them, and having full access to the meetings of the board, to discuss and debate what ought to be done in Parliament. He could not interfere to restrain the defendants to the extent to which the notice of motion went to restrain them from soliciting this Bill in Parliament, or any other Bill for the like purpose.

SITTINGS AFTER TRINITY TERM.

Friday, June 18.

MARSHALL v. NICHOLS.

Under the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 79 (a Fishery Convention Act between England and France), a party who has sustained damage from breach of any of the regulations made by the Act, must pursue his remedy for damages before a magistrate or justice of the peace, as directed by sec. 11 and art. 69 of the Act, and cannot maintain an action for such damages.

Case, for negligence.—The count of the declaration now in question was framed upon the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 79, and alleged that the plaintiff was engaged in drift-net fishing off the coast of Yorkshire, as the defendant well knew, and that it was the defendant's duty to abstain from trawl fishing within three miles from where the plaintiff was so fishing. A breach of this duty was alleged whereby the plaintiff's nets were injured.

Plea to this count.—That at the time when, &c. it was between sunset and sunrise, and that there were not two lights hoisted on the masts of the plaintiff's boat one over the other, 3 feet apart.

Demurrer to this plea.

The 6 & 7 Vict. c. 79 is an Act to carry into effect a convention between her Majesty and the King of the French, concerning the fisheries in the seas between the British Islands and France.

Art. 24 provides,—Trawl fishing is forbidden in all places where there are boats engaged in herring or mackerel drift-net fishing.

Art. 25. Trawl boats shall always keep at a distance of at least three miles from all boats fishing for herrings or mackerel with drift-nets.

Art. 26. Whenever herring or mackerel boats shall commence drift-net fishing in any place whatever, the trawl boats which may be already fishing in such place shall depart therefrom, and shall keep at a distance of at least three miles from the said drift-net herring or mackerel boats.

Art. 69. All transgressions of these regulations established for the protection of fisheries in the seas lying between the coasts of the British islands and those of France, shall in both countries be submitted to the exclusive jurisdiction of the tribunal, or the magistrates, which shall be designated by law. This tribunal or these magistrates shall also settle all differences and decide all contentions, whether arising between fishermen of the same country or between fishermen of the two countries, and which cannot have been settled by the commanders of cruisers, or by the consular agents and the collectors of customs or commissaries of marine, according to the country. The above-mentioned jurisdiction shall not, however, be understood to apply to murder, felony, or any other grave crime, all such crimes remaining subject to the ordinary laws of each country respectively.

Art. 70. The trial and judgment of the transgressions mentioned in the preceding article shall always take place in a summary manner, and at as little expense as possible.

Art. 71. In both countries the competent tribunal or magistrates shall be empowered to adjudge the following penalties for offences against the regulations committed by fishermen subject to their jurisdiction:—1st. Forfeiture and destruction of nets or other fishing implements which are not conformable to the regulations. 2dly. Fines from 8s. (10 francs) to 10*l*. sterling (250 francs); or imprisonment for not less than two days and not more than one month.

Art. 75. The competent tribunal or magistrates shall, when the circumstances are such as to call for it, award, over and above all penalties inflicted for offences against the regulations, the payment of damages to the injured parties, and shall determine the amount of such damages.

Sec. 11 enacts, That all offences against the said articles, &c. committed by any of her Majesty's subjects, may be heard and determined by any magistrate or justice of the peace having jurisdiction in the county in which, or in the waters adjacent to which, the offence shall be committed, or to which the offender shall be brought, &c.

Sec. 14. It shall be lawful for the magistrate or justice before whom the offence shall be inquired into, to take evidence of loss or damage, and award compensation to the injured party, and to enforce payment thereof.

S. Temple, in support of the demurrer to the plea, contended that the matters set up by way of defence to the plea, could not be considered as a condition precedent to the plaintiff's right of recovering damages resulting from the defendant's violation of Arts. 24, 25, 26.

Archibald, contrà.—This is not the proper tribunal for the recovery of these damages. The cause of action is founded upon the breach of the articles of convention in this Act, and a special tribunal has been created for the hearing and adjudicating upon offences against the articles, viz. a tribunal of magistrates. (Art. 69 and sec. 11.) The trial and judgment is to take place in a summary manner, and at as little expense as possible. (Art. 70.) The magistrates have power to award compensation to the injured party for damage done by breach of the articles. (Art. 75 and sec. 14.) So that a full and sufficient remedy is provided by the Act for the hearing and adjudicating upon offences against it, and the plaintiff should have pursued that remedy which supersedes the Common Law remedy. (Stevens v. Jeacocke, 11 Q. B. 731; Crisp v. Bunbury, 8 Bing. 394; and Timms v. Williams, 3 Q. B. 413.) [It is unnecessary to notice the other points, as the case was decided upon the above objection.]

S. Temple, in reply.—This is an action for consequential damage occasioned by a Common Law injury, and therefore the Common Law remedy is not taken away by the statutory one. (The Mayor of Lichfield v. Simpson, 8 Q.B. 65.) So also upon the Loan Societies Act, 5 & 6 Wm. 4, c. 23, where a summary jurisdiction was given to magistrates by a very similar provision to this, it was held that the statutory remedy was cumulative only, and did not take the Common Law remedy by action. (Albon v. Pyke, 5 Sc. N. R. 241; 4 M. & G. 421, S.C.)

Lord CAMPBELL, C.J.—I am clearly of opinion that this objection is fatal, and that no action can be maintained in any of the Courts on such a cause of action. This is an action for the violation of the 25th article of the treaty whereby, &c. [His lordship then read the article.] The declaration is framed upon it, and alleges that it was the duty of the defendant not to come within three miles, and the gravamen is in disobeying that article. Then what do we find in article 69? [His Lordship then read that article, and also article 75.] And when we turn back to secs. 11 and 14 of the Act, irrespective of the articles of the treaty, there is a specific tribunal pointed out for the trial of offences against the articles. It seems to me as clear as any point can be, that an action cannot be brought for such a cause of action, and that there is no remedy, except before the specific tribunal created by the Act of Parliament. It is unnecessary to consider the cases cited, as it is clear that where a new duty or a new offence is created, and a statutory remedy is given, that remedy must be exclusively pursued. Here we have a positive enactment in Art. 69 of the treaty, that all transgressions of these regulations shall be submitted to the exclusive jurisdiction of the tribunal or the magistrates designated by law. It would be a clear violation of the convention to bring an action against a French subject in the Superior Courts here for a transgression of these articles; and it is equally a violation of this Act of Parliament to bring an action in the Superior Courts against an English subject for a similar cause of action.

COLERIDGE, J.—This statute creates an entirely new right and a new duty, and also gives a remedy for the breach thereof; and the question is, whether for an infraction of that right, and a breach of that duty, an action can be maintained in the Superior Courts. We need not speculate upon the subject, for Art. 69 expressly provides that all transgressions of these regulations shall be submitted to the exclusive jurisdiction of the tribunal designated by law; and by sec. 11 a tribunal is created with exclusive jurisdiction. It is declared (Art. 69) that this tribunal shall decide all differences, &c.; and to shew that it does not confine its jurisdiction to some offences only against the articles, it expressly excepts murder, felony, and other grave crimes, and leaves them to the ordinary laws of each country.

ERLE, J.—Unless there is a statutable one, the declaration sets out no ground of complaint. It alleges that the damage was caused by the defendant's not keeping at the distance of three miles from where the plaintiff was fishing, and that two of the plaintiff's nets were broken. Then the statute, for the infraction of these regulations, and giving compensation to the injured party, creates a new tribunal with summary jurisdiction. Upon this statute, and upon general rules of law, I think it perfectly clear that the plaintiff cannot sue upon this cause of action in the Superior Courts, but must pursue the remedy given by the Act. Judgment for the defendant.

HILL v. PHILP.

Lunatic—Removal of papers—Trover.

The wife of a lunatic ordered the medical gentleman having the care of the lunatic to take from him certain letters and papers, which was done accordingly:

Held, that the medical gentleman was not liable in an action of trover brought against him subsequently by the lunatic. Martin, B. dissentiente.

This was an action tried before the Lord Chief Baron, and a rule for a new trial having been obtained on the ground of misdirection, and upon the evidence of a conversion on the count in trover,

Sir F. Thesiger (Att.-Gen.) and Bovill appeared to shew cause, but James, Q.C. J. A. Russell, and Chandler, were called upon to support the rule.

The arguments and facts sufficiently appear in the following judgment. Cur. adv. vult.

JUDGMENT.

Wednesday, May 26.—PLATT, B.—In the case of Hill v. Philp, which was argued yesterday, two points were raised: the first was, with reference to the direction of the learned judge with regard to the treatment which had been received by the plaintiff. The other point raised was with reference to the question of a conversion or no conversion on the count in trover. Since the argument, I have read the whole of the summing up taken by the short-hand writer from beginning to end, and certainly my reading of that satisfies me that the jury could not have been misled, as has been suggested, because it is plain that though some expressions in the course of the summing up, might, if taken alone, have that effect, yet when you couple the whole context, each part of the context together, it is quite impossible that the jury, a special jury, could have been mistaken in the view the Lord Chief Baron took at the trial, who, at the very outset, took great pains to shew this, that there was not any objection to the rule by which the jury were to be guided. Now this is a part in particular, as it seems to me, that points out to the jury what their duty was. "I do not want to do more than again state to you that if Dr. Philp obeyed the directions of Mrs. Hill, the wife, who had placed him there, to whom he was responsible, she was the person who put him there, he was responsible to her, and he was quite correct. Taking that alone as against the defendant, he was under the direction and opinion merely of the wife; but if taken together, the statements have a totally different meaning. He was quite correct when he states some other person came and proposed to take him away. I have no objection to his going, but cannot let him go without the permission of Mrs. Hill. All that is right. I go further; if Mrs. Hill thought, and in consequence Dr. Philp also thought, that communication with other persons in the course of writing this correspondence with Col. Thompson, or with the Secretary of State or other persons on such matters, was calculated to keep up the irritation, Dr. Philp was perfectly right in obeying her instructions, and acting according to that course of conduct; if she and he thought, the one with reference to the knowledge of his person and history, and the other as to his medical skill, if they thought that that was the fittest course to adopt, it was right that that should be adopted. Can any one say that the skill required from the defendant was improperly administered? It is perfectly plain it was not. Now, with regard to the other question as to the conversion, I own I cannot see what is the conversion, because though true it is there is a scene enacted between him and this unfortunate medical gentleman at the establishment when he comes and demands the papers of Mr. Hill, yet, from the evidence of the person who was called in for the purpose of speaking to that circumstance, I cannot see anything like a trespass, or an asportation, or carrying off (which would be a conversion), or an assumption of dominion over the property that was placed in the care of Dr. Philp. But when a man is insane, this will happen. How can you say that is a conversion which is an act adopted merely for the purpose of protecting his property, over which he has not a complete control. It seems to me that the man, and handing it over to Mrs. Hill (the wife), that, of itself, is not a conversion. Then, is there any other evidence of it? Why, there is no doubt if Dr. Philp had kept these papers, thus sealed up, until the man under his care had arrived at that point when he might be said to be sane, and on demanding his papers Dr. Philp had refused to give them up, that would be clear evidence of a conversion, because he would have been a man capable of exercising his understanding, and ought to be attended to in any demand he made. But that is not so here; there has been no such demand made, though it was certainly stated to be so from what fell from the learned counsel yesterday in commenting upon the correspondence. It seems a very unusual proceeding for a learned counsel in so important a matter to make a mistake in that on which the whole question turns,—whether or not there was evidence of a conversion. It is plain that no such demand was made for the delivery up of the papers by Dr. Philp to the plaintiff, and therefore the issue upon that is not supported. I think, therefore, this rule ought to be discharged.

MARTIN, B.—Two points were raised in this case; one with respect to the misdirection on the first count, and the other with respect to the question arising on the count in trover. With respect to the supposed misdirection, the first question is, upon what, in his summing up, the Lord Chief Baron told the jury, that if they believed Dr. Philp acted on the instructions given by the plaintiff's wife he was justified in his conduct. If such had been the direction, I should certainly have been of opinion that he was wrong. But when the summing-up comes to be read and considered, it appears to be perfectly clear the summing up was, if he exercised his skill bonâ fide, acting on the information given to him by a person whom he had every reason to believe was acquainted with the circumstances in which the man was, he was right. I apprehend that was most clearly a right direction, and without such a direction no medical man would be safe in approaching a patient or doing anything with him. Every medical man must, to some extent, act upon the information he receives. He is bound to take care that the information comes from a quarter that he has reasonable ground to suppose is a reliable one, and he ought not, otherwise, to act on the information. No man would be safe in approaching a patient at all unless he had that correct information. In this particular case, it seems to me in the course of the argument, that the main question was a mere question of degree. The man having been confined to his bed, the surgeon having given permission to his brother on the previous day, and he being told the following day that it had produced evil consequences, though he might possibly be wrong in the abstract sense, how, possibly, could a man be liable for having treated that person with unfair harshness? This is a matter of a different kind, but the same in degree, because this lady founded her information on some letters she received from him, and she observing that in the course of that correspondence the man's mind became more affected in consequence of her husband having an opportunity of mixing with others. I own, the direction was perfectly right and any other direction would have been an erroneous one. With respect to the other point, I am sorry to say I do not concur with the rest of the Court. I am of opinion that there was a conversion, and that the plaintiff ought to have the verdict entered for him, with 1s. damages in this case. The facts of the case were these,—this man was in possession of a number of papers which he had kept by him; the wife wrote a letter to the defendant, desiring him to take those papers from him; and accordingly, on the occasion of his leaving the asylum, some person acting under the direction of Dr. Philp insisted on the papers being given up; upon his refusing to give them up—I believe he stated he would not give them up—a keeper was sent for and the papers were taken from him, or he delivered them up protesting at the same time against it; and they were given up to the person whom Dr. Philp directed to receive them. Ultimately they were received by him, but they were sent to the plaintiff's wife some time after. This is an action of trover; the pleas are, as I understand, not possessed, not guilty, and leave and license. I do not know whether any plea could be pleaded for protecting this Act and rendering such a conversion necessary. Perhaps not: at all events, I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to recover in respect of it. No doubt they were taken from him against his will. I think he had will enough for the purpose of preventing his property being taken from him. If he has not will to prevent it I do not see any wrong is committed on an unfortunate lunatic when anything is done to him which he has not the will to assent to or dissent from. The property is taken from him against his will and afterwards given to a person who is (in my opinion) in law a stranger to all intents and purposes. Now what is a conversion? A conversion is the removal of a chattel without any authority of the owner or by any authority else; and it is stated again and again the asportation for the use of a third person of a chattel amounts to a conversion, for the reason that it is an act inconsistent with the general rights of dominion by the owner over the chattel, so that the person who has the right has not the power to use it as he pleases. I own that I am of opinion the jury ought to have been directed to find the verdict for the plaintiff with damages merely nominal, because these were nothing more than certain documents to which no value was attached in the course of the case. I am of opinion the rule should be discharged, the defendant consenting to the verdict being entered for the plaintiff on the count in trover. Such is my opinion, and the defendant is entitled to the judgment of the Court.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I concur with the rest of the Court. I state my opinion now, because my brother Alderson was not here during the whole of the argument. I concur with respect to what has been said on the subject of the direction. In truth, the application to the Court for a new trial was founded on a misapprehension. It was supposed that the first letter would be put in evidence, and if put in the objection might have been correct. The objection resolves itself into this, that the use that was made of the letters was wrong, thou h the letters were by consent received in evidence. n point of fact, the use that was made of the letters was this, they were considered by me as information coming from a person likely to give unprejudiced, probably affectionate, certainly correct and honest information as to the past history and the present condition of the man as far as the wife could form any opinion; and the direction to the jury was, that whatever was suggested by the wife he coincided in, exercising his own judgment as a medical man. The distinction was particularly noticed to the jury in the early part of my summing up—that what she stated as a fact, if the medical man believed it to be true, and in exercising his medical skill upon the facts so communicated to him, he thought that the suggestion as to the particular line of treatment was a proper one. Exercising his skill in that way upon the information of the wife, he was not responsible for the consequences. With respect to the count in trover, it certainly is remarkable that it was not opened to the jury. In the reply, not one syllable was said about it. There was no evidence at all at any time; none was suggested; nor were the jury even asked to give any opinion upon it. If, therefore, we were under the necessity of entering a verdict for the plaintiff, own I do not see why my brother Martin should take away 11½d. of the defendant's money. I think, if the verdict were found at all for the plaintiff, it should be with damages one farthing; for there was no suggestion given in his evidence, nor by the counsel in the opening, or the reply, that these papers were worth a single solitary farthing, which must be given, if the verdict is to pass for the plaintiff. But I entirely agree with my brother Platt, and I think if we were to allow a verdict to be taken for the plaintiff under these circumstances, we should introduce a new head of conversion, and create an extreme difficulty in the mode of dealing with the property of insane persons, and treating them in respect of the personal property that they might have along with them when they were in a lunatic asylum. I can take no distinction, as a matter of law, between these supposed papers of possible value and a few shirts, and a few pairs of stockings; and I must say, if one's attention is transferred, for a moment, from the papers to the contents of the portmanteau, and to the time the insane person is merely removed from one custody to another, when the attendant who came to him said, "I cannot allow you to carry away with you your linen in the state in which it is at present; it must be taken from you and washed before it is sent away. I cannot allow you to go without first changing the linen you have upon you, and your putting on fresh clothes;"—and if he were then sent away, and the clothes so taken from him were washed and subsequently delivered to the wife, it would have been just as much a conversion of the shirts and pairs of stockings as of these papers. The facts were, it was considered advisable when he was removed that he should not take those papers, the possible brooding over which had contributed very much to continue the visitation, and the insanity for which he was placed there to be removed and to be cured, and for which he was to be removed to another place for the purpose of perfecting the cure. I think, under those circumstances, the conduct of the medical officer of the establishment, who went to him and insisted on taking those papers from him, was perfectly justified. It appears that before he gave them up he sealed them up in a parcel; subsequently that parcel was delivered to his wife. Now I am quite ready to adopt the distinction in respect of trover being an action that may be maintained where any one has taken property in favour of himself or a third person. The wife, in my judgment, is not a third person. The wife was the individual who had placed him there. The law requires that if a person be insane he shall be sent to a lunatic asylum by the direction of some particular individual. I apprehend that the individual who interferes and gives that direction, under the authority of the Act of Parliament, to a medical man to certify, does stand in the situation, ex necessitate, of a sort of guardian, a sort of committee, at the period before any inquisition has been taken, so as to ascertain whether he is a fit person to have the appointment regularly of a committee of the estate. The wife, in this instance, having called in a medical man (as the Act of Parliament requires that somebody should be the individual who places the lunatic there), in my judgment, the wife, the person who placed him there, would have the same protection. But here it was the wife: she interferes as his wife; she sends him here, and I think that she was quoad hoc the guardian of his person and his property, and what was done under her direction, he being mad, and having no power or will of his own, was perfectly right and proper, and, as one of my brothers has suggested, when the property was taken it was not so much taken from him as for him, in order that it might be protected and delivered into the custody of one who, it was supposed, had a legitimate right to it,—it was delivered to his wife. I am of opinion that there is no conversion. It was not taken by Dr. Philp for his own purpose: it was not taken for the use of any third person, for I think the wife is not a third person; and I think a guardian quoad hoc cannot be considered a third person for this purpose. It seems to me, therefore, that there was no occasion for any justification, and there was no justification in this case, for there was no conversion at all. It was merely taking care of the property because it was right to take care of it; sealing it up and taking care of it, and ultimately delivering it to the person who most likely would be entitled to retain it. Upon these grounds, it appears to me that there was no conversion, and that the rule ought to be discharged.

ALDERSON, B.—I did not hear the argument, but I heard the report read. I quit of the Court in thinking that there is no doubt whatever the proper direction was given, and that it was properly put that the letters were simply an assistance to Dr. Philp in order to guide his medical judgment. If the unfortunate patient had been in a state of collapse altogether it would be necessary for some one to examine the circumstances and symptoms of the case in order that the doctor might act upon it; like a mad person, a person incapable of explaining the symptoms of his own disease where the ordinary nature of the disease shews that he cannot explain the symptoms of it. The taking the property of a madman from his possession is not of itself a conversion of the property. If it were so, the consequences would be enormous and fatal. Suppose a person holds in his possession the title-deeds of a large estate and is about to destroy them, does any person say that a person taking from a madman the power of destroying the interests of his family and of those who came after him, that that would be a conversion of the title-deeds? If so, you might say if a man was about to cut his own throat with a razor the taking of the razor out of his hands would be a conversion of the razor. Then, would the delivery of these papers to the wife for him make it a conversion? I confess that I think it does not. Rule discharged.

BLUCK v. GOMPERTZ.

Guarantee—Statute of Frauds.

A guarantee was given in the following form: "Upon your handing me your two drafts on A. B. for 200l. and 146l. respectively at six months from this date, I undertake to get them accepted, and see that they are duly paid." Signed C. D. the defendant, directed to E. F. the plaintiff; this was subsequently altered by a memorandum written across it by the defendant, but signed by the plaintiff alone to this effect:—"I have received the two drafts, one being for 150l. instead of 146l. there being an error in the invoice:"

Held, sufficient to satisfy the Statute of Frauds, and that the defendant was liable as a surety for the 150l. bill, although he had not signed the second memorandum, it being in his handwriting.

This action was tried before Pollock, C.B. at the sittings in Middlesex in Michaelmas Term last, when the learned judge having left it to the jury that there was evidence of the contract declared upon, a verdict was returned for the plaintiff. Subsequently

Knowles, Q.C. obtained a rule for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection, against which

Thursday, April 15.—Welsby (Pierce with him) shewed cause. Cur. adv. vult.

JUDGMENT.

POLLOCK, C.B.—In this case the declaration stated that Morgan John O'Connell agreed with the plaintiff to buy certain wines, part for 200l. and part for 150l. and thereupon, in consideration that the plaintiff would, at his own expense, procure stamps for and draw two bills, one for 200l. and the other for 150l. at six months, and deliver them to the defendant, he, the defendant, would get them accepted, and see them paid when due; and the breach was that the defendant did not see them paid. It appeared that Mr. Morgan John O'Connell did purchase two parcels of wine, one for 200*l.* and the other, as it was at first supposed, of the value of 116*l.* and a guarantee was given in this form:—"Kensington, March 19, 1851. Dear Sir,—Upon your handing me your two drafts on Morgan John O'Connell, esq. M.P. respectively for 200*l.* and 146*l.* at six months from this date, I undertake to get them accepted, and see that they are duly paid. I remain, dear sir, yours truly, H. G. Gompertz" (the defendant). Directed to J. Bluck, esq. (the plaintiff). As no bills existed at the time the memorandum was signed, and the plaintiff was to draw them, and they could only be drawn upon stamps so as to be valid, it followed that the plaintiff was to procure the stamps at his own expense. It was discovered afterwards by the plaintiff that the true price of the second parcel was not 116*l.* but 150*l.* Bills were drawn payable at the time, as agreed, for 200*l.* and 150*l.* and the defendant got them accepted and gave them to the plaintiff, and the defendant then wrote across the face of the guarantee in his own hand as follows:—"I have received the two drafts, one being for 150*l.* instead of 146*l.* there being an error in the invoice of 4*l.* both accepted by Mr. O'Connell," and the plaintiff signed this memorandum, but not the defendant. On the memoranda, consisting of these two writings, being produced at the trial, Mr. Knowles objected that it was not a memorandum signed by the defendant of the contract declared upon. The original memorandum signed by the defendant was of an executory contract, to be performed after the date of the transaction in consideration that the plaintiff would draw two bills, one for 200*l.* and the other for 146*l.* and hand them to the defendant, he (the defendant) would get the bills accepted, and see them paid; and that contract was never performed by the plaintiff, for one for 150*l.* was drawn, and not 146*l.* So far, no doubt, it is clear. But for the plaintiff it was contended that the memorandum written on the face of the original guarantee explained that this was a mistake, that the true contract was for a bill of 150*l.* The memorandum, therefore, merely corrected a mistake, and being written on the same piece of paper, and on the face of the guarantee to be signed by the defendant, his original signature was a signature, though only to satisfy the enactment of the Statute of Frauds. If the defendant, by any memorandum signed by him, had stated that the original contract was, that if the plaintiff would procure stamps, and draw two bills, of 200*l.* and 150*l.* the defendant would see them paid; but that the latter amount had been by mistake described for 146*l.* it would have been sufficient, for the Statute of Frauds does not require the contract itself to be in writing, but any memorandum of it, and a memorandum properly signed that there be such contract is quite sufficient. And we also think that words introduced into a paper signed by the party may be considered as authenticated by a signature on the paper, if it is plain that they were meant to be so authenticated. The act of signing after the introduction of the words is not absolutely necessary. The difficulty in the case is, that the words, though written by the defendant across the original guarantee, are not written as his words, but they are written as the words of the plaintiff, and the effect of the instrument altogether is this, the original guarantee remains unaltered, with the substitution of the defendant. The plaintiff states that he has drawn instead of one of the bills—that for 146*l.*—a bill for 150*l.* assigning a mistake in the invoice; and the reason for that is, that he has received it back from the defendant, accepted as part performance of his original contract, and so discharges the defendant in that respect. It may, however, be inferred, from the fact of the defendant himself writing the memorandum across for the plaintiff to sign, not only that he agreed that the bill for 150*l.* previously substituted instead of the one for 146*l.* of the plaintiff should stand in the place of that for 146*l.* and implicitly that the defendant should be responsible for it; but also that he admitted that the original contract was, that he should procure to be accepted and see paid any bills for the amount of the invoice of the second parcel of wine, and that the invoice was 150*l.* so that this would be proved, as the contract alleged in the declaration. If so, it may be inferred from the fact of the second memorandum being written on the same paper by the defendant, it was meant to be authenticated by the signature so as to constitute a memorandum in writing signed by the defendant. If so, the Statute of Frauds has been complied with; and although we do not come to this conclusion without some difficulty, a doubt still remaining on the minds of some of the members of the Court, we think this is the true view of the case, and that the rule should be discharged.

PLATT, B.—I certainly had very great difficulty in bringing my mind to this conclusion. I am now satisfied, beyond all question, this is the contract signed; in fact, it is under the signature of the party. Suppose, after this instrument was drawn, the defendant had, in his own hand, altered the 146*l.* to 150*l.* in the account, there would be no doubt that would be sufficient without resigning the contract. Then the effect of the contract it seems is this: it is just the same as if the defendant had written upon the face of it, "One of the two bills has been drawn for 150*l.* instead of 146*l.*;" and then for the plaintiff to have written on that, "I accede to that." I being in the hand-writing of the defendant, it seems to me, viewing it in that light, there is quite sufficient, upon the face of the original agreement, to justify us in holding this is a signature in compliance with the Statute of Frauds.

POLLOCK, C. B.—The two points on which it appeared to me, I own, at the trial, free from any considerable doubt, after the points taken by Mr. Knowles in the able manner in which he presented them, are these: a paper writing set out by a party signed by himself may well be taken as authenticated in all its parts by a signature, although he does not go through the ceremony of running a dry pen over his handwriting. I think we are all of opinion that the mere running a dry pen over a signature would authenticate it, though certainly it is not necessary to go through the ceremony for the purpose of complying with the Statute of Frauds. The other point is, where any man calls upon another to admit or assent to a particular fact as against him that is cogent evidence that the fact is true. Now here Gompertz wrote in his own hand and called upon the plaintiff to sign a memorandum, distinctly stating that there was an error in the invoice, and that it ought to have been 150*l.* instead of 146*l.* and that as against Gompertz, who wrote it and called upon the plaintiff to sign it, I apprehend that there could not be more cogent evidence that the fact was true, and he having delivered out a paper containing that statement, or what was tantamount to a statement, it appears to me the Statute of Frauds is sufficiently complied with, and the declaration is good. Judgment for the plaintiff.

Drainage Act—Commissioners—Appointment—Execution of powers.

By a local Act for draining part of the county of Lincoln (6 & 7 Vict. c. lxxvi. s. 1) the lords of three manors for the time being, or in their absence their respective agents, appointed by writing under their respective hands for each of the said manors, were appointed commissioners for executing the Act. By sec. 2 no person could act as a commissioner or the agent of a commissioner, until he had subscribed a certain declaration. By sec. 3, in case any commissioner shall act before making the declaration, or if any person not duly qualified shall act or shall appoint an agent who shall act, he shall be liable to certain penalties. By sec. 6 no act of the commissioners should be valid unless done at a public meeting of the commissioners. The lords of the three manors mentioned in the Act never met together, nor did any of them subscribe the above-mentioned declaration, but all three of them being in England, though not in Lincolnshire, and apart from each other, respectively signed instruments in the form given by the statute, appointing the defendants their agents for executing the Act. The defendants subscribed the required declaration, and then proceeded as commissioners to put the Act in force:

Held, that they were by such appointment themselves commissioners, and as such authorised to put in force the compulsory powers of the statute.

The defendants, in execution of the Act, gave the plaintiff notice that for certain works they would require part of his land, which was particularly described therein. Upon his refusal to treat for the purchase of the land, the defendants, in pursuance of powers given by the Act, issued their warrant to the sheriff to summon a jury to assess the value of the land required, and the compensation to be paid to the plaintiff for injury to other land. In obedience to that warrant a jury was summoned, and an inquisition taken. The warrant and inquisition described the lands generally, but did not recite or refer to the previous notice of the defendant's intention to take the lands, nor did they state that the plaintiff and defendants had been unable to come to an agreement:

Held, that it was not necessary that those matters should appear upon the face of the warrant or inquisition, and that the identity of the lands not being questioned in point of fact, the proceedings were regular.

Ostler v. Cooke, 13 Q.B. 143; 18 L.J. 185; 13 Law T. 67, affirmed.

This was an action on the case for injury done by the defendants to the plaintiff's reversionary interest in certain lands in the county of Lincoln. Various issues were raised upon the record; and when the case came on for trial at Lincoln before Patteson, J. it was agreed that the facts should be turned into a special case for the opinion of this Court.

The plaintiff, previous to and at the time of the passing of the stat. 6 & 7 Vict. c. lxxvi. "for draining, embanking, and improving the fen lands, &c. within the parishes, &c. of Bardney, Southrow, otherwise Southrey, Tupholme, Bucknall, Horsington, Stixwould, Edlington, and Thimbleby, in the county of Lincoln," was entitled, as owner in fee simple, to the reversion of certain land to the extent of upwards of 200 acres situate in Southrey, of which the three closes in the declaration mentioned, in the occupation respectively of Perrin, East, and Goodyear, as tenants to the plaintiff, form a part, and he is still entitled to such reversion, unless, under the circumstances hereinafter stated, he has, by virtue of the provisions of the said Act, become divested of the same.

The said Act of Parliament is to be considered as forming part of this case.

By the said Act it was enacted, that from and immediately after the passing of the same, the lords or ladies of the respective manors of Bardney, Tupholme, and Stixwould, aforesaid, for the time being, or, in his or her or their absence, their respective agents appointed by writing under his or her or their respective hands for each of the said manors respectively, and which respective appointments may be made according to the form specified in Schedule (A) to this Act, or as near thereto as circumstances will admit, shall be and are hereby appointed commissioners for executing this Act. Provided that no person shall act as agent for more than one commissioner at one time.

Sec. 2. It was further enacted, that no person shall be capable of acting as a commissioner or as an agent of a commissioner until he shall have made and subscribed a declaration in the words or to the effect set forth in the Schedule (B) to this Act.

Sec. 3. It was enacted, that in case any commissioner shall act before he shall have made the said declaration, or if any person not being duly qualified shall act, or shall appoint an agent or deputy who shall act, in the execution of this Act, he shall be liable to certain forfeitures, and the mode of recovery of the same is provided.

Sec. 4. It was enacted, that no act or proceeding of the commissioners shall be impeached or rendered or decreed to be informal by reason of any person not duly authorised to act as a commissioner in the execution of this Act having acted or concurred therein.

Sec. 5, comprises certain provisions relative to the meetings of the commissioners for carrying the Act into execution.

Sec. 6. It was enacted that no act of the said commissioners shall be valid unless done at some public meeting to be holden by virtue of this Act (save as in this Act is particularly mentioned), and all powers and authorities granted to or vested in the commissioners may, from time to time, be exercised by the major part of them present at any meeting.

(Schedule A.)

I   do hereby appoint   of   to be my agent, or deputy, to act for me in all respects as if I myself were present and acting in the execution of an Act passed in the   year of the reign of Queen Victoria, intituled, &c.

(Schedule B.)

Form of declaration by commissioner or agent.

I   do solemnly declare that I will, without favour or affection, hatred or malice, truly and impartially, according to the best of my skill and knowledge, execute and perform all the powers and authorities in the execution whereof I shall at any time act as a commissioner (or as an agent of   ), appointed in and by an Act passed in the   year of the reign of Queen Victoria, intituled, &c.

Before and at the time of the passing of this Act, Lord Harrowby, Mr. Vyner, and Mr. Turnor claimed to be respectively lords of the manors of Bardney, Tupholme, and Stixwould. At the trial it was admitted that Bardney was a manor, and that Lord Harrowby was lord thereof. In order to shew that Tupholme and Stixwould were manors, and that Mr. Vyner and Mr. Turnor were lords thereof, the defendants relied upon the said Act of Parliament as conclusive evidence, and in addition (with respect to Tupholme) put in evidence a deed, &c. The case then set out the evidence adduced at the trial upon this subject.) Lord Harrowby, Mr. Vyner, and Mr. Turnor never met together, nor did any two of them meet, for the purposes of the Act, nor did any of them ever subscribe the declaration contained in Schedule (B) to the said Act. On the 1st of August, 1843, being all three of them then in England, but not in Lincolnshire, and apart from each other, they respectively signed instruments in the form which is given in Schedule (A) of the said Act; the instrument signed by Lord Harrowby, purporting to appoint the defendant George Cooke as his agent; the instrument signed by Mr. Vyner, purporting to appoint the defendant Thomas Greetham as his agent; and the instrument signed by Mr. Turnor, purporting to appoint the defendant John Young Macvicar as his agent.

The three defendants are respectively stewards of Lord Harrowby, Mr. Vyner, and Mr. Turnor, and claim to be and act as commissioners under and by virtue of the said instruments.

Lord Harrowby, Mr. Vyner, and Mr. Turnor never did any other act as commissioners than sign the said instrument, nor did they in any way interfere with the proceedings of the defendants. Mr. Turnor and Mr. Vyner have been in Lincolnshire repeatedly during the interval between the time when the said instruments were signed and the doing of the acts complained of by the defendants which they claimed to do as commissioners. The defendants respectively, before acting as commissioners, made and subscribed the declaration set forth in Schedule (B) of the Act.

Under the directions of the defendants very extensive works of drainage were commenced, to complete which the defendants considered it necessary to take a portion of the plaintiff's land, consisting of parts of the three closes mentioned in the declaration. The plaintiff, not recognising the authority of the defendants, refused to treat respecting the sale of the same.

On the 14th of July, 1845, the defendants served the plaintiff with a notice, of which the following is a copy:—

"Bardney, &c. Drainage.

"We, the undersigned commissioners appointed for carrying into execution an Act of Parliament passed, &c. do hereby give you notice, that for the construction and site of certain works which will conduce to the more effectual drainage of the said fen lands and low grounds,—that is to say, for the widening, deepening, and improving a certain soke dyke, and for the construction of a catch-water, we require to take and purchase certain lands wherein you are interested, lying and being in the hamlet or township of Southrow, otherwise Southrey, and parish of Bardney, and that the said lands which we so require to purchase, for widening, deepening, and improving the said soke dyke, consists of a strip of land lying [describing it].

"And we do further give you notice, that we require for our temporary occupation, for depositing the earth and soil in widening, deepening, and improving the said soke drain, to take and use certain lands lying in the hamlet or township of Southrow, otherwise Southrey, wherein you are interested, and adjoining the said soke drain, &c.

"And that the said lands which we so require to purchase for constructing the said catchwater, amount altogether to 2r. 39p. consisting of, &c.

"And we do further give you notice, that for our temporary occupation for depositing the soil and earth in constructing the said catchwater, we require to take and use certain lands wherein you are interested, lying and being in the hamlet or township of Southrow, &c.

"And we do hereby demand of you the particulars of your estate and interest in the said lands which we so require to purchase or to take as aforesaid, and of the claims made by you in respect thereof.

"And we do hereby give you notice, that we are willing to treat with you for the purchase of your interest in the lands which we so require to purchase or take as aforesaid, and as to the compensation to be made to you for the damage that may be sustained by you by reason of the making of the said works. Dated at the city of Lincoln, this 11th day of July, 1845; George Cooke, Thomas Greetham. To William Ostler, esq."

On the 9th of August, 1845, the defendants served the plaintiff with a notice, of which the following is a copy:—

"We, &c. do hereby give you notice, that in consequence of your failing to treat with us, and of our being unable to come to any agreement with you as to the value of certain lands in the hamlet or township of Southrow, &c. of which you are the owner, and which are required to be purchased for the purposes of the said Act, and as to the value of certain other lands which will be injuriously affected by the execution of certain works to be by us executed in pursuance of the powers of the said Act: and as to the compensation to be made in respect thereof; and as to the amount of the damages occasioned or to be occasioned to such lands by the temporary occupation thereof, in the making of the said works, and for the injury done or to be done to the said lands of which you are the owner by the severance from such lands of the said lands so required to be purchased as aforesaid, and which said lands respectively are the lands described and specified in a certain notice or plan thereunto annexed, bearing date the 11th day of July last, and served upon you on or about the 14th day of the same month of July: we intend, after the expiration of one month after the service of this notice, in pursuance of the powers and authorities given to and vested in us by virtue of the said Act, to cause a jury to be summoned in such manner as by the said Act is provided, to inquire of, assess, and ascertain the sum or several sums of money to be paid to you for the purchase of three acres, one rood, and twenty-five perches of land of which you are the owner, and which are situate in the hamlet or township of Southrow, otherwise Southrey, &c. and which lands are desirable and required for the purposes of the said Act for the site of certain works which will respectively conduce to the more effectual drainage of the said fen lands, &c.; and also the sum of money to be paid to you for the injury done or to be done to your lands by the severance from such lands of the lands so required as aforesaid, &c. And also the sum of money to be paid to you by way of compensation for the damage occasioned to your lands by the execution of the said works, whether it be for damage sustained before the time of the inquiry, or for future damage either temporary or permanent, or for any recurring damage of which the cause is at the time of the inquiry only in part obviated, and which cannot or will not be further obviated by us, the said commissioners. And we do hereby give you further notice that we are willing to give you the sum of 260*l.* for your interest in the said lands. As witness our hands this 9th day of August, 1845. G. Cooke, Thomas Greetham, J. Young Macvicar. To W. Ostler, esq."

On the 15th September, 1845, the plaintiff served on the defendants the following notice:—"To Messrs. Geo. Cooke, Thos. Greetham, and John Young Macvicar, and to Messrs. Pearson and Holdrich.—I, the undersigned William Ostler, do hereby give you notice, that you, the said George Cooke, Thos. Greetham, and John Young Macvicar, have not, nor has any one of you, been duly appointed commissioners, or a commissioner, for executing an Act of Parliament made and passed in the sixth and seventh years of the reign of her present Majesty Queen Victoria, intituled, &c.; and that you, the said Geo. Cooke, Thos. Greetham, and John Young Macvicar, are not commissioners, nor is any one of you a commissioner, for executing the said Act, and that you have not, nor has any one of you, power or authority to cause a jury to be summoned or an inquiry to be held under or by virtue of the provisions of the said Act, to inquire of, &c. And I hereby give you, and each of you, further notice, not to cause, or attempt to cause, a jury to be summoned, or any inquiry to be held, for the purposes mentioned in the said notice of the 9th day of August, 1845; and that in case you shall cause such jury to be summoned, or inquiry to be held, I shall consider the same, and all proceedings to be had and taken in pursuance or in consequence thereof, absolutely null and void, and shall take such proceedings in reference thereto as I may be advised. Dated the 1st day of September, 1845.—William Ostler."

A notice to the same effect was served on the under-sheriff of the county of Lincoln on the 15th of October, 1845.

The defendants issued a warrant to Thomas Coltman, the sheriff for the county of Lincoln, dated the 3rd day of October, 1845, of which the following is a copy:—"To Thomas Coltman, esq. sheriff of the county of Lincoln.—The undersigned, being commissioners duly appointed pursuant to and acting in execution of an Act of Parliament passed in the sixth and 7th years of the reign of her present Majesty, intituled, &c. in pursuance and exercise of the power and authority in this behalf granted to and vested in us by the said Act, do by this our warrant, under our hands, require you to summon, empannel, and return twenty-four indifferent persons duly qualified to act as common jurymen in the Superior Courts to appear before you at the Angel Inn, in Bardney aforesaid, on, &c. in order that out of them a jury of twelve may be sworn, to inquire of, assess, and ascertain the sum or several sums of money to be paid to William Ostler, of Grantham, in the said county of Lincoln, gentleman, for the purchase of 3a. 1r. 25p. of land, of which the said William Ostler is owner, and which are situate in the hamlet or township of Southrow, &c. and which lands are desirable and required for the purposes of the said Act for the site of certain works, which will respectively conduce to the more effectual drainage of the said fen lands, &c.; and also the sum of money to be paid to the said William Ostler for the severance, &c.; and also the sum of money to be paid to the said William Ostler by way of compensation for the damage occasioned to the lands of the said William Ostler, by the execution of the said works, whether it be the damage sustained before the time of the inquiry, or the future damage, &c. (as in the notice). Dated this third day of October, in the year of our Lord 1845. Geo. Cooke, Thos. Greetham, John Young Macvicar."

Defendants, on the 6th of October, 1845, served the plaintiff with a notice, of which the following is a copy:—"To Wm. Ostler, esq.—Take notice, that in pursuance of a warrant, under the hands of the commissioners duly appointed, pursuant to and acting in execution of an Act of Parliament, &c. to him directed, Thomas Coltman, esq. sheriff of the county of Lincoln, hath summoned a jury of twenty-four indifferent persons duly qualified, &c. to meet at the Angel Inn in Bardney, &c. in order that out of them a jury of twelve men may be sworn to inquire of, assess, and ascertain the sum, or several sums, of money, &c. (as in the warrant), and take notice that the said inquiry will be had before the said sheriff, at Bardney aforesaid, on the day and hour aforesaid. Dated this 6th day of October, 1845.—Pearson and Holdich, Clerks to Bardney, &c. Drainage Commissioners."

Under the instrument before set out, a jury was summoned, and met at Bardney on the 23rd of October, 1845, the under-sheriff presiding; the plaintiff, attending by his attorney, Mr. Staniland, who, before the jury was sworn, orally protested against the inquiry, and likewise handed in the following written protest. The protest was set out in the case and stated the following grounds:—1st. That there are no such manors as the manors of Bardney, Tupholme, and Stixwould, in the said Act of Parliament mentioned, and that of consequence there are no lords or ladies of such manors. 2ndly. That the several persons assuming themselves to be the lords of the respective manors of Bardney, Tupholme, and Stixwould, in the said Act mentioned, have never made or subscribed the declaration required by the said Act to be made and subscribed by the persons thereby appointed the commissioners for executing the said Act, and were therefore incapable of appointing any agents to act in the execution of the powers of the said Act. 3rdly. That the instrument, or respective instruments, by which the persons assuming themselves to be lords of the said respective manors of Bardney, Tupholme, and Stixwould appointed, but illegally as I contend, the said George Cooke, Thomas Greetham, and John Young Macvicar, were signed by the persons assuming themselves to be lords of the said manors as aforesaid, separate and apart from each other, and not at a meeting of the commissioners, as required by the said Act. 4thly. That the several notices addressed to William Ostler, and dated respectively the 11th day of July, 1845, the 9th day of August, 1845, and the 6th day of October, 1845, and the said instrument purporting to be a warrant, were not signed, given, or issued in the absence of the persons assuming themselves to be lords of the said respective manors of Bardney, Tupholme, and Stixwould, according to the true intent and meaning of the said Act. 5thly. That the said several notices of the 11th day of July, 1845, the 9th day of August, 1845, and the 6th day of October, 1845, are bad, imperfect, and invalid, both in form and substance, and not in accordance or compliance with the provisions of the said Act of Parliament. 6thly. That the said instrument, purporting to be a warrant, is also on the face of it bad and invalid, inasmuch as the same ought to have recited or referred to the said several notices hereinbefore mentioned, or one or more of them, or ought to have set forth by a sufficient and proper description the particular lands required to be purchased, as also the particular nature of the damage or injury to be sustained by the said William Ostler, by the execution of the works of drainage, and the several sums or sum of money to be paid to the said William Ostler, for or in respect whereof the jury to be summoned in pursuance of such warrant were to assess and ascertain."

In addition to the objections in the written protest, Mr. Staniland objected that the warrant was defective, because it did not shew on the face of it that the commissioners and Mr. Ostler had been unable to come to an agreement for the sum to be paid to him.

The under-sheriff determined to hold the inquiry, saying he should leave the points of law and objections to be disposed of by the Superior Courts.

The jury were then sworn, and after hearing evidence on both sides, and taking a view of the land in question, as required by the defendants, in conformity with the Act, returned their verdict. The under-sheriff read over the inquisition to the jury, and signed the same. The following is a copy of the inquisition:—

"Lincolnshire, to wit. } An inquisition, verdict, and judgment, indented, had, taken, &c. upon the oath of Benjamin Fowler, &c. sworn and charged in that behalf, and having heard and duly weighed and considered the evidence, &c. upon their oaths present and say that they have acquired, ascertained, and assessed, and do find, ascertain, and assess, and deliver their verdict for the sum of 160*l.* as and for the sum of money to be paid by the said commissioners to the said William Ostler, for and for the purchase of 3a. 1r. 25p. of land in the said warrant mentioned, and described as and which are situate in the hamlet or township of Southrow, &c. and which land is and is in and by the said warrant stated to be desirable, and required for such purposes of the said Act, as in the said warrant in that behalf mentioned, and which land can and may, under and by virtue of the said Act, be taken and made use of for the purposes of the said Act. And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oaths aforesaid, do further present and say that they have inquired of, ascertained, and assessed, and do find, ascertain, and assess, and deliver their verdict for the sum of 30*l*. as and for the sum of money to be paid by the said commissioners to the said William Ostler, for the injury done and to be done to the lands of the said William Ostler, by the severance from such lands of the lands so as aforesaid required, &c. And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oaths aforesaid, do further present and say that they have inquired of, ascertained, and assessed, and do find, ascertain, assess, and deliver their verdict for the sum of 248*l*. as and for the sum of money to be paid by the said commissioners to the said William Ostler for the damage done by the execution of such works as in the said warrant in that behalf mentioned, and as well for such damage sustained before the time of taking this inquisition as for any future damage either temporary or permanent, and also for any recurring damage, &c. Whereupon I, the said sheriff, &c.

"In witness whereof, I, the said sheriff, according to the said Act of Parliament, have hereunto signed, set, and subscribed my name, this 23rd day of October, 1845."

The purchase-money and compensation so awarded to the plaintiff by the jury as above mentioned was tendered to the plaintiff by the defendants, on the 15th of November, 1845, and the plaintiff refused to accept the same.

Plaintiff served on defendants on the 26th day of November, 1845, the following notice:—"To Messrs. George Cook, &c.—I, the undersigned William Ostler, do hereby give you and every of you notice that in case you or any of you shall proceed to cut, take, enter upon, or damage any land or property belonging to me, under or by virtue of an alleged inquisition, &c. I shall forthwith apply to the Court of Chancery for an injunction to restrain you and all parties concerned from proceeding, &c. and shall take such further proceedings, both at law and in equity, against all parties concerned as I may be advised. Dated this 25th day of November, 1845.—William Ostler."

On the 3rd day of December, 1845, the defendants paid into the Bank of England, with the privity of the Accountant-General of the Court of Chancery, the sum of 438*l*. being the full amount awarded by the inquisition.

This sum was so paid under sec. 63 of the Act.

No precept was ever issued by or on behalf of the defendants to the sheriff of Lincolnshire to deliver possession of any lands or property belonging to the plaintiff and situate at Southrey or elsewhere to the said defendants or any of them, or to any person or persons for them or on their behalf.

On the 14th of January, 1846, the defendants entered upon the closes and did the acts mentioned in the declaration, which is the trespass complained of.

The qualification of the defendants to act as commissioners except as to the fact of their having taken the declaration required by the Act set forth in Schedule (B), is to be held not to have been admitted by the plaintiff, and he is to be allowed to dispute the same.

The question for the opinion of this Court is, whether, upon the issues joined, the circumstances above stated afford a justification for the acts of the defendants in breaking and entering, &c. the closes in question. The Court to have the power to draw the same inferences of fact from the evidence that a jury ought, in their judgment, to have drawn either party to have the right to turn the case into a special verdict, and if there be a special verdict the inferences of fact drawn by the Court are to form part of their special verdict.

The case was argued in the Court of Q. B. in Hilary Term 1849, and judgment given for the defendants (13 Law T. 67). Upon that judgment the plaintiff brought a writ of error, which now came on for argument.

The Attorney-General (Willmore with him), for the plaintiff. The proceedings taken to obtain possession are void, the defendants having no title as commissioners. No act of theirs in that character is valid. The whole proceedings purport to have been done in that character, and they having no title as commissioners, the lands did not vest in them under the Act. The lords of the manors never took the declaration in Schedule B, required by the Act to be taken (sec. 2), before they are capable of acting as commissioners, or did any act, except nominating the defendants as their agents. But before they could appoint agents to act for them as commissioners it was necessary that they should qualify themselves as commissioners, for the appointment of such agents was an act done by them as commissioners. The agents are spoken of throughout the Act as agents of the commissioners and not of the lords. There is a distinction taken in the Act between the commissioners and their agents, and schedule B provides for the agents subscribing the declaration to be made, not as commissioners, but as agents. That being so, the defendants should have taken the proceedings not as if they were acting as commissioners, but as agents. Then, as by sec. 1 no person can act as agent for more than one commissioner at one time, the proceedings should have shewn for whom each defendant was acting. Secondly, the inquisition should have specified the land with particularity. In the notice for the defendants to treat for the lands in the first instance, the land was minutely specified. The sheriff's authority would be a warrant from the commissioners to the sheriff requiring him to summon a jury (sec. 78), and the warrant should have set out that notice, or have specified the particular land as to which the jury were to assess the compensation to be given. But here the warrant is general, and might relate to any land that the plaintiff had in the township of Southrow. Taylor v. Clemson, 2 Q. B. 978; and 11 Clk. & Fin. 610, S.C.; Rex v. Manning, 1 Burr. 377, were then cited. The commissioners have a statutable title to the land required, it is necessary therefore that some specific mention of them should appear on the face of the inquisition, as no conveyance is necessary to give title to the commissioners.

Bramwell (for the defendants) was stopped by the Court.

PARKE, B.—The Court is of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Q. B. on both points was right. The first point is, whether or not the defendants were made by the Act commissioners themselves, and could act as such, or only as agents to the lords of the manors. It must be admitted that the first section of the Act is inartificially drawn, when coupled with the two clauses in the schedule. By the 1st section, the lords or ladies of the manors mentioned are constituted commissioners, or, if they do not choose to act, then in their absence their agents are themselves to be commissioners. It must be admitted that the form in the schedule is not well adapted to the case, but that is not to obliterate the effect of the enacting part of the statute, for the latter is the governing part of the statute, and not the schedule. The effect, therefore, of each lord appointing his own agent was, that the agents became commissioners, to act in their own names. Then it was said that the lords could not appoint their agents to act for them without previously making the declaration in schedule B. Now, supposing that to have been necessary, the omission would not have made their acts void, but would only have rendered the lords liable to certain penalties under the 3rd section. The second point is, whether the inquisition ought to have stated with some particularity the lands which were valued by the jury. It appears to me that it was not void in this respect. The inquisition does not constitute any part of the conveyance; the verdict was only necessary to establish the amount to be paid or tendered as the price of the land. And as soon as the amount is tendered, then under sec. 63, the land vests in the commissioners, whether the owner refuses to accept the same, or fails to make out a title to the land. If evidence of different land had been given before the jury, the inquisition would have been irregular, and might have been set aside. The notice to the plaintiff set out the land required by metes and bounds, and he had no difficulty in knowing what it was. The judgment of the Court of Q. B. must therefore be affirmed.

Re GEORGE WILLIAM DYSON.

Misconduct of assignees—Jurisdiction of the Court.

The Court will hold assignees responsible for all moneys received through their instrumentality, and will look to the assignees personally and not to their attorneys.

The facts of this case are sufficiently stated in the judgment of the Court, which was delivered by

The CHIEF COMMISSIONER, who said,—In this case I find that the first step taken in reference to the appointment of an assignee was on the 11th of January, 1850, when a rule was granted on the application of Archibald Mattheson and James Markwell, Mr. Paxton being then, as now, their attorney, calling upon insolvent to shew cause why they should not be appointed assignees. On the 27th of February that year, Mr. Cooke, on behalf of the insolvent, showed cause, on which occasion the matter was ordered to stand over until the hearing of the insolvent on the 14th of March. On this 27th of February, however, the report of the provisional assignee, to whom I had referred in consequence of the indorsement "Equity suit" in the schedule, which denoted that he had been made a party to some suit, was read. On the 14th of March, 1850, on the hearing of the case, it is evident that I attached much weight to the reasons alleged against the appointment of an assignee, and particularly to the inexpediency of trusting the large sums, which it was admitted on all hands would be coming from this estate, in the hands of persons, who, however respectable they might be, were liable to the casualties of traders, and subject to the Bankrupt Laws; for, although I did appoint assignees, I find the order as recorded by the officer of the court to be as follows:—"Rule absolute, the assignees consenting that all moneys coming from the estate shall be paid into court, and undertaking to give notice to the provisional assignee when any money is likely to be paid from the Court of Chancery or otherwise." Now, can anything be more conclusive than this, and can there be a doubt, that on the faith of this consent and undertaking alone, the Court was induced to appoint assignees in this case? Now, let us see how this undertaking, which was afterwards reduced into writing, and incorporated in a rule of the Court of the 14th March, 1850, has been carried out? In a paper filed in this Court on the 24th of February last, it is admitted that as long ago as 11th October, 1850, a sum of 22,000*l*. was received, and after making certain alleged payments, the legality and propriety of which cannot be ascertained, because the assignee has filed no such account as is required by the statute; and no audit, therefore, such as is required by the statute, has been made; so that this balance, 1,072*l*. has remained in his hands, as he must have signed the receipts for money. It is sought to excuse the assignee upon the pretence that all moneys have been received by the attorney and not by him; but the words of the statute sec. 62, which are "an account of the estate and effects got in by, or for the said assignee," negative such a construction. This Court, therefore, can admit no such excuse. The assignee, and he only, is responsible to this Court, and with him and not with his attorney, is the Court to deal. Let us now see what steps have been taken to endeavour to get the assignee to act up to the undertaking, on the faith of which he was appointed. On the 23rd of April last, on the audit of what is called an account before the proper officer of this Court, I find that he has treated such account as the account of the assignee, and that he then directed the sum of 1,072*l*. 18s. to be paid into Court on or before the 30th April then next. The assignee treats such directions, as he has all along his own undertaking, and the provisions of the statute, with contempt. The money is not paid in to this hour. The next step appears to have been taken on the 9th of June, when, on proof of the service of the last-mentioned order of Mr. Dance, the examiner, and also on proof that the money had not been paid, as directed, an order was made by the Court, directing the assignee to pay into the hands of the provisional assignee, on or before the 23rd of June then next, the sum of 1,272*l*. 8s. (a), unless Mr. Richards's allocatur for costs be in the meantime produced. Is this order complied with? No. Not in either alternative; viz. by paying in the balance admitted, viz. 1,072*l*. 18s. or producing Mr. Richards's allocatur. What is the next step? It is the applications respectively made on the 25th of June, by Mr. Markwell, the assignee, and by Mr. Dyson, the insolvent; with these the Court is now to deal. With respect to the rule granted on the application of the assignee, calling upon the insolvent to shew cause, why the order of the 9th of June for the payment of the sum of 1,273*l*. 8s. should not be rescinded, it appears to me to be improvidently granted, and must be discharged; and inasmuch as it appears to me that the assignee ought to have paid into Court the sum of 1,072*l*. 8s. immediately after it had been received, in pursuance of his undertaking, and then not having done so, should have immediately on being served with Mr. Dance's order of the 23rd of April, obeyed it, he will not be allowed his costs out of the estate. With respect to the rule granted on the application of the insolvent, calling upon the assignee to shew cause why he should not be committed for the contempt in disobeying the order of the 9th of June, for payment of the sum of 1,272*l*. 8s. I think that must also be discharged, because that sum was improperly inserted instead of 1,072*l*. 8s. and the attorney for the insolvent ought not to have so drawn it up; the costs also of this rule, must, for that reason, be paid by the party who obtained it. My decision in both these rules as to costs, extends not only to the costs of obtaining them, but also shewing cause to the costs of shewing cause, which must be borne respectively by the parties. Having disposed of both these rules, I will say what I will do in the matter. The only excuse attempted by the assignee for his contempt in having so long disobeyed the rule of this Court, incorporating his undertaking, and having failed to pay in the money since March 1850, is that his attorney has it, and claims a lien on it for his costs. This is a matter between him and his attorney with which this Court has nothing to do; this Court looking to the assignee and not to the attorney, and holding the assignee responsible for all moneys which have been received through his instrumentality. But whose fault is it that these costs have not been long ago taxed and paid, as far as relates to the costs incurred in this court? For by the attorney's own shewing in his affidavit sworn on the 23rd June last, the costs incurred in the Court of Chancery are by the order made in that court on the 30th March last provided for, and to be paid out of a fund in that court. The fault, therefore, is with the assignee and his attorney, and of them alone, for they were bound by law, under the 62nd section of the Act, to have all costs claimed, taxed, between the time of filing what they have called an account and the day fixed for the audit of it; moreover, the terms of the attorney's undertaking are that all moneys are to be paid into court, to be subject, in the first instance, to the just claims of the assignee in respect of the costs. This undertaking is witnessed by Mr. Paxton, their attorney, and the assignee is not to be permitted to evade this undertaking under the pretence of the money being in Mr. Paxton's hands, and that he claims a lien upon it for costs. I now, therefore, make an order, that on reading the undertaking of Archibald Matthison and James Markwell, and the rule of this court, respectively dated 14th March, 1850, and the joint affidavit of James Markwell, surviving assignee of estate and effects of George William Dyson, an insolvent debtor, and of Arthur John Hughes, clerk to Francis Paxton, attorney for the said assignee, purporting to contain an account of moneys received by the said surviving assignee, filed in this court on the 24th day of February last, that the sum of 1,072*l.* 18*s.* the balance stated in the said account, after certain alleged payments not yet proved, be paid into court on or before Thursday next, the 29th inst. at four o'clock, by the said James Markwell.

Re George Fisher.

Annulling vesting-order on creditors' petition—Practice.

Macrae moved for the annulling of the vesting-order, which was obtained upon a creditors' petition filed so far back as the year 1839. The practice in Mr. Commissioner Law's Court, being somewhat different from that in the other Courts, may be gathered from the following record of the proceedings upon this motion. The motion was "For an order declaring the vesting-order, No. 48,437, T. made on the 9th August, 1839, on the petition of George Pearson and William Upton, null and void, the insolvent having been discharged from custody without taking the benefit of the Act." The motion was supported by the following documents:—1. Affidavit of facts by insolvent. 2. Office copy of petition filed. 3. Office copy of vesting-order made thereupon. 4. Certificate of discharge. 5. Undertaking by Fisher not to bring action for any act done. 6. Consent of petitioning creditor to the discharge. The affidavit of facts, after stating the date of the vesting-order in 1839, stated that, "at that date he was indebted to several persons in divers sums amounting in the whole to the sum of four hundred pounds, or thereabouts, and this deponent further saith, that shortly after the date of the said vesting order, he (this deponent) paid, satisfied, and discharged all the said debts as aforesaid; and, this deponent further saith, that he was, at the date of the said vesting-order, possessed of certain book debts, goods, chattels, and effects, but of what value he (this deponent) is not now able to set forth, and also of a contingent reversionary interest, under the will of his (this deponent's) late father, George Fisher, expectant upon the decease of his (this deponent's) mother, Maria Fisher, afterwards Maria Seanly; and this deponent further saith, that certain proceedings are now pending in the High Court of Chancery for the recovery of the said reversionary interest; and he (this deponent) has been advised that it is material and necessary that a vesting-order made in the above matter, on the petition of George Pearson and William Upton, should be declared null and void; he (this deponent) having been discharged from custody without taking the benefit of the said Act."

Mr. Commissioner Law intimated that it was not a matter of course in his court that a creditor's petition should be dismissed because the creditor consented. He never dismissed a petition and annulled the vesting-order simply because a creditor consented. A man who was arrested and did not file a schedule, and after some months remaining in prison chose to pay one creditor, had no right, simply from that circumstance, to the dismissal of the petition, the filing of which created a trust for the creditors generally. The insolvent might have been put up to receiving property. The provisional assignee must be referred to. There is no minute from the provisional assignee. There must be a voucher from the provisional assignee, first, that there is no creditors' assignee; secondly, that there is no property in court; and, thirdly, that nothing has been done in the case. Motion refused.

The motion was again made with the required vouchers from the provisional assignee, when the [illegible]

[illegible] on a paper form of creditor list in schedule, and verify the payment with dates as nearly as he can.—July 12, 1852." Motion refused.

A schedule or list of the insolvent's debts at the date of the filing of the creditors' petition in 1839 was accordingly prepared with the required vouchers verifying the payment with dates as nearly as possible; also an affidavit from the parties who had paid the debts as to that fact, and who had advanced the sums necessary for that purpose, &c.

Tuesday, July 27.—The motion was again renewed, with these additional documents, when the learned commissioner indorsed the following order: —"Let insolvent swear that the list is a true list of all debts owing at insolvency. That is all I required. These papers will put him to much expense, which I did not require. If he will walk into court for five minutes he can do it." Motion refused.

Wednesday, Aug. 4.—Macrae again renewed the motion, offering the additional affidavit required, intimating that he was instructed to say that the attorneys in the cause had done all that they possibly could to satisfy the Court, and that if the order was not now made they would to-morrow serve the provisional assignee with copies of two long bills in Chancery, and he would be formally made a party to the suits.

Mr. Commissioner Law then intimated that the required order would be made.

Winding-up Acts, 1848, 1849—Joint-stock company or association.

Persons who acted together for the purpose of obtaining an Act of Parliament to make a railway, and formed themselves into an association which was provisionally registered under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, are to be considered as a company or association within the meaning of the Joint-Stock Companies Winding-up Acts, 1848 and 1849, and therefore,

Held, that such an association may be wound up at the discretion of the Court of Chancery, under the provisions for that purpose contained in those Acts of Parliament.

The question as to the extent of the liability of a contributory, decided in the above case, was reported in 19 Law T. 249. The question which was considered the more important of the two, as to whether associations, similar to the one in the present case, did or did not come within the scope and provisions of the Winding-up Acts, remains to be reported. The facts of the case were stated in the former report, but it may be convenient to give the most important features of the case on the present occasion.

In the year 1845 a company was provisionally registered, pursuant to the statute 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, intituled "An Act for the Registration, Incorporation, and Regulation of Joint-Stock Companies," by the name and style of "The Direct Birmingham, Oxford, Reading, and Brighton Railway Company;" but it was necessary that an Act of Parliament should be obtained to authorise its formation, and to carry into effect its objects. The capital of the proposed company was to be 2,000,000*l.* divided into 80,000 shares of 25*l.* each. Upon the allotment of each share it was proposed that a deposit of 2*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* should be paid. A prospectus, [illegible]istered the 25th September, 1845, was printed [illegible]blished, and circulated amongst the public by the promoters of the company, containing the names of divers persons (and amongst others that of the respondent) as the provisional committee of the company. On the 8th October, 1845, a meeting of gentlemen was held at the office of the company in Moorgate-street, at which a provisional committee and a committee of management were appointed, and resolutions passed to the following effect—viz. that the prospectus issued as that of the provisional committee, then read, should be approved and adopted, and that until an Act of Parliament should be obtained, the affairs of the company should be under the control of the managing directors, to whom power was given to allot the shares, and to apply the funds of the company in payment of all the expenses incurred in its formation, and in the preparation of the plans and sections to be submitted to Parliament. The respondent was not present at the meeting of the 8th October, 1845, and had no notice whatever thereof. On or about the 11th October, 1845, the respondent received from Mr. Rayner, the secretary of the proposed company, a circular letter, dated the 10th October, informing him that 100 shares had been appropriated to each member of the provisional committee. On the 14th October, 1845, the respondent wrote to the secretary a letter in reply to the circular, stating that he was willing to take the 100 shares placed at his disposal as a member of the provisional committee. On or about the 18th October, 1845, the secretary sent to the respondent the letter of allotment. The respondent paid the sum of 262*l.* 10*s.* as the deposit on 100 shares allotted to him by the letter of allotment; no part of that sum has been returned to the respondent, nor has he paid any further sum on account of the company; 67,630 shares only of the 80,000 of which the said company was to consist were allotted, the deposits were paid on 1,295 only, no Act of Parliament was ever applied for to invest the company with the powers necessary to accomplish its object, and the undertaking was wholly abandoned. The several persons who were appointed the managing committee accepted and took upon themselves the office and duties thereof, and expenses to a large amount were incurred by them in and about the formation of the company; but the respondent never authorised the incurring of any such expenses; he was never present at any meeting of the company; nor did he in any manner whatever become a party to any contract under which any of such expenses were incurred. On the 21st December, 1849, an order was made by his honour the late Vice-Chancellor of England for the dissolution and winding-up of the company under the provisions of the Joint-Stock Companies' Winding-up Acts, 1848 and 1849, and the matter was referred to Master Brougham, who appointed Mr. Hutton official manager of the company, and Mr. Bright was afterwards declared to be a contributory. On the 13th June, 1851, the Master ordered a call of 10*l.* per share upon each of the contributories, in order to pay the expenses of the company. Mr. Bright, on the 3rd July, 1851, moved the Court of Chancery against the call, but Vice-Chancellor Lord Cranworth did not think fit to make any order thereon, and gave judgment to that effect on the same day. Mr. Bright appealed against that order, first, because he contended that previously to the passing of the Joint-Stock Companies' Winding-up Acts he was not liable at law or in equity to pay any part of the expenses of the company; and, secondly, because the Joint-Stock Companies' Winding-up Acts have not the effect of making any contributory to the company liable for any part of the expenses incurred on its behalf, for which he was not previously liable.

When the case came on for argument, the House expressed a desire to have the question argued, whether the Winding-up Acts were applicable to a company which was only provisionally registered?

C. P. Cooper, Q.C. (Morris with him), after stating that it had been a subject of great regret to several judges in the Court of Chancery that orders had been so indiscriminately made for the winding up of abortive schemes, contended that the Winding-up Acts never contemplated that an inchoate association, similar to the one in the present case, was such a company as was directed to be wound up under those Acts. He mentioned and cited Walstab v. Spottiswoode, 15 Mees. & Wels. 501; Ex parte James, 1 Sim. N.S. 145; Vansandau v. Moore, 1 Russ. 441; Barber's case, 1 MacN. & Gord. 176; Appendix to Wordsworth on Railways, 431—433, 6th edit.; Lefroy v. Gore, 1 Jones & Lat. 571; Parke's Insurance, tit. "General Average;" Cowell v. Edwards, 2 Bos. & P. 268; Brown v. Lee, 6 Bar. & Cr. 697.

Bethell, Q.C. (Roxburgh with him), for the official manager, contended that the word "association" in the last Winding-up Act clearly indicates the nature of the present company, and was clearly within the terms of the Winding-up Acts, and as such, the order pronounced by the Court below for the winding up of this company or association was perfectly correct. That if that order should be discharged, not only the proceedings in this case, but in thousands of others, would be thrown into inextricable confusion. That the general words in the Winding-up Acts were introduced intentionally to allow of the greatest scope of interpretation. He referred to Ex parte Sharpe and James, 19 Law T. 193; Barwick v. Lambert, 15 Mes. & W. 489; Besley's case, 3 MacN. & G. 81; Dict. of Maule, J. in Bradshaw v. Lord Londesborough, 21 L. J. 17; Ex parte St James's Club, 20 L. J. 650; Re Sherwood Loan Company, 1 Sim. N.S. 165.

Cooper, in reply, referred to Thompson's case, 3 Ho. Lord's Cases, 187; and Williams v. Piggot, 2 Exc. Rep. 201.

QUESTIONS.

A railway company was projected and provisionally registered by the promoters. A prospectus was published, containing a list of the provisional committee. The shares of the proposed company were 10,000; a managing committee was appointed, and 5,000 shares allotted to different persons, in various numbers, but 500 only were accepted by the allottees. It was ultimately found to be impracticable to procure subscribers for a sufficient number of shares to enable the parties to carry the project into effect, and it was, therefore, by an order under the Winding-up Acts, ordered that the company should be dissolved.

"Are the provisions of those Acts applicable to this case?

"A railway company was projected and provisionally registered by the promoters. A prospectus was published, containing a list of the provisional committee, which consisted of more than seven persons appointed with their own consent. The shares of the proposed company were 10,000; a managing committee was appointed, also consisting of seven persons appointed by their own consent. There was an agreement for the obtaining subscriptions and raising capital by the provisional committee and others, in order to the formation of a company or partnership for making a railway, which could not be carried into execution without obtaining an Act of Parliament, and for obtaining an Act of Parliament for that purpose, and the preparation of necessary plans and sections, 5,000 shares were allotted to different persons, in various numbers, but 500 only were accepted by the allottees. It was ultimately found to be impracticable to procure subscribers for a sufficient number of shares to enable the parties to carry the project into effect, and it was, therefore, by an order under the Winding-up Acts, ordered that the company should be dissolved.

"Are the provisions of those Acts applicable to this case?

"A railway company was projected and provisionally registered by the promoters. A prospectus was published, containing a list of the provisional committee, which consisted of more than seven persons appointed with their own consent: in which prospectus it was proposed to establish a railway company with a capital of 2,000,000*l*. in shares of 25*l*. each.

"A meeting of more than seven of the persons whose names had been inserted in the prospectus as provisional committee was held, at which a provisional committee and also a managing committee were appointed, each consisting of more than seven persons nominated with their own consent. At that meeting it was resolved to establish the company as proposed by the prospectus for constructing the railway therein mentioned, and to apply for an Act of Parliament to establish such company, and to procure the necessary plans, &c. for that purpose. 5,000 shares were allotted to different persons, in various numbers, but 500 only were accepted by the allottees. It was ultimately found to be impracticable to procure subscribers for a sufficient number of shares to enable the parties to carry the project into effect, and it was therefore, by an order under the Winding-up Acts, ordered that the company should be dissolved.

"Are the provisions of those Acts applicable to this case?"

After consultation together, the opinion of the judges was pronounced by Mr. Baron Parke in the following terms:—

PARKE, B.—In answer to your lordship's question, I have to state, that we are of opinion that the persons who acted together for the purpose of obtaining an Act of Parliament to make a railway in the manner therein stated, were a company or association within the meaning of the Joint-stock Companies Winding-up Acts 1848-49, and that the association of those persons may be dissolved and wound up under the direction of the Court of Chancery, if that Court consider that it is fit and proper that it should be so dealt with. The first of these two Acts, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 45, reciting the previous Act of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 111, and the Irish Act, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 98, and the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 28, and the propriety of amending them, and giving further facilities for the dissolution and winding up of joint-stock companies and partnerships, enacts, that the Act shall apply to all companies, corporate or incorporate, within the provisions of the two first-mentioned Acts, to other companies not material to the present inquiry, and lastly, to all companies, associations, and partnerships to be formed after the passing of that Act, whereof the capital or the profits is or are divided, or to be divided, into shares, and such shares transferable without the express consent of all the copartners; and by sec. 2, to all associations and companies formed for the purpose of working mines, and benefit societies not certified and enrolled. By the interpretation clause, the word "company" in the Act is to mean any partnership, association, or company, corporate or incorporate, to which the Act applies. The body of persons or association in question is not within the latter part of the first section above referred to, for it has no stock divisible into shares; whether it is within the former (7 & 8 Vict. c. 111) is a more doubtful question. It clearly does not fall within the other Act referred to, for it is an Act confined to Ireland. The 7 & 8 Vict. c. 111, comprises in it various companies. It embraces commercial or trading companies incorporated; this is not one. But it also applies to any company or body of persons associated together for commercial or trading purposes to which privileges have been granted under the 7 Wm. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 73, or which is registered provisionally or completely under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. Now, this is not a company or body of persons associated together directly for commercial or trading purposes (if the making of a railway be such a purpose, which may be questioned). The immediate object of this association is not the making of a railway, but the obtaining an Act to enable them to do so, after subscriptions have been obtained and a company has been formed. But as the Act speaks of such a body being provisionally registered as a condition, and a complete company practically never is, the probable meaning of the section is, that a body of persons associated to obtain an Act of Parliament to enable them to act as a company for commercial or trading purposes, whose ultimate though not immediate purpose is commercial or trading, is within this Act, and if so, it would be within the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 45, as that Act is expressly made applicable to every company within the provisions of the former Act, 7 & 8 Vict. c. 111. If the question depended upon this company or association being within the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 111, we should have to decide whether the construction of a railway were a "commercial or trading purpose;" but it is not necessary to do so. It is, however, material, as it seems to shew that an association of promoters may be dealt with by the Court of Chancery, for the purpose of being wound up, if their object is to form a company for commercial or trading purposes. The statute 9 & 10 Vict. c. 28, shews this more clearly. It provides that persons or companies who before that Act have entered into a subscription contract, or any other agreement or agreements, in writing or otherwise, for the formation of a company or partnership for making any railway, which cannot be carried into effect without obtaining the authority of parliament, and in respect of which no Act had been obtained to dissolve the company or partnership contract or agreement, whether or not such contract or agreement shall contain any provisions for the dissolution of the company or partnership intended to be thereby formed. This statute provides that it shall be lawful for the committee, provisional directors, or other persons, by such contract or agreement intrusted with the management or carrying on of the undertaking, to call a meeting to ascertain if the company shall be dissolved, and whether such dissolution shall be deemed an act of bankruptcy, in which case the affairs of the company shall be wound up, under the provisions of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 111, otherwise as an ordinary partnership. No such proceeding appears to have been taken in the case supposed in your lordships' questions, and therefore that particular statute is not applicable to it. But the statute shews that an undertaking by projectors to form a future company is capable of being dealt with under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 111, as a company, and may have its affairs wound up and settled by the Court of Chancery under sec. 22 of that Act, if that Court shall think fit. It does not follow that every case of projectors of an intended company ought to be or would be so dealt with. This statute was followed by the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 45, which extended the operation of the prior Winding-up Acts, and gave the Court of Chancery the power, on the application of a contributory by petition to the Lord Chancellor or Master of the Rolls to order the dissolution or winding up of the company or association therein referred to, not merely in case of bankruptcy, but in case of insolvency or a judgment or decree against the company unpaid, or on a proceeding by a creditor of the company, or if any other matter or thing should be shown which, in the opinion of the Court, should render it just and equitable that the company should be dissolved. This statute, as has been before stated, does not in terms embrace this company, unless it be a company or body of persons, formed for commercial or trading purposes under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 111. And it contains many provisions which are inapplicable except to regularly formed companies. In the case of provisional committees, or the projectors of a company, it is now perfectly well settled law, and acted upon in every court of law in Westminster Hall, that there is no partnership between them, no common power of binding each other merely by such a relation; each man binds himself by his own acts only. There are therefore very few creditors of such a body collectively, though many of one, two, three, or more of the acting individuals who compose the committee, or are projectors; and so there may be a series of contracts to which there are different contributories according as they have been authorised by different persons,—very few binding all, and those only upon the rare accident of each individual authorising that particular contract. These inchoate undertakings have generally no joint estate, effects, or credits, of which there can be a manager (11 & 12 Vict. c. 45, ss. 19 & 20); the body cannot have a judgment or decree against the whole body, except in the rare case that all the projectors have jointly contracted so that no proceedings could be taken under that statute, sec. 5, nor are there any contributories of the entire company except in the extraordinary case of all having contracted; for contributories are those only who have contracted by themselves or agents, with the creditor, or who have agreed to indemnify or repay in part or in all those who have contracted with the creditors on their own account. We consider the law to have been most correctly laid down by Lord Cranworth in Carrick's case, 1 Sim. N.S. 509. All the questions of contributories resolve themselves into two simple questions of fact,—first, by far the most frequent occurrence—did the alleged contributory make or authorise to be made, the contract in respect of which he is called on to contribute on his account jointly with others? or, secondly, if any one or more entered into the contract in his or their own behalf, did he agree to indemnify the person or persons contracting in part or in all against the consequences of that contract? The machinery of this Act 11 & 12 Vict. c. 45, is undoubtedly not well adapted to such a case. This statute was followed up by 12 & 13 Vict. c. 108, passed to amend the former. It is enacted that, notwithstanding anything in that Act importing a more limited application thereof, the same shall apply to all partnerships, associations, and companies, whereof the partners or associates are not less than seven in number, whether incorporated or unincorporated. This statute renders all liable whether their purpose were commercial or not; we think that the term "association" is applicable to such a body of persons as is described in your lordship's question. That body would, we think, have been within the 11 & 12 Vict. if its object had been commercial, the only question on that Act being whether a railroad fell within that description. The object of the 12 & 13 Vict. was to extend the former Acts, upon which a more limited construction was put. This body would clearly have fallen within the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 28. We are of opinion, therefore, that it was meant to be comprised in the class of "associations." It is perfectly true that some of the provisions in this statute, as well as the bulk of those under the former, are applicable only to partnership and companies which have a joint-stock capital and credits, who are united together with a common purpose of making joint contracts, who for that purpose are bound by the agency of one another, or by that of one or more common agents, be they directors or officers, and who would necessarily have been contributories bound by such joint contract. But though these provisions are inapplicable generally to the cases of projectors of different companies, there may be cases in which they, or some of them, are capable of being applied with advantage entirely or partially, and we think it is for the Court of Chancery to decide, which it has undoubtedly a discretion to do (sec. 12, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 45) on each application, whether the particular concern is one to which it will, under all the circumstances, be proper that the Act should be applied. We think this consideration affords an answer to an objection which appeared at first sight to present a formidable difficulty, that there are associations comprehended in those which we consider to be within the Winding-up Act, in which there would be great difficulty and inconvenience in applying the Acts. At the same time it may be observed, that there are others in which they may with convenience be applied. We answer your lordship's questions by stating that the proposed case is one to which the Winding-up Acts may be applied if the Court think fit, not one to which the Court must apply them.

JUDGMENT.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—My lords, I shall propose to your lordships to pursue the same course as that which I suggested to your lordships in the last case. The learned judges have now given their opinions, in which, as at present advised, I entirely concur,—that this is a case which does fall within the Acts, if the Court of Chancery shall so think fit.

The great point in the opinion which has been delivered, in which I entirely concur, is, that according to that opinion, every word in the Act of Parliament in question has given to it its natural import; and though it is very difficult, I admit, to bring within the Act of Parliament some of the cases which are, by the construction, brought within it, yet it would be impossible to give the natural effect to the words of the Act of Parliament, if you were to come to a contrary conclusion. It strikes me, therefore, that the opinion is one in which your lordships will probably entirely concur; but as this case came before your lordships on the merits, and this was a preliminary point upon which the opinion of the judges has been taken, and has now been delivered to your lordships, I should propose, as I did in the former case, that your lordships should adjourn the further consideration of this case, in order that the case itself may be heard at your lordships' bar upon the merits; and, when the argument is concluded, your lordships will then, with the assistance which you have now derived from the opinion just delivered, be enabled, without difficulty, I apprehend, to dispose of the case.

Lord BROUGHAM.—My lords, I take it to be quite clear that this is the course we ought to pursue. The argument at the bar was stopped in order to obtain the opinion of the learned judges on the question, whether we ought to go on with it at all; because the result would have been to stop the case, if the learned judges had given a contrary opinion; and if we had been of opinion with them that the case was not within the Act of Parliament. Therefore we waited until we saw whether or not that opinion would be given for or against the case being within the Act of Parliament, and whether or not we should agree with that opinion if it were so put. The judges are clearly and unanimously of opinion that the case is within the Act of Parliament; and I agree with my noble and learned friend, and with the judges. I originally was of that opinion, two years ago, agreeing with Lord Cottenham. I afterwards, I own, had doubts on the subject; those doubts the further consideration of the case, and, no doubt, also the learned opinion and arguments of the learned judges, have tended to remove; and I am prepared to say that my opinion, as my noble and learned friend's, agrees with the opinion of the judges. But it is not necessary that we should now dispose of that. It is quite sufficient for us to say that we see, at all events, good reason for going on with the rest of the case. No doubt as anticipating that, in all probability, we shall agree with the learned judges that this case is within the Act of Parliament.

The argument on the other point was then proceeded with, and eventually the Appeal against the order for winding up the company was dismissed.

HUTTON v. BRIGHT.—The following was the precise form of the question put to the Judges. It varies a little from the statement in the report :—"Do the facts above stated afford sufficient evidence at law to warrant a verdict that A. is liable to a creditor on the employment of the managing directors for work done, necessary for obtaining the Act of Parliament?"

Ex parte THE ASSIGNEES OF NICHOLAS, re THE MONMOUTHSHIRE AND GLAMORGANSHIRE BANKING COMPANY.

Winding-up Act, 1849.—Shareholder of joint-stock company bankrupt—Official manager—Separate creditors.

Where a shareholder in a joint-stock company became bankrupt, before an order was obtained for winding up the company, and afterwards obtained his certificate :

Held, that under the 14th and 30th sections of the Winding-up Act, 1849, the official manager could go in and prove for the calls made on the bankrupt in competition with the separate creditors.

The facts of this case, and the points taken by counsel, are sufficiently stated in the judgment.

Bethell and W. M. James, for the official manager, cited Steward v. Greaves, 10 M. & W. 711; Davison v. Farmer, 20 L. J. 177, N. S. Ex.; and they contended that, according to the proper construction to be put on the 14th and 30th sections of the Winding-up Act of 1849, the official manager was entitled to prove for the calls made on the bankrupt in competition with his separate creditors.

Roundell Palmer and Karslake, for the assignees, contrà.

Lord Justice KNIGHT BRUCE.—These applications, the one in the bankruptcy of Mr. J. J. Nicholas, and the other under a winding-up order that applied to a joint-stock company of which Nicholas was a shareholder, raise substantially this only question, whether by the effect of the Acts of Parliament called the Winding-up Acts, the general separate creditors of a bankrupt who happens to hold shares in a joint-stock company which is made liable to the operation of these Acts, are placed in a different position from separate creditors of any other person engaged in a mercantile partnership. The question is, not whether there ought to be an alteration nor whether there are grounds in reason for making it, but whether the Legislature has said it shall be so in language not to be mistaken. Now the case stands thus: Mr. Nicholas was unfortunately a shareholder in one, I believe, of the most wretched of the joint-stock companies in its results, which stopped payment on the 6th Oct. 1851. At the time of the stoppage, Nicholas had not become a bankrupt, he became a bankrupt afterwards; and after that event, but before his certificate, a winding-up order was made, and after the winding-up order was made his certificate was obtained; it is now contended by or on behalf of the official manager of the company, that a call made in respect of the shares which this bankrupt held before his bankruptcy is to be treated for every purpose as a separate debt of the bankrupt in the administration of his estate—a startling proposition, certainly, to any person who has not had his attention called to the details of these Acts of Parliament. It is clear that, independently of these Acts of Parliament, according to all the ordinary law relating to bankruptcy, proof could not be made in competition with the separate creditors. It could not be made on behalf of the partners in the joint-stock company, because all the debts are not paid by the partners; according to the law in ordinary cases it could not be done; therefore, if general separate creditors are to suffer, it is on the ground of a particular law created by these Acts, and the case seems to me to turn entirely upon the 14th and 30th sections of the Winding-up Act of 1849. By the 14th section it is enacted, "That if any contributory, or alleged contributory, be a bankrupt or insolvent, he shall be entitled to attend by his assignees, and in all proceedings against his estate under the said Act shall be sufficiently represented by such assignees." By the 30th section it is enacted, "That where any contributory of the company is a bankrupt or insolvent, it shall be lawful for the official manager to prove in the matter of such bankruptcy or insolvency for any balance ordered by the Master to be proved against the estate of such contributory, and to take and receive dividends in respect of such balance in the matter of the bankruptcy or insolvency as a separate debt due from such bankrupt or insolvent, and rateably with the other separate creditors: Provided always, that if any creditors of the company, not being such petitioning creditor under the fiat as after-mentioned, shall have proved or shall prove against the estate of such bankrupt or insolvent contributory in respect of any debt due from the company, then the dividends received by the official manager from the estate of such bankrupt or insolvent contributory shall be paid and distributed by the official manager, under the direction of the Master, in the first instance, rateably amongst the creditors of the company so proving against the estate of such bankrupt or insolvent contributory as aforesaid, until the debts due to such creditors respectively be fully paid, and, subject thereto, such dividends shall be applied by the official managers towards the general purposes of the winding up of the affairs of the company. Provided also, that in case any such fiat shall have been issued on the petition of a joint creditor of the said company in respect of his joint debt, and he shall have proved such joint debt for the purpose of receiving dividends under such fiat, then any dividends paid to such petitioning creditor under such proof shall be set against the dividends payable to such official manager in respect of the proof so made by him as aforesaid, so far as the same will extend." It is difficult to surmount these words, but it has been contended that this Act does not apply to a case of this description, where the bankruptcy has taken place before the winding-up order. As I have already said, the word "is" cannot be construed literally; it means "shall be," or, "may happen to be." According to the construction offered on the part of the assignees, the word ought to be rather "becomes." The bankruptcy did not relieve this gentleman from his liabilities; he was as liable at the moment of the winding-up order as ever, and so is his estate now. He was liable because he had no certificate. The estate is liable because it was liable before bankruptcy. This Act clearly changes the law of the country as to particular persons under circumstances which I do not understand, but our business is to construe. I fear the rights of these persons are changed by the legislature. The latter clauses are, perhaps, locus communis, and afford an argument each way, but the argument preponderates in favour of the view taken by the official manager. It is true they are not provisions which seem to me well or correctly adapted to any theory or any practice that ever prevailed in the country, but it is very unsafe to rely on such words as contravene language so clear as the provisions of these sections. I feel myself, therefore, obliged to say with regret, that this demand has been directed by the law of the country to come in competition with the separate creditors, so that they are placed in a different position from any other separate creditors.

Lord Justice LORD CRANWORTH.—I concur in arriving at the same result, and with the same degree of regret. Whatever the date of the bankruptcy, there is the same anomaly, if the separate creditors are put on a different footing from that in which they would have stood if the Act had not passed. It is difficult to believe the Legislature intended to put them in a different position, but it is our duty to consider the language of the Act, which we cannot construe in any other way

Lord Justice KNIGHT BRUCE.—I had omitted to observe, that during the argument, I was under the impression that this result might have been avoided by adopting a limited construction of the word "balance," but as it proceeded I was convinced that this was impossible.

Production of documents—Privileged communication.

A. and B. having substantially a common cause of action against C. brought separate actions against him, which were still pending. A. took the opinion of counsel as to the claim against C. and gave a copy of the case and opinion to B. C. filed a bill of discovery against B. who by answer admitted the possession of this copy among other documents, but claimed a right to withhold it on the ground of its being privileged :

Held, affirming the decision of the Court below made on a motion for the production of documents, that the copy of the case and opinion was privileged.

This was an appeal from the decision of Vice-Chancellor Parker, who, on a motion by the plaintiff for the production of documents, held a case and opinion of counsel given by two ladies of the name of Hoyle to the defendants Messrs. Cobb, to be privileged. The facts are fully stated in the judgment and in 19 Law T. Rep. 243.

Lord Justice KNIGHT BRUCE.—The opinion of counsel was taken by ladies of the name of Hoyle, who claimed to be creditors of a person of the name of Enthoven. They had sued him at law, and obtained, as I understand, a verdict against him, the effect of which is suspended by a bill of exceptions before the House of Lords, so the possible effect might be a venire de novo, in which the whole matter in dispute would have to be tried again. It appears that Messrs. Cobb, who were the defendants on the record, also claimed to be creditors of Mr. Enthoven, the same gentleman, and are suing or intended to sue him at law. In aid of the defence for the purpose of discovery, this bill is filed. But the circumstances under which the Messrs. Cobb claimed to become creditors, is, if not identical with those under which the ladies claim to be creditors, very similar, and connected with them, as I understand, so much so, that the ladies have, through their solicitor, taken the opinion of counsel, and communicated that case and that opinion to the solicitor of Messrs. Cobb, as having a common cause substantially with him against Mr. Enthoven, the common object of pursuit. Now the first question is, for what purpose and with what view, on the materials before us, we ought to infer that the case and opinion were communicated with permission to copy them? In my opinion, the first and unavoidable inference is, that the communication was not only not made with the view of allowing unlimited publication and use, but made in confidence, and for limited and restricted use for assisting him in that claim, which was to all intents and purposes common with that of the ladies, whose solicitor lent it. I infer, therefore, and from the materials before the Court believe, that it would be an unjust and unlawful act on the part of the present defendants, to allow that case, or that opinion, or copy of opinion, to be published or even to be communicated by any means, except for the purpose of defence. The ladies have had and still maintain a material interest in this document, the production of which is sought by their adversary. Without entering into other questions which have been properly and ably urged in support of this motion, it is sufficient for me to be satisfied that the interest of the ladies, and their rights in these documents, require that their use should be limited to purposes for which they were communicated, and are of themselves sufficient to preclude the plaintiff from demanding the production of the documents. I agree entirely in the view taken by the Vice-Chancellor; the motion, therefore, must be dismissed, with costs.

Lord Justice Lord CRANWORTH concurred, and observed that the case was beside all the cases cited. In those cases the question had been between the plaintiff and defendant, in this case the defendants had no right as between themselves and third persons to produce the document.

ROLLS COURT.

Reported by J. MACAULAY, Esq. of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law.

March 19 and 22, and April 19.

BELL v. THE LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Chose in action—Assignment in equity—Consent of debtor—Notice—Evidence—Agent.

J. B. a railway contractor, being in want of money to carry out his contract, entered into arrangement with a bank whereby they allowed him to draw on them to a certain amount on condition of his giving an order to the railway company to pay over to them the moneys which from time to time became payable to him under the terms of the contract, as the works advanced. J. B. accordingly wrote and delivered to the bank a letter, in which he simply directed the railway company "to pay into the bank to the account of J. B. such sums as might become due in respect to his contract." This letter the bank sent the next day to the railway company, requesting that it should be acknowledged, and it was so in due course, and the payments were afterwards made into the bank by the company. J. B. then entered into a second contract with the same railway company, and they on that occasion wrote to the bank to inquire whether they required the payments as they became due under that contract to be made to them, and they replied they did not. The secretary of the company also observed in the letter that he presumed any money coming otherwise than as by Contract No. 1 could be paid in any way J. B. wished, and the reply was in the affirmative. J. B. became bankrupt, being indebted in a large sum to the bank. No notice of the arrangement between J. B. and the bank, nor any communication, other than the letters, was given or made to the company:

Held, that the order given by J. B. did not amount to an assignment in equity of the sums due to J. B. from the company, and that the subsequent letter from the company to the bank did not alter the construction of that order, and could not be treated as an admission by the company that they had ascertained that the moneys due under Contract No. 1 had been irrevocably assigned.

This was a suit by the National Provincial Bank of England by Robert Bell, their public officer, against the North Western Railway Company, Edward William Watkin, and others, for an account of certain moneys alleged to have been improperly paid by the company to Thomas Burden, a contractor for the execution of certain works of the company. On the 12th of December, 1846, Mr. Burden entered into a contract with the company for the construction of a branch line from Rugby to Peterborough and Stamford for 107,860*l*. one of the terms of the contract being that the company should pay at the end of each month for nine-tenths of the work certified by their engineer to have been completed, and that the other one-tenth should be reserved till the expiration of one twelvemonth after the whole contract was completed, during which period Mr. Burden was to keep the line in repair. Mr. Burden being in want of money to carry on the works applied to the company for an advance of 10,000*l*. but his application was not acceded to; and in March, 1847, he applied to the bank to advance him money to enable him to carry out the contract, and they agreed to allow him to draw upon them to the amount of 4,000*l*. on his giving an order on the railway company to pay into the bank to his account the moneys by instalments as they became due under the contract. On the 29th of March Mr. Burden accordingly wrote and delivered to the bank a letter addressed to the company, in which he simply directed the company to pay into the bank to the account of Thomas Burden, such sums of money as might become due on the contract. This letter the bank the next day (8th March) forwarded to the company with a request that it should be acknowledged, which was done the following day by Mr. Watkin, the secretary of the company, and payment of subsequent instalments was made by the company to the bank.

At the time the order was given, however, to pay to the bank, no money was due from the company to Burden, and there was no evidence that any communication, either verbal or written, was made by the bank to the company of the arrangement between Burden and the bank, or that there existed any arrangement whereby Burden was prevented from paying the money to any other party if he so thought fit. The letter of Burden was relied upon as itself sufficient evidence of the arrangement, but it was perfectly consistent with that letter that the bank should only have been constituted Burden's agent instead of equitable assignee. Subsequently, however, Mr. Burden entered into a second contract with the company, which was called Contract No. 2, as the first was called Contract No. 1, for the construction of another portion of the line; but the agreement between Burden and the bank related only to Contract No. 1. Contract No. 2 having been entered into, the secretary of the company, Mr. Watkin, wrote a letter, dated 8th July, 1847, to the bank, to inquire whether they required the payments becoming due to Mr. Burden under Contract No. 2 to be made to them, and the reply was, that they did not. Mr. Watkin, also, in the letter of the 8th of July to the bank, "presumed that any money coming otherwise than as by Contract No. 1, could be paid in any way Mr. Burden wished." Under the agreement with the bank, Mr. Burden overdrew his account to the amount of upwards of 4,000*l*. and getting into difficulties, he applied to the company to advance him 10,000*l*. which they refused to do, but through their engineer, Mr. Liddell, offered to pay him a week's amount of wages and materials, which offer, after some remonstrances, he accepted.

In September 1847 the works were stopped, and the company took them into their own hands, in consequence of Mr. Burden not being able to carry them on; and in December following Mr. Burden became bankrupt, and a large sum being claimed from the company by his assignees, the claim was referred to arbitration, and the sum of 4,000*l*. was awarded to be paid by the company. This sum the plaintiff, on behalf of the bank, insisted ought to have been paid to him under the arrangement as to sums payable under contract No. 1, but this being resisted by the assignees, the plaintiff filed his bill on behalf of the banking co-partnership, and now asked a declaration by the Court that the bank was entitled to a charge on him on all moneys which became due to Thomas Burden, not exceeding the sum of 4,000*l*. in respect of the contract No. 1. This claim they based upon the letters of March and July 1847, contending that the railway company had thereby constructive notice of the arrangement between Burden and the bank, and that formal notice was not necessary; and they insisted that the letters amounted to an equitable assignment to them of the debt.

R. Palmer and Cairns, for the bank, contended that the letter of the 8th of July from Mr. Watkin to the bank was a clear admission that the company had notice of the arrangement. They cited Tibbits v. George, 5 Ad. & Ell. 107; Smith v. Smith, 2 Cr. & M. 231; Gardner v. Lachlan, 4 Myl. & Cr. 129; Burn v. Carvalho, 7 Sim. 109; Lett v. Morris, 4 Sim. 607.

Roupell and Speed, contrà.

R. Palmer, in reply.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—The plaintiff, Robert Bell, is the public officer of the National Provincial Bank of England, suing on behalf of the co-partnership of that bank; and the defendants are the North Western Railway Company, Edward William Watkin, and others. The object is to make the railway company account to the bank for sums of money alleged to have been improperly paid by them to Thomas Burden. It appears that on the 12th of December, 1846, Mr. Burden, who was a railway contractor, entered into a contract with the company for the construction of a branch line from Rugby to Peterborough and Stamford for 107,660*l*.; the company agreeing to pay at the end of each month for nine-tenths of the work certified by their engineer to have been completed, the other tenth being reserved by them till the expiration of one twelvemonth after the completion of the contract, Mr. Burden undertaking to keep the line in repair for that period. In March, 1847, Mr. Burden applied to the bank to advance him money to enable him to carry out the contract, and an agreement was come to between him and the bank, they allowing him to draw upon them to the amount of 4,000*l*. on condition of his giving an order to the railway company to pay the money as it became due to him under the contract No. 1, into the bank to his account. Burden gave the order accordingly, on the 29th of March, 1847, to the bank, who sent it on the 30th to the railway company, with a request that it should be acknowledged, which was done the following day by their secretary, and payments were afterwards made by them to the bank. Mr. Burden then entered into contract No. 2 with the railway company, for constructing another portion of the line; but the agreement with the bank related only to contract No. 1, for, on the 8th of July, 1847, when Mr. Watkin, the secretary, wrote to them to inquire whether they required the payments due to Mr. Burden, under contract No. 2, to be paid over to them; they replied they did not claim anything under that contract. During the year 1847, Mr. Burden fell into difficulties, and applied to the defendants to advance him 10,000*l*. which they refused to do, but offered through Mr. Liddell, their engineer, to pay a week's amount of wages and materials, to which Mr. Burden, after remonstrating, consented. In September 1847, the works were stopped, the company taking them into their own hands, and in December following, Mr. Burden became bankrupt, and a large sum was claimed from the defendants by his assignees, and upon the claim being referred to arbitration, 4,000*l*. were awarded to be paid by the defendants, which sum the plaintiff, on behalf of the bank, insisted ought to have been paid to them, under the contract No. 1. The first question I have to consider is, whether the letter of the 29th of March, 1847, written by Burden, and sent by the bank to the railway company, was such an assignment of all Mr. Burden's interest in the payments to become due to him as the Court could carry out against the defendants; second, whether any notice was given to the defendants of that assignment, and if so, whether that would be in favour of the plaintiff; and third, whether the sums allowed were or not proper sums. That, if necessary to be considered, would be the subject of reference to the Master. First, then, as to the question of assignment. As to this there is no difficulty in the principles of law in such a case, but there is some difficulty as to the facts, and the application of the principles of law to those facts. That a debt or chose in action may be assigned in equity without the consent of the debtor is a well-established rule in law, and does the present case come under that law? The letter of Mr. Burden was simply to direct the railway company to pay into the bank to the account of Thomas Burden such sums as might become due in respect to contract No. 1. At the time this order was given no money was due from the company to Burden, and it was not proved that any communication, either verbal or written, was made by the bank to the defendants of any such arrangement, or that any arrangement had been made by which Burden was prevented from directing the money to be paid to any other party if he thought fit to do so. The letter seemed merely to constitute the bank the agent of Burden. If the matter had depended solely on Mr. Burden's letter I should have considered that the plaintiff had failed in making out his case, but Mr. Watkin, the secretary to the railway company, had written, in a letter of the 8th of July, 1847, directed to the bank, that he presumed any money coming otherwise than as by contract No. 1, could be paid in any way Mr. Burden wished. If that expression was to be treated as an admission by the railway company, that Burden's letter was or ought to be treated as an assignment to the bank of the moneys becoming due to him under contract No. 1, it would be difficult to get over such an admission. The bank wrote in reply to Mr. Watkin on the following morning, that any money which was due to Burden under any contract except No. 1, might be paid to him. No notice, however, was given by the bank to the railway company of any arrangement with Burden. But it was said that this letter was binding on the company. Unless, however, the first letter was to be treated as an admission by the respondent that an assignment had been made which was binding on them to pay all moneys due under contract No. 1 to the bank, the second letter of 9th July could not be treated as binding in any way upon the company. Upon the best consideration I have been able to give the case, after some hesitation I am of opinion that Mr. Watkin's letter, although it has caused considerable trouble in my mind, cannot vary the previous order of March 1847; and that if that order did not amount to an assignment, the subsequent letter could not alter its construction, and could not be treated as an admission by the railway company that they had ascertained that the moneys due under contract No. 1 had been ever in reality assigned. The burden of proof lay upon the plaintiff, who was bound to make out an assignment of all moneys due to Burden under contract No. 1; and that notice of that fact had been given to the defendants. No evidence has been given of any assignment nor of the communication of such an assignment to the railway company, and therefore the bill must be dismissed; but taking into consideration the letter of July 1847, it must be without costs. The assignees of Burden to have their costs out of the estate.

PADWICK v. STANLEY.

Bill for account—Complication of accounts.

P. had advanced to S. various sums of money, and had procured other moneys for him upon bills and other securities, upon which P. was liable; the documents necessary satisfactorily to shew the accounts between the parties, were in the possession of S. P. filed a bill for an account and for discovery, and praying that the bills and other securities might be paid off, and P. discharged from his liability. S. demurred to the bill, and it was Held, that the accounts were not of such a nature as entitled the plaintiff to relief, whatever might have been the event of the suit, had discovery alone been prayed. A very strong case of entanglement must be made out to induce a Court of Equity to interfere where receipts have been all on one side, if even that alone constitutes a ground of such intervention.

The bill in this case was filed by Mr. Padwick against Sir —— Stanley, bart. stating that the plaintiff had been the solicitor of the defendant, and had been employed to raise money for him, and that he had himself advanced money to the defendant; that he had procured divers persons to advance moneys to the defendant on bills of exchange and promissory notes, and that he the defendant was also liable, and that such bills and notes were then outstanding; but the accounts extended over a very considerable space of time, and were in their nature and details very complicated, and that it would be highly inconvenient, if not impossible, to take such accounts at law: that the plaintiff had given and delivered to the defendant the accounts and papers relating to these transactions, and had written various letters to him thereupon, of divers of which letters, accounts, and papers the plaintiff had not preserved any copies. The prayer of the bill was, that the defendant might render an account, or might furnish the plaintiff with such accounts, papers, and letters as would enable him to make them out, and that all accounts between the parties might be taken in this Court, and that the defendant might be decreed to pay off the bills and notes, and discharge the plaintiff from his liability, and for discovery. The defendant put in a demurrer for want of equity.

Stuart and Bates for the defendant. This is a case for a settlement between these parties at law, and no case for the intervention of this Court. There are no mutual accounts; all the payments are, as the bill itself shews, on one side; and, besides, that the plaintiff was the solicitor for the defendant, and as such it was his business to keep accounts, and not having so done, he has no title to call on the defendant to furnish or help to furnish them. His remedy is at law. (Dinwiddie v. Bailey, 6 Ves. 136; Alison v. Herring, 9 Sim. 583.)

Rolt and Amphlett, in support of the bill. The plaintiff is a party for the defendant, being a party to, and liable on the bills and notes, and, therefore, on the authority of Antrobus v. Davidson, 8 Mer. 569, the case can be supported. Beyond that the bill is one for an account, which accounts are complicated, and although those accounts are not mutual, still a bill will lie. (O'Mahony v. Dixon, 2 Sel. and Laf. 400; North-Eastern Railway v. Martin, 2 Phil. 78; Pierce v. Creswick, 2 Hare, 286; Taff Vale Railway v. Nixon, 1 Ho. of Lords cases, 111; and Foley v. Hill, 2 ibid. 28.) The cases, in the House of Lords especially, shew that the idea of the necessity of accounts being mutual to sustain a bill is greatly weakened. Still, further, there is a third reason for the bill being supported, namely, that the accounts are accounts between principal and agent; and if it had been that the plaintiff had been the principal, no question could have been raised. (M'Kenzie v. Johnstone, 4 Madd. 375.) This Court will exercise the concurrent jurisdiction which it has with courts of law, by granting relief, it having, by means of its power of compelling discovery, and for which discovery the plaintiff has been forced to come, full possession of the case.

Stuart was not called on to reply.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—This demurrer must be allowed. The first ground on which it has been sought to support the bill is the right which the surety has to have himself discharged from his liability. I should be sorry to say anything likely to prejudice such right; but the jurisdiction of the Court is exercised only when creditors have a right to sue a debtor, and refuse to do so. It does not appear by this record that the creditor has any present right to sue. The statements in the bill must be taken most strongly against the pleader, and it is consistent with those statements that the bills may not yet have arrived at maturity. As a bill for an account it is sought to be supported,—firstly, on the ground that the accounts are complicated. I have expressed my opinion in a very recent case (Phillip v. Phillip, 9 Hare, 473) on the nature of the accounts which would give this Court jurisdiction. I take the rule to be that a bill of this nature will lie only where it relates to that which is the subject of a mutual account, and I understand a mutual account to mean not merely where one of two parties has received money and paid it on account of the other; but where each of two parties has received and paid on the other's account, I take the reason of that distinction to be that in the case of proceedings at law, where each of two parties has received and paid on account of the other, what would be to be recovered would be the balance of the two accounts; and the party plaintiff would be required to prove not merely that the other party had received money on his account, but also to enter into evidence of his own receipts and payments, a position of the case which, to say the least, would be difficult to be dealt with at law. I think that in order to support a bill for an account there must be mutual receipts and payments to give the Court jurisdiction. I will not say that there can be no case of complicated accounts which would give concurrent jurisdiction, but all such cases must depend on their own particular circumstances; I think no such case is made out here. The time may come when all accounts of this sort will come to one court; perhaps such a state of things would be most desirable, but we have not yet arrived at that. Next it was said that this was a case of agent and principal, and that if the principal might file a bill against the agent, the agent might do so against the principal, but I do not think there is any such mutuality in the relation of principal and agent. The right of the principal rests upon the trust reposed in the agent, but the agent reposes no such trust in the principal. It was lastly said that the accounts have been given up, but if such a case were sufficiently made out, it would only give a right to discovery, for which the plaintiff might file his bill, but such a case would give him no right to relief. The demurrer, as I have said, must be allowed, but the plaintiff is to have liberty to amend, if he can make out his case of surety and principal.

V. C. PARKER'S COURT.

HEWARD v. WHEATLEY.

7 Geo. 4, c. 46—Deceased partner.

In a suit for the administration of the estate of A. B. deceased, a decree was made referring it to the Master to take the accounts. A. B. had been a partner in a joint-stock banking company. C. D. a creditor of the company, petitioned for leave to go in under the decree to prove his debt, but the Court dismissed the petition, as it was not shewn that the liability could not be satisfied by proceedings against the present members of the partnership.

This was a petition by George Wilson, praying that he might be at liberty to go in before the Master, to whom, by a decree in this cause, a reference had been made, and prove as a creditor of Joseph Elder, the testator in the cause, for the sum of 5,958*l.* 16s. 8d. the balance remaining due for principal on his debt, together with interest thereon at five per cent. from the 3rd of April, 1849. Joseph Elder was in his life-time, and up to the time of his death, a member of the Newcastle, Shields, and Sunderland Union Joint Stock Banking Company, which was a banking partnership, carrying on business under the provisions of the 7 Geo. 4, c. 46. On the 3rd of April, 1847, upon a deposit of money by George Wilson, the petitioner, with the bank, the bank gave him an accountable receipt, carrying interest at five per cent. per annum. The testator was at this time a partner in the bank, and he continued so until his death, which happened on the 8th of December, 1847. On the 9th of April, 1848, the petitioner recovered judgment against the public officer of the company for 5,958*l.* 16s. 8d. In the present suit, which was for the administration of the testator's estate, a decree was made on the 22nd of December, 1848, directing the usual accounts of the testator's personal estate and debts, and it was for permission to go in under this decree that the petition was presented.

Malins, in reply.

Monday, May 24.—The VICE-CHANCELLOR (after stating the facts) said that independently of the statute (7 Geo. 4, c. 46) the case would admit of no doubt. On the death of the testator his liability on the contract would have ceased, though his assets would have continued liable in equity. In this case, however, the liabilities were regulated by the statute of the 7 Geo. 4, c. 46. The courts of law and equity had found a difficulty in acting on that statute, and its enactments were found to be inconsistent with each other, and not entirely intelligible. The first section appeared to create a several liability on the part of the members to pay all bills and notes issued by the company, and all sums borrowed and owed by the company, and it had frequently been noticed that this clause extended the ordinary liability, and included various classes of members of the company. There was nothing to take away the liability which in equity would attach to the assets of a deceased partner, who was party to the contract as the testator was in this case. The 11th section related to decrees of courts of equity obtained against the public officer. His Honour noticed that, because it was difficult to reconcile the provisions as to decrees in equity with those as to judgments at law. A decree of this Court might be a simple order to pay money, as simple as a judgment of a court of law. By the 11th section a decree for payment of money is to be enforced against every or any member of such co-partnership in the same manner as if they were parties before the Court. The very special provisions of the 13th section were not to be found in this 11th section, as applicable to a decree which was to result in the payment of money. The 13th section provided the means of enforcing judgments at law. The 11th section appeared to give a judgment the same effect as a decree in the Court of Equity against the public officer of the company. The 13th section contained most important provisions applicable to the mode of enforcing execution upon a judgment against the public officer at common law. By that section, execution was first to be issued against any member or members for the time being of the co-partnership, and the Court of Ex. in the case of Dodgson v. Scott, 2 Ex. 157, decided that "the time being" meant the time of the execution. Execution must first be issued against the persons who were members of the partnership at the time of the execution, and in case that should be ineffectual for the purpose of obtaining satisfaction, then execution might be issued against certain persons who had ceased to be members before that time. This section provided only the mode of issuing execution against those persons who were liable at law. If the assets were liable in equity only, this clause contained no means by which that liability might be enforced. It appeared to his Honour that it did not follow that there was to be no liability in equity. The state of the law and the previous sections of the Act appeared to shew that there was to be a liability in equity, and if that were so, that liability must be enforced according to the ordinary principles of this court, because there was nothing about it in the clause pointing out how a judgment at common law was to be enforced against the parties equally liable in asserting an equitable liability against the assets of a deceased partner: however, he thought that regard must be had to those provisions of the Act which would have been applicable if it had been a legal liability, according to the view taken by Lord Langdale in the case of Barker v. Buttress. One of the most material provisions of the 13th section of the Act was that a creditor of the partnership was in the first instance to issue execution against the members for the time being, and only in the case that execution proved insufficient was execution to be issued against other parties. The reason of that was very obvious: the members for the time being were those who had control over the assets of the partnership, and those who had ceased to be partners had no such control. The object was to provide a mode of first rendering liable the funds of the partnership which were primarily liable to pay the debt, by issuing execution against those who had the control over those funds in the first instance, and execution was not to go against those who had no control over the funds until the others had been found not to be available. The present was an application to enforce the equitable liabilities of a deceased partner in the same way as if he had ceased to be a member by a transfer of his interest, and therefore it appeared to his Honour that the parties must first shew that the liability could not be satisfied by proceedings against those who were members of the partnership at the time. In the present case no such statement was made: there was no statement that the bank had ceased to carry on business, or that there had been any attempt to enforce judgment against those who were primarily liable, and therefore they had not made out their case to reach those who were liable in the second degree. There must be no order, but the statute was so difficult, that he thought it was not a case for costs.

NEDBY v. NEDBY.

Appointment by wife in her husband's favour—Fraud—Practice.

A wife having by deed duly executed appointed, in her husband's favour, certain property over which she had a power of appointment, it was held that the deed must be held valid, unless it were proved to be otherwise.

A deed of gift by a wife in favour of her husband was drawn by the husband's solicitor, and executed by her in the presence of two of the solicitor's clerks, without the same having been read over to her, and according to the evidence of one of the attesting witnesses, she was agitated and distressed, and signed it in a reluctant manner:

Held, that these circumstances were not sufficient to invalidate the deed.

James Keegan, by his will dated the 1st of July, 1820, bequeathed his personal estate to W. Nedby and Thomas Anns, upon trust to sell, to invest the produce, and to pay one-half of the income to his wife for her life for her separate use: the testator then proceeded, "and my will and meaning is, that my wife shall have full power by any will, testament, or instrument in writing to be by her duly executed to bequeath and dispose of one half moiety of the moneys so to be invested by my said executors and trustees, in manner and for the purposes aforesaid." The testator appointed W. Nedby, T. Anns, and his wife executors and executrix of his will. On the 7th of July, 1820, the testator died, and on the 7th of October in the same year, Mrs. Keegan, his widow, married William Nedby. By an indenture dated the 9th of January, 1821, Mrs. Nedby, in consideration of love and affection for her husband, granted and assigned to him one half part of the personal estate of James Keegan, deceased, bequeathed to her. In August, 1836, William Nedby and his wife separated, and in September in that year, Mrs. Nedby instituted a suit against her husband, and the other persons interested, for the administration of J. Keegan's estate. By the bill, it was stated that W. Nedby claimed to be entitled to the plaintiff's share of the estate under an indenture; but it was charged that the plaintiff never executed any such indenture, or that if she executed the same, she did so in ignorance of its contents and purport, and without professional advice or assistance, and upon the faith of a representation made to her by the said W. Nedby, under whose influence she was; that the execution of such indenture was merely intended to facilitate the proving of the will and the due administration of the estate of the testator, and that she was deceived and imposed upon in respect thereof, and that such indenture ought to be held fraudulent and void as against her; and it was prayed that it might be declared that the indenture, if any, was fraudulent and void. By his answer, W. Nedby stated the indenture, and that it had been prepared by Mr. Vincent, who had acted as solicitor on behalf of the plaintiff, and that the deed had been executed by her at Mr. Vincent's office. At the hearing of the cause in November 1841, it was referred to the Master to inquire whether the indenture in question was ever, and when, executed by the plaintiff, and under what circumstances. By his report, the Master found that the deed had been prepared by Mr. Vincent, who was then, and had previously been, Mr. Nedby's solicitor, and that it was executed by the plaintiff at ... the presence of Williams and Beale, two of Mr. Vincent's clerks; that the deed was not read over to her at the time of the execution, and that, except as aforesaid, he was unable to state the circumstances under which the deed was executed, no sufficient evidence having been laid before him. In his affidavit, in the inquiry before the Master, Williams, one of the attesting witnesses, stated that at the time of executing the deed, the plaintiff "was agitated and distressed, and that she signed it in a reluctant manner, with a dash of the pen." No exceptions were taken to the Master's report, and the cause now came on for further directions, Mr. and Mrs. Nedby having died, and the suit having been revived.

Glasse and Greene appeared for the plaintiff; and upon their proposing to read Williams's affidavit, Wigram and Hoare, for the representatives of Mr. Nedby, objected.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that the plaintiff was at liberty to give any information to the Court as to the materials used before the Master, and, therefore, the affidavit might be read.

Glasse, in reply.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said, that in this case Mrs. Nedby had made an appointment under a power, in favour of her husband, and the Court had thought it right, under the circumstances, to direct an inquiry whether the deed of the 9th of January, 1821, the appointment in question, was executed by her, and under what circumstances. The Master had made his report, containing nothing very material or decisive with respect to the circumstances, and that gave rise to the question on which side was the burden of proving the appointment valid or invalid; whether, unless the husband could shew that the circumstances were such that the appointment ought to be supported, it would be void; or whether, unless the wife could shew that the circumstances were such as ought to invalidate it, it would be good. The wife was put by the instrument which created the power in the position of a feme sole with respect to the particular subject thereof. She had a good power of appointment, the protection to her being that the act of appointment was to be by an instrument duly executed, so that she had whatever protection that might afford. His Honour thought, that, on all the principles governing the Court, he was bound to consider the appointment good, unless those claiming against it could produce sufficient matter to invalidate it. No doubt the Court regarded such transactions with jealousy, and considered it right to inquire into them, as in the case of Grigby v. Cox. Then, what were the circumstances in this case? The Master had found in substance that the deed was prepared by the husband's solicitor, and was executed by the wife in the presence of two of the clerks of that solicitor, and was not read over to her. All these circumstances constant[ly oc]curred in perfectly proper transactions, and it would be a dangerous thing to say that the deed could not be supported merely on those grounds. The only other circumstance on which the Court was asked to set aside this deed was, that one of the attesting witnesses said that she signed it with agitation and reluctance. It was impossible to act upon that as a ground for setting aside the deed. The costs of the general administration must come out of the entirety, except so far as they were increased by the inquiry as to the validity of the deed, which must come out of Mrs. Nedby's moiety.

VICE-CHANCELLOR KINDERSLEY'S COURT.

Reported by W. H. BENNET, Esq. of Lincoln's-inn, Barrister-at-Law.

June 9 and 10.

BODENHAM v. HOSKINS.

Breach of trust—Banker and customer—Marked fund—Receiver.

The general rule is, that in a naked case of banker and customer, bankers need not inquire upon what account moneys are paid in or drawn out, and such cheques as the customer may think fit to draw on the bank the bankers are bound to honour.

But, where three accounts had been opened by a customer with his bankers, one of which was called the "Rotherwas estate account," and which was opened by such customer as the receiver of the rents of an estate of that name belonging to the plaintiff, the bankers are not warranted (knowing that such was a receivership account) in allowing the customer to draw cheques on that particular account to liquidate a balance due from the customer to the bankers on his "office account," and, therefore,

Held, that the customer having failed, the bankers were liable to make good to the owner of the estate the balance so allowed by them to be carried over from the "Rotherwas estate account" to the credit of the customer's private account.

This was a bill filed by the owner of an estate called the Rotherwas Estate, in the county of Hereford, against the defendants, bankers at Hereford, to charge them with a sum of 829*l.* 11s. 9d. improperly allowed by them to be drawn out of their hands by the receiver of that estate appointed by the plaintiff. The judgment of the Vice-Chancellor so fully enters into the facts and evidence in the case as to render it unnecessary further to state them.

Bethell and E. W. Collins for the plaintiff.

Stuart and W. Wright for the defendants, the bankers, contended that it was a simple case of banker and customer, and that the cheques drawn by the receiver, hereafter mentioned, they were bound to honour, and that the character of customer and banker did not exist as between them and the owner of the estate, the receiver having unlimited control over the account opened at the bankers.

Bethell in reply.

JUDGMENT.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The doubt that has from time to time crossed my mind in this case was chiefly this, whether the facts were stated in the pleadings with that degree of particularity as that I could say there had been a full opportunity for the defendants to meet those allegations of fact by the evidence which they might be able to adduce. Now that I have become more acquainted with what is contained in the pleadings, I feel myself in a condition, without waiting to look through the pleadings more in detail, to express my opinion in this case. I will first consider the case as between the plaintiff and Parkes; that is, what was the state of things as between the plaintiff and Parkes in the course of these transactions; and then consider what was the relation of the defendants, the bankers, towards Parkes in the matter, and how far the plaintiff, upon that state of things, is entitled to the decree which he asks against these defendants. Now, as between the plaintiff and Parkes, the matter seems to have stood thus,—the plaintiff was the owner of the Rotherwas estate and considerable property in the neighbourhood of Hereford; and it seems that he had employed as his solicitor and his agent and receiver a gentleman of the name of Blount. Mr. Blount being about to give up his employment, sold his business, or transferred it to Mr. Parkes, who had been previously a solicitor in London, and it was arranged between Parkes and Blount that for six months Parkes should use the name of Blount, and accordingly an account was opened by Parkes, with the concurrence of Blount, with these bankers, in the joint names of Blount and Parkes. It was intended that that should not continue longer than six months. When that account ceased,—in short, when Parkes was to use his own name exclusively in the matter, or shortly after that period, he was employed by the plaintiff as his solicitor, succeeding Blount in that employment; and shortly after that period again (all within the period of a very few months or even weeks), Parkes was employed by the plaintiff as his receiver and agent in respect of the Rotherwas estate, apparently in the same manner as Blount had been employed before. Parkes having, on the occasion of the ceasing of the account, the putting an end to the joint account in the names of Blount and Parkes with the bankers, having opened a private account of his own on the 23rd of June, 1846. When he came to be appointed the receiver of the rents and profits of the Rotherwas estate by the plaintiff, he very properly, as it appears to me, opened another account with the bankers for the purpose of placing to the credit of that account with the bankers the sums which he might receive in respect of the rents and profits of the Rotherwas estate, and drawing from the account the sums which he might have to pay on account of the Rotherwas estate, or which he might have to pay to his employer, the plaintiff. I say that that account was very properly kept separate from his own account; and, at all events, as between the plaintiff and Parkes, that account, although unquestionably it was the account of Parkes, and the bankers were to look to Parkes as the only person entitled to draw upon that account. Still I say, as between the plaintiff and Parkes, that account was opened by Parkes for the purpose of keeping in that form an account of the receipts and payments by Parkes as receiver in respect of the Rotherwas estate, and Parkes very properly entitled the account as the "Rotherwas estate account," which distinctly marked it, at all events as between him and the plaintiff, as being the account of the Rotherwas estate. How far it marked it as between Parkes and the bankers, I shall have occasion to refer to presently. I am now, as I have said, considering the case as between the plaintiff and Parkes. With regard to the third account which Parkes opened, the plaintiff had nothing to do with that, I mean that account which is called the "general account." Now, whatever balance might from time to time be standing to the credit of the Rotherwas account, it is quite clear that, as between the plaintiff and Parkes, Parkes would violate his duty if he applied any part of that balance to any purpose of his own; if, for example, he had drawn out that money and applied it to any purpose of his own, the bankers knowing nothing of the matter, still, as between Parkes and the plaintiff, it would be a gross breach of duty,—I may say, a breach of trust,—a breach of that duty which Parkes owed to the plaintiff, not to apply the moneys which should arise from the Rotherwas estate to any other purposes than the purposes of the plaintiff. When, therefore, Parkes drew the cheque on the 9th of July, 1847, for the 829*l.* and a fraction, which was then the balance standing to the credit of the Rotherwas account; when he drew that cheque in order that the proceeds of that cheque or the amount of that cheque might go towards the liquidation of the separate account of his own on which he was debtor, without at present saying how far the bankers were affected by that, as between Parkes and the plaintiff it was a breach of trust committed by Parkes as against the plaintiff; it was a fraud, in fact, committed upon the plaintiff—it was a misappropriation by Parkes of that which was, in fact, the money belonging to the plaintiff to purposes of Parkes, and not to the purposes of the plaintiff. That, I conceive, is beyond all question the condition of things, and the relation as between Parkes and the plaintiff is, and I do not understand that there is any controversy raised on that part of the case; it is stated on both sides, that whether or not the bankers have made themselves liable, that as far as Parkes is concerned, there is a great breach of duty and it was very justly made a matter of observation on the part of the defendants' counsel, that Parkes's own representations were such as to shew that he had been guilty of very great misconduct, and from that an argument was drawn, with more or less of weight, that he was not to be believed in the representations of fact which he made; but at all events I take it thus, for it is beyond all controversy that that act of Parkes was a great breach of duty towards the plaintiff, his employer. Now, as the agent or receiver of Mr. Bodenham, the plaintiff, he clearly was in one sense a trustee for him—there was a fiduciary character created between the plaintiff and Parkes. I do not know that it is very material whether this be technically called a breach of trust on the part of Parkes, but at all events it was a breach of duty which Parkes owed to the plaintiff, standing towards him in a fiduciary character in respect of the moneys which, as receiver of the Rotherwas estate, he received in respect of the rents and profits. Now, then, I approach the question as to the participation of the bankers in this misconduct of Parkes—how far the bankers (the defendants) were in any way participators in this misconduct of Parkes—participators in the act they were; but it does not follow because they were so, they were participators in the fraud of Mr. Parkes. Let us see, therefore, what was the position of the bankers in the matter. I entirely agree with many of the observations that have been made by the counsel for the defendants, that as between banker and customer, in a naked case of banker and customer, the banker looks only to the customer in respect of the account opened in that customer's name, and whatever cheques that customer chooses to draw the banker is to honour. He is not to inquire for what purpose the customer opened the account; he is not to inquire what the moneys are that are paid into that account; and he is not to inquire for what purpose moneys are drawn out of that account. That is the plain general rule as between banker and customer. But now, let us see whether that naked state of circumstances existed in the present case. Now, the first transaction or circumstance that appears important to notice first in point of date appears to be the interview which, on the 10th of June, 1846, took place between Parkes and Mr. Hamp (one of the partners) and Spozzi, a clerk or cashier of the bankers. It appears that at this time there was a considerable balance, I think somewhere about 1,200*l.* to the credit of the joint account which I have mentioned had been opened in the names of "Blount and Parkes," but the six months during which Parkes was to keep that account open, that is, to use the name of Blount, were nearly expired, and Parkes represented to the bankers, that is, represented to Mr. Hamp and Mr. Spozzi, the cashier on that occasion, that he would have occasion to draw largely for purposes of his own, and wished to know whether they would honour his cheques; that is to say, allow him to overdraw the account which he had with them. One can easily conceive there would be some hesitation in acceding to that proposal, and Mr. Hamp very fairly, I think, said, "Well, if we are to do this for you, you ought to be doing something for us, we should expect some sort of return of obligation," and whether suggested originally by the bankers, or offered by Parkes, this at least took place, that Parkes told the bankers that he would introduce to them the Rotherwas account. Now, referring to the statement in the evidence of Parkes upon this part of the case, I find that he represents it thus. After stating what I have already adverted to, which is not precisely material to the present case, the particulars of that account opened in the names of Blount and Parkes, he states this, that when that joint account was closed the balance standing to the credit of that account was transferred to the credit of his own account which he himself opened, and which I should observe was not opened until some days after this interview. It was on the 26th of June, 1846, that the private account was opened, and the interview I have adverted to was on the 10th, just before the opening of the private account, he says; he speaks of the separate account, and then goes on thus:—"The book produced and shewn to me at this, the time of my examination, marked with the letters A, B, is the pass-book, wherein such private or office account was kept by the said defendants, the bankers." Then he goes on thus:—"Before the said joint account was closed, and on or about the 10th of June, 1846, while there was a balance to the credit of the said joint account of 1,337*l.* or thereabouts, I had an interview at the defendants' banking-house, with the defendant Francis Hamp and Mr. Spozzi, the cashier of the bank, touching certain pecuniary engagements to persons in London, which I was about to be called upon to meet. The six months during which I was entitled to use the name of the said Charles Blount had then nearly elapsed, and it was consequently in contemplation to close the said joint account, and open a separate account. The object of that interview was to obtain leave from the defendants, the bankers, to overdraw my account, from time to time, as might be necessary, to the extent of about 1,500*l.* for the purpose chiefly of making certain payments in London, and also temporarily the expenses of my business in Hereford. On my making the application in question, the said Francis Hamp, in the presence of Mr. Spozzi, said that he and the said Nathaniel Morgan, 'the two partners, would assent to it, and that they would communicate with the said K. Hoskins, who would no doubt also concur in it;'" those are the three partners. "In the course of the interview, the said Francis Hamp said to me, 'I understand from Mr. Spozzi, that you intend to introduce the Rotherwas account; you ought to do something for us if we help you.'" I confess it does appear to me that the use of the word "introduce" there, which occurs more than once, is important. It is evidently not the splitting of a pre-existing account into two, for the mere convenience of the individual keeping the account; it was a holding out to the bankers, or a conception on the part of the bankers, that there was held out to shew the introduction to them, that is, the opening with them, of some account, the opening of which would of course be for their benefit. Now, whether the benefit that they were to derive from that was a benefit merely of having an additional customer, at least an additional account on which there would be generally some balance (which is always to the advantage of the banker), or whether they contemplated something beyond that,—namely, that in allowing Parkes to overdraw his account, they might appropriate the balance, which might be to the credit of the Rotherwas account to protect themselves against the loss of such balance. Whatever was the view which they had, this at all events appears to me to be clear in this transaction that the question of the opening of this Rotherwas account was mooted on this 10th of June, as the introduction to them of some account, which was to be doing something for the bankers, as the bankers were doing something for Parkes, that is, for the benefit of the bankers. Well, the witness goes on and says,

I said that I did intend to introduce that account when I became the plaintiff's receiver, and the said Francis Hamp then asked me two or three questions as to the rental of the Rotherwas estate, and the balance that would probably be kept on the account. I told him that the rental was about 6,000*l.* a year, and the balance I would keep as large as I could; that it would probably average about 1,000*l.* He then said that he was satisfied. The arrangement then entered into between the said Francis Hamp, on behalf of the defendants, the bankers, and myself, was undoubtedly that I should be allowed to overdraw my said separate account when the same was opened, if I would introduce to the bank the account of the rents of the said Rotherwas estate, so soon as under my arrangements with the said Charles Blount I became the receiver thereof. I did certainly promise the said Francis Hamp, or lead him to understand, that on my becoming such receiver I would open the last-mentioned account at the banking-house of the defendants." Now, when this evidence was read, I had not heard the pleadings, and I confess I was in some doubt, especially when I came to the evidence of the defendants, and found there was no evidence given on the subject of this interview in any way contradicting this. I doubted whether the matter had been so alleged in the pleadings as to give the defendants an opportunity of meeting it, in which case I certainly should not have come to a decision without further inquiry, either by means of an issue or referring it to the Master on the facts. But I find in substance, perhaps a little more strongly put, but in substance the same statement is contained in the bill as to what took place on the 10th of June; and when I come to the evidence given by Spozzi, who is here alleged to have been present during this matter, I do not find that Mr. Spozzi makes any attempt, or that any question is put with a view to his making an attempt to say that Mr. Parkes is not to be believed on his oath. He is a man who, by his own shewing, has been guilty of misconduct. "Believe what I tell you on the subject, and I tell you what took place is totally different from what Parkes states, and what is alleged in the bill." I see no reason, I confess, for disbelieving Parkes, whatever. I agree with Mr. Wright, that Mr. Parkes's evidence is to be looked at with great jealousy; and if I find that Parkes positively swore one way, and Spozzi positively swore the contrary, I confess I should be much more disposed to put confidence in what Mr. Spozzi stated than what Parkes stated, for the very reason that Mr. Wright has assigned, that Parkes has been guilty of misconduct in the matter, but when I find that of the two persons present during that transaction, when both sides have the opportunity, the one of examining the one, and the other of examining the other, or of each examining both, or cross-examining, if they please; when I find that one is called upon to state what took place according to his view, and the other is not called upon to state it; and when the interrogators abstain from giving him the opportunity of stating it, I do consider myself bound to believe the witness on his oath, and I see no reason for disbelieving him. Now, it does not stand only on the evidence of Parkes, for although Parkes and Spozzi were the only persons present at that interview, except Hamp, who could not, of course, be examined as a witness, we find the corroboration not of all the details of what is stated to have passed at this interview, but this corroboration of the substance of it, which goes to shew that the bankers knew this was a receivership account in respect of the rents and profits. We find, on the 26th of October, 1846, when the Rotherwas account was actually opened, another person intervened, who is examined as a witness, for the precise act of opening the account was not by Parkes himself going to the bankers, but by his sending Mr. Ward, his clerk. Now, let us see what Mr. Ward states passed between him and the bankers on that occasion. Ward states—and I have not heard a word of suggestion that Mr. Ward is not to be believed on his oath—in answer to the 20th interrogatory, he states this: after stating he was in the employ of Parkes as his clerk and bookkeeper from such a time to such a time, he says—"I was directed by Mr. Parkes, in the month of October 1846, to open an account with the house of Messrs. Hoskins and Co. of Hereford, bankers, which was then composed of Kedgwin Hoskins, Nathaniel Morgan, Francis Hamp (since deceased), and Joseph Morgan (who are named as defendants in the title to these interrogatories) for him, Mr. Parkes, in the name of the Rotherwas estate account; I accordingly attended at the bank of Messrs. Hoskins and Co. in Hereford, on the 26th of October, 1846, and opened the said account, and paid to the credit of it the sum of 700*l.* I saw Mr. Spozzi, the then manager of the bank, on that occasion, and addressed myself to him, but, to the best of my recollection, the defendant, Joseph Morgan, was in the bank, and near enough to hear what passed between Mr. Spozzi and me. I stated to Mr. Spozzi, on the last-mentioned occasion, by Mr. Parkes's directions, that the said account was to be opened under the title of the 'Rotherwas Estate Account,' and that the cheques which he (Parkes) would draw upon it, would be so endorsed as the money which would be paid in to the said account belonged to Mr. Bodenham (meaning Charles Thomas Bodenham, the plaintiff in this suit), and that he (Mr. Parkes) wished it to be kept separate from the other account which he had with the bank. The sum of 700*l.* which I paid in to the credit of the said account, consisted of rents arising from the Rotherwas estate, which had been just received by Mr. Parkes, and belonged to the plaintiff, and was, to the best of my recollection, chiefly composed of country bank notes. Mr. Parkes had, at that time, another account with the bank, entitled 'Office Account,' and which related to his business as a solicitor; and in the ensuing month of December he opened a third account." Then he goes on to describe the opening of the third account, which is not material to the present case. Nothing can be more precise and clear than this, that Parkes having sworn that on the 10th of June he had promised to introduce the Rotherwas account to these bankers as soon as he was appointed receiver, according to the arrangement with Blount, his predecessor, whatever doubt might exist as to whether Parkes accurately stated the truth when he stated that he then represented to the bankers that this was a receivership account for the purpose of keeping the account of the Rotherwas rents, and so forth,—whatever doubts, I say, might exist on Parkes's evidence, as to whether the bankers knew the nature of the account, and that, in point of fact, it was Bodenham's account—not Bodenham's account in the sense that Bodenham was to draw on it, but that the moneys belonged to the estate of Bodenham, and that it was the account of Bodenham's receiver,—whatever doubt might exist on Parkes' sevidence, here is Mr. Ward's evidence, shewing that when the account was opened at the moment when the very first sum was paid in to the credit of that account, the bankers were distinctly informed of the reason why it was kept as a separate account, why the cheques were to be entitled with the words "the Rotherwas account;" the reason was because the moneys which had been paid in to that account belonged to Mr. Bodenham, the plaintiff. It appears to me beyond all question, therefore, that from the very commencement of that account the bankers knew that the money paid in to that account were the moneys of Mr. Bodenham arising from the rents and profits of his Rotherwas estate, and that the account was kept by Parkes not as an account of his own in relation to his own moneys, which belonged to himself, but in his character of receiver to Mr. Bodenham's Rotherwas estate. Now, whether the bankers in their own minds, or even in their own books, if the fact had been so, treated the Rotherwas account as if it had been the private account of Mr. Parkes—whether they did so or not, the question is whether they had a right to do so; whether they had a right to say, knowing from the outset that the money placed to that account was Mr. Bodenham's money, and that any balance standing to the credit of that account at any time was Mr. Bodenham's balance; the question is whether they had the right to say that they would make such an arrangement with Mr. Parkes as that at any time they should be at liberty to appropriate that balance to the credit of that account towards the liquidation of the balance standing to the debit of the private account of Mr. Parkes. It appears to me that on every principle of equity they had no right to do so; it appears to me that it is not a question whether simply at the time when the cheque was drawn for the 829*l.* they had a right then to allow that cheque to be placed to the credit of the other account, the private account of Parkes; but whether they had a right ever to make an arrangement with Parkes to that effect, if the arrangement was made, or intended to be made, whether they had a right to say that the receiver should so deal with them as to make his principal's money at any time liable to be appropriated to discharge the private debt of the receiver to the bankers. I am quite satisfied that upon all principles of equity that could never be done; and this case illustrates what has often struck me as a very remarkable view of the principles of equity, that almost all the principles which are acted upon by a Court of Equity, in point of fact, are pervaded by a higher, and purer, and more exalted tone of morality than that which prevails among mankind, even among the moral portion of mankind, and I wish it to be understood that I do not think there is to be imputed to these gentlemen any design of doing that which in their minds was dishonest or improper. I believe they had no such intention. All I think that I can impute to them is, that they were not aware that according to the principles—the moral principles of a Court of Equity, and acted upon daily by a Court of Equity—a person who deals with another, which other he knows to have in his hands, or under his control, moneys belonging to a third person, cannot deal with the individual holding those moneys for his own private benefit, when the effect of that transaction is, that that person commits a fraud on a third person. That Parkes was committing a fraud in appropriating to his own purposes the money of his employer, is beyond question. The bankers did not seem to feel or be aware that they had no right, and that Parkes had no right to enter into any arrangement, the effect of which was to make the money (although Parkes was the only person who could draw on that particular account) liable to any defalcation, any deficiency that might exist upon the private account of Mr. Parkes with the bankers. Now, I do not know that in the view which I take of this case, it is necessary to consider that the bankers from time to time, in the course of the transactions, considered to be the state of circumstances. The two witnesses, Messrs. Spozzi and Fryer, labour very much, or rather the interrogatories have laboured, to bring them over and over again to repeat this, particularly in the deposition which is in answer to the 26th interrogatory, that Bodenham, the plaintiff, never told them that these were his moneys; that Bodenham, the plaintiff, never told them that this was his account; that Bodenham, the plaintiff, never claimed to have any control over that account, and so on · that is not the question. Again, it appears to me immaterial to consider, whether their suggestion is well founded, that the bankers, at the time the account was settled, treated the three accounts as the accounts of one single customer. If it were necessary to consider what is meant by that deposition, I confess I am at a loss to know what was in the mind of the witnesses when they so deposed, for the deposition amounts to this, that when the account was settled, the bankers treated and acted upon the three accounts as the account of one single customer. Now, that led me to suppose, that when I came to look at the books I should find that when the accounts were settled (which appears to have been done half-yearly or yearly) there was an amalgamation at least of the balances of these three accounts, to see what the result of the three would be. But so far from that, there is never any thing of the kind in the books. If by the term, "the time of settling the accounts," they mean the 9th of July, 1817, when two of the accounts were closed, if that is the time they mean, even then the accounts are never treated as one and the same account, or the account of one customer, any further than this, that by arrangement between them and Parkes, the balance appearing to the credit of each of the two accounts was carried to the credit of the other account (the private account) on which there was a debit, but in no other sense, at the time of the settling of any account, did the bankers treat and act upon the three accounts as the account of one and the same customer. If it be meant, as Mr. Wright says, that the accounts were kept in the name of the same individual, then it is perfectly true; but, as I observed, it is a strange mode of putting the proposition, namely, for the purpose of alleging that the accounts were headed in the name of Parkes, to put it in this shape, to say, that the bankers at the time of settling the accounts, treated and acted on the three accounts as one. It appears to me to be really immaterial what view the bankers took of it between the time when the Rotherwas account was opened and the 9th of July, 1817, when the balance of that account was transferred to the credit of the private account, because I find at the very opening of the account, nay, some months, three months at least, before the opening of that account, the bankers were well aware that that account was the account of Mr. Parkes, as receiver of the Rotherwas estate, and that the moneys which were to be paid in to the credit of the account were the moneys of Mr. Bodenham, and that it was for these very reasons that that account was to be kept as a separate account, and so headed. Well, then, I am constrained to arrive at the conclusion that the bankers, although I must exonerate them from any deliberate intention to commit a robbery or commit a fraud, that the bankers still were not only parties to the simple fact of the transfer, but were parties to the fraud in question in this sense, that they were aware of the circumstances which made it a fraud in Parkes to make the transfer to his private account, and being cognisant of that, and having been cognisant of it before that time when the account was opened under the name of "the Rotherwas account," they being cognisant of that throughout, they concur in a transaction, the effect of which is, that for their own pecuniary benefit an act was done by Parkes which is a fraud upon the plaintiff. Now, according to the plain principles of a Court of Equity such an act never can be sustained; a party cannot retain the benefit which he has derived from being a party to such an act, with such knowledge of the nature of such act. I am, therefore, under the necessity of decreeing the repayment of the 829*l.* 11s. 9d. by the defendants, the bankers, to the plaintiff. With respect to the question of interest, it appears to me that I cannot give any higher interest than the interest which the bankers allowed upon the account. If there had been no interest allowed, it does not appear to me that I could give any interest at all, but considering that this was transferring to the detriment of Mr. Bodenham from an account which was yielding interest, a sum of money which if it had still stood there would be bearing interest, I think it ought to be with interest at the same rate at which the interest was allowed by the bankers. Whether that was five per cent. I do not know, it does not appear.

COURT OF COMMON BENCH.

Reported by Daniel Thomas Evans and R. Vaughan Williams, Esqrs. Barristers-at-Law.

COUNTY COURT APPEAL.

(Before Maule, Cresswell, Williams, and Talfourd, JJ.)

The Great Western Railway Company, Appellants; Goodman, Respondent.

Railway company—Bye-laws, effect of—Liability for passengers' luggage.

By an Act of Parliament incorporating a railway company (5 & 6 Wm. 4, c. 107, s. 144), the company were empowered to make bye-laws, which, it was declared, "shall be binding upon and be observed by all parties, and shall be sufficient in all courts of law and equity to justify all persons who shall act under them, provided they be not repugnant to the laws of the realm." The company, under this authority, made certain bye-laws, amongst which was one permitting each passenger to carry a certain weight of luggage, cost free, and declaring "that the company would not be responsible for the care of luggage, unless booked, and paid for accordingly." The plaintiff having delivered her luggage, without having so booked and paid for it, to a porter in the employ of the company, with directions to him to label it for West Drayton, which he did, got into the train, and on demanding it at the place of her destination, it was not to be found, and the company admitted it to have been stolen:

Held, on appeal from the County Court, that there was a sufficient delivery to the company, and therefore, notwithstanding the bye-laws, they were, on the general law of carriers, liable for the loss.

Appeal from the Marylebone County Court of Middlesex.

The case, as stated by Mr. Amos, the judge, shewed that this was an action brought in the above-named County Court, to recover 35*l.* 14s. 3d. the amount of damage alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff, by reason of the defendants having, on the 9th day of October, 1851, received the plaintiff, as was alleged, as a passenger on the defendants' railway, to be conveyed with her luggage from Paddington to West Drayton, for hire, and through the carelessness, negligence, and default of the defendants, as was alleged, part of the plaintiff's luggage, which accompanied the plaintiff, was lost by the defendants, and had never been delivered to the plaintiff.

On the trial of the case in the said court, the following facts were proved:—

That on the 9th October last the plaintiff had travelled from Hitchin, in Hertfordshire, by the Great Northern Railway, to London, having then three articles of luggage belonging to her, consisting of one large trunk and two smaller boxes properly directed to the plaintiff's address at Uxbridge; that on her arrival at the London terminus of the Great Northern Railway she hired a cab, and had the said three articles of luggage placed on the cab, that she (and the said luggage) was driven in the cab to the station of the defendant's company at Paddington, arriving there at a little before twelve at noon; that she alighted from the cab and called a porter of the defendants' to assist in getting her said luggage down from the cab, which the said porter did. The train by which she (plaintiff) intended to travel not starting until twenty minutes before two p.m. the plaintiff desired the defendant's porter to take the said luggage into the second class waiting-room. The porter took the said articles of luggage into the waiting-room accordingly, the plaintiff herself going there with the said luggage; the porter placed the said luggage on the floor, and left the room; and the plaintiff remained in the room to take care of the same until about twenty minutes past one p.m. That the plaintiff then left the waiting-room, and took a second-class ticket from Paddington to West Drayton by the said train, which was to start at twenty minutes before two p.m., and paid the usual fare for such ticket; she then called another of the company's porters to her, and told him that she and her luggage were going to West Drayton by the said train, which was to start at twenty minutes before two p.m., and desired him to label her luggage for West Drayton by that train. That the porter then, it being about half-past one p.m., took the said three articles of luggage, and labelled each of them in the presence of the plaintiff, who proved that she saw them labelled, but did not see for what place they were labelled. That West Drayton is one of the company's stations on the company's line. That the plaintiff then left the trunk in the care of the porter, and without giving further directions, or waiting to see the said luggage put into the train, got into one of the carriages of the train, which was to start at twenty minutes before two p.m.; and the train accordingly started at twenty minutes before two p.m. and the plaintiff proceeded in the train to West Drayton. On the arrival of the train at West Drayton, plaintiff asked the guard for her luggage, but only received two of the said articles; the third, being the large trunk, which is the subject of this action, was not found, and has never been delivered to her, and it was admitted that it had been stolen. The company proved the bye-laws, of which the following is a copy, and which were duly proved at the trial. It was agreed that all the bye-laws should be considered part of the case.

"The Bye-Laws of the Great Western Railway Company.

"1. No person will be allowed to travel upon the railway without first having paid his fare and received a ticket.

"2. If any passenger shall refuse to produce or deliver up his ticket when required so to do by the conductor, guard, or other attendants on the train, he shall be chargeable with the fare for the entire journey, and shall forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding the sum of 40s.

"3. Every first-class passenger will be allowed 112 lbs. and every second-class passenger 56 lbs. of luggage free of charge; but the company will not be responsible for the care of the same unless booked and paid for accordingly; all surplus of luggage and merchandise of every description will be charged for. The company's porters will load and unload the luggage at the different stations free of charge.

"4. No dogs will be permitted to accompany passengers in the carriages, but they will be conveyed separately and charged for.

"5. No smoking will be allowed in any of the carriages or stations of the company, and any person so offending shall forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding the sum of 40s. and be liable to be removed from the company's premises or carriages.

"6. If any passenger conducts himself improperly, or shall be intoxicated to the annoyance of the passengers, or wilfully obstruct any of the company's officers in the discharge of their duty, he shall forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding the sum of 40s. and be immediately removed from the company's premises, or carriage, and shall forfeit any fare which he may have paid.

"I allow the above bye-laws,

"J. PATTESON."

A witness proved that, being desirous of insuring and booking his luggage, he endeavoured to do so a few weeks ago, when he took his place, and asked the company's servant, of whom he took his place and from whom he got a ticket, in pursuance of which he travelled by one of the company's trains from Paddington to West Drayton, to be allowed to book and insure his luggage, but the said servant of the company told him to give his luggage to the porters, and they would take care of it. He accordingly gave the luggage to one of the company's porters, who labelled it, and he left it with him without any further directions, and it was afterwards safely delivered. No evidence was given on the part of the company of any arrangements being made by them for booking the luggage of passengers, nor was the porter who labelled the missing luggage produced as a witness. The plaintiff did not book her luggage, or any part of it, or pay anything to the company in respect of it. It was contended on these facts in behalf of the defendants, the railway company, that they were not liable for the lost box on two grounds; first, that it had never been delivered in fact into the custody of the company so as to make them liable for its safe delivery at West Drayton or elsewhere; second, that the company are absolved from the liability by their bye-laws. It was admitted that the company were not in any way protected by the Carriers Act, 11 Geo. 4, and 1 Wm. 4, c. 68. The judge decided that the defendants were liable, and directed a verdict to be entered for the plaintiff, with damages, £35 14s. 3d. which was admitted to be the value of the contents of the lost box.

The question for the opinion of the Court is, whether the decision of the judge was right. If so, the verdict is to stand and remain in force; if not, it is agreed between the parties that the verdict be entered for the defendants, or a nonsuit be entered, as the Court may direct.

Willes, for the appellants.—The question is, whether railway companies are to be liable in cases of this description. There is a duty on travellers, well known to them, to take care of their luggage, and to see it placed in the luggage van of the train. The company by this appeal seek to establish as a rule that persons must take care of their luggage. Had there been a jury there would have been nothing to go before them. [MAULE, J.—You say the judge would have been bound to nonsuit?] Yes, for the facts were insufficient to maintain the action. No doubt the fact that the trunk was stolen is no ground of exemption from liability for the company. The recent gold-dust robbery case established that. Here there was no evidence of delivery to the company. [CRESSWELL, J.—After the trunk was given in charge of the railway porter,—you say that was no delivery. MAULE, J.—It is a vulgar error, no doubt.] Perhaps there was some slight evidence of delivery to the company, by reason of their bye-law, which directs that the luggage shall be given to a porter of the company to be labelled; but the same bye-law says, the company will not be responsible for the luggage unless booked and paid for accordingly. [MAULE, J.—Had the plaintiff below any need of relying on bye-laws. Is she not justified in saying (independently of the bye-laws, which say the company's porters will take the luggage) that the luggage was delivered to the company? There is not the least doubt that this is evidence of delivery. The trunk was delivered to be carried; and, independently of the general Act, the company would be liable at common law as carriers.] The Court should observe that the luggage is carried free. [MAULE, J.—Not so. The fare taken covers the conveyance of passengers and the carriage of luggage.] Yes, of a certain quantity of luggage, but not of extra luggage. [MAULE, J.—It is like the case of the bookseller who gave away the books to children, but charged them twopence each for the binding.] It is only under the bye-laws that respondent had a right to carry luggage. [CRESSWELL, J.—Is there anything in the case which shews that the plaintiff had any knowledge whatever of the bye-laws? She said to a porter, "Label my luggage;" and that is evidence of delivery.] It is straining the law too far to say that the mere labelling by a porter is delivery to the company. The bye-law referred to expressly negatives liability unless the luggage be booked and paid for accordingly. [MAULE, J.—How is that bye-law made a bye-law under which the respondent is bound?] By the company's Act, 5 & 6 Wm. 4, c. 107, sec. 144, which empowers the company to make bye-laws. It is there enacted, "that the company, at some special or general meeting, shall have full power and authority to make such bye-laws, orders, and rules as to them shall seem expedient for the good government of the affairs of the said company, and for regulating the proceedings and remunerating and reimbursing the directors, and for the management of the said undertaking, &c. and to impose and inflict such reasonable fines and forfeitures upon all persons offending against the same as to the said company shall seem meet, not exceeding 5*l*. &c. which said bye-laws, orders, and rules being reduced into writing, under the common seal of the said company, shall be painted on boards and hung up and affixed and continued on the front or other conspicuous part of the several toll-houses to be erected on the said railway, &c. and such bye-laws, orders, and rules, shall be binding upon, and be observed by, all parties, and shall be sufficient in all Courts of Law and Equity, to justify all persons who shall act under the same, provided that such bye-laws, &c. be not repugnant to the laws of this realm," &c. [MAULE, J.—Then you think the company may by a bye-law repeal the law of carriers? If a carrier undertakes to carry a passenger and trunk to West Drayton he is responsible for loss. Is it then to be said that, because the directors of the Great Western Railway chose to pass a bye-law to the effect that without insurance they will not be liable, the traveller is to lose his trunk?] I say the bye-law is binding, and to be observed by all parties. The respondent was bound to take notice of it. The case now resolves itself into two questions. First, is this a good bye-law under the general Act of Parliament. Secondly, is it binding upon the respondent? That it is a good bye-law is clear, inasmuch as it is duly made under the 144th section. [MAULE, J.—The object of the bye-law, as regards the company, was, that they should keep an insurance office by which they may profit, binding themselves with travellers if travellers please.] Then as to the next point I own I cannot see how it can be said that the bye-law is not binding upon all parties; by express words it is made so. It is found upon the case that there was no payment in respect of luggage. The respondent had therefore no right to have her luggage carried at all except under the bye-law: if she avails herself of it in part, she must be subject to the whole, and the company are not responsible to her because her luggage was not booked and paid for. Then as to notice of the bye-law, the erecting of a notice board is not a condition precedent to make the bye-law operative. If, however, the Court should consider that it is a condition precedent, then the statement in the case that the bye-laws were "duly proved," is sufficient to make them binding in this case. They are furthermore generally binding by virtue of their having been made under the direction of, and in compliance with, the statute.

T. Jones, for the respondent, was not called on.

MAULE, J.—What the Court have here to look at are the questions of fact, whether a contract was made between these parties, and if so, whether it was broken. It is enough for our decision to see that the evidence before the judge, as disclosed by the case, did not make it compulsory on him to find that the primâ facie liability of the company was rebutted: he was fully justified in taking the view of this case which he did, and in the judgment which he gave. If there had been a jury the judge would have been right in directing them to find as he has decided. Judgment will, therefore, be for the plaintiff below, with costs of appeal.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

COUNTY COURT APPEAL.

(Before MAULE, CRESSWELL, WILLIAMS, and TALFOURD, JJ.)

Tuesday, May 11.

CUTHBERTSON, Appellant, PARSONS, Respondent.

Harbour commissioners, liability of, for negligence—Reversal of judgment where not sustainable by facts.

By a local Act, which appointed commissioners for the harbour of Neath, it was provided that it should be lawful for the commissioners for the time being to build or provide steam-tugs for towing vessels into and out of the harbour, and that any person requiring the assistance of a towing vessel should pay to the commissioners such reasonable compensation as the commissioners should fix. Between the commissioners and the owners of certain steam-tugs which had theretofore plied in the said harbour, without being under the control of the commissioners, an arrangement was entered into, under which the owners bound themselves to work their boats at reduced charges, the commissioners in consideration thereof binding themselves to pay an annual sum to the owners of the boats by way of compensation for the reduction. By consent of the owners of the steam-tugs, the latter were placed under the control and superintendence of the harbour master, whose authority by the Act extended generally to the control of the vessels in the harbour. The plaintiff's vessel hav[ing] through the negligence and unskilfulness of [the] captain of a steam-tug so employed, sustained damage, he brought his plaint in the County Court against the commissioners and recovered judgment against them, the judge holding that they were responsible for the misconduct of the captain of the steam-tug:

Held, on appeal, that the judgment must be reversed: because, on no inferences of fact that could fairly be drawn from the case, could the judgment in the County Court be based, without error in law.

Appeal from decision of the judge of the County Court of Glamorganshire.

This was an action brought in the County Court of Glamorganshire, held at Neath, by the abovenamed appellant, as clerk to the Commissioners for Improving the Port and Harbour of Neath, and who is liable to be sued as the nominal defendant, on behalf of the said commissioners, in pursuance of an Act of Parliament, 7 Vict. c. 521, intituled "An Act for Improving and Maintaining the Port and Harbour of Neath, in the County of Glamorgan." The action was so brought by the respondent, as the owner of a ship called the Grace Darling, against the appellant, as such clerk, to recover damages from the said Harbour Commissioners for an injury done or occasioned to the said ship of the respondent, on the 28th of February, 1851, by the negligence, carelessness, and want of skill of certain persons alleged to be the agents and servants of the said Harbour Commissioners. The following were the particulars of the respondent's claim delivered in the said action:—The plaintiff asked to recover the following damages, as having been sustained by him, for that the Commissioners for Improving the Port or Harbour of Neath, on the 28th of February, 1851, and within the jurisdiction of this court, did, by reason of the want of proper care, skill, and diligence on the part of the said commissioners, their agents and servants, cast away the tow-rope of a certain vessel, called the Grace Darling, while in tow of the steam-tug called the Dragon Fly, and did thereby damage and injure the said vessel, called the Grace Darling, belonging to the said plaintiff, and the plaintiff was, by reason thereof, prevented for a long time from trading and carrying on his business as owner of the said vessel, and the plaintiff was also thereby subjected to the expenses of repairing the said vessel, and otherwise damnified to the plaintiff's damage of 27*l*. 6s. 9d.

Section 189 of the before-recited Act contains the following words, viz.—"And be it enacted, that it shall be lawful for the harbour-master for the time being to give directions to all or any of the following purposes, that is to say, for regulating the time and manner in which any vessel shall enter into, go out of, or lie in the limits of the said port and harbour, and the position, mooring, unmooring, placing, or removing of any vessel within the said limits; for regulating the manner in which any vessel shall take in or discharge its cargo, or any part thereof, or shall take in or deliver ballast within the limits of the said harbour; for regulating the government of any vessel within the said limits." In support of the claim for damages, the respondent adduced evidence to prove that the harbour-master would not allow the said vessel, the Grace Darling, to be taken into tow by the said steam-tug, without first taking a pilot on board, and accordingly the master of respondent's vessel took one of the pilots of the said harbour on board, who took charge of, and steered her, and that by the negligence and unskilfulness of the master of the steam-tug the Dragon Fly, in improperly casting off the tow-rope attached to the said vessel, the Grace Darling sustained the damage which was the subject of the action, and which was proved to be of the extent and amount stated in such particulars. In addition to such evidence, and in order to prove the liability of the said Harbour Commissioners for such damage, the said respondent further put in evidence certain minutes of proceedings of the said Harbour Commissioners of the 29th of April, and the 13th of May, 1844, in respect to an arrangement then entered into by them with the proprietors of the said tug-boat, for the employment of the tug-boat, in the port and harbour of Neath, and which said arrangement continued in force at the time the damage complained of was done. The following are copies of the said minutes:—

Copy of minute made on the 29th day of April, 1844:—"Your committee having given some attention to the effect of the present charges for steam towage on the trade of the port Neath, and having become aware that daily instances occur where vessels prefer waiting the chances of a fair wind to incurring the expense of steam, and the Act, clause 206, authorising the commissioners to provid[e] tugs for towing or hauling ships, [...] the commissioners to enter into an

with the proprietors of the Neath steam-tugs for the employment of their boats, at a scale of charges reduced to one half of the present rates, and that the commissioners do offer as a compensation to the proprietors of such steamer for making such a reduction in their rates the sum of 225*l.* annually, being the interest at 5*l.* per cent. on 4,500*l.* the estimated value of the boats, the proprietors to engage to provide boats or tugs equal to the works at such reduced rate, and the contract to be annual, subject to six months' notice by either party to discontinue the same.

"Your committee rely that the proposed measures will induce such an increase in the trade of this port that the receipt from shipping dues will very much approximate to the amount to be paid to the proprietors of the steam-tugs.

"Resolved, that the standing committee be authorised to treat with the Neath Steam Company, on the terms of the report."

Copy of minute made on the 13th of May, 1844:—

"Mr. Gwyn and Mr. Jonathan Rees having reported to this meeting, on behalf of the steam-tug proprietors, that they accede to the proposition made to them, respecting the employment of the Pioneer and Dragon Fly, at the harbour meeting held on the 29th of April last.

"Resolved that the agreement be confirmed."

The minute-book of proceedings of the said commissioners also set out, in several subsequent annual reports, that the arrangements made with the tug proprietors had worked most beneficially for the interest of the harbour, and that it was desirable that such arrangement should continue.

The following is a copy of one of the minutes made on the 24th of April, 1848:—

"Your committee also deem it essential to the interests of the port, that the compensation be continued to be paid to the owners of the steam-tugs, to enable the tugs to work at their present low rates of towage."

The said respondent also cited and relied on the 206th section of the said Act of Parliament, of which the following is a copy:—"And be it enacted, that it shall be lawful for the said commissioners to build or provide vessels, to be propelled by steam or otherwise, or to provide a dredge for the purpose of cleaning, scouring, and deepening the said port or harbour, or any part thereof, and also steam-tugs, for towing or hauling ships, barks, or other vessels, or rafts of timber, into or out of the said port or harbour, or for either of such purposes; and any person requiring the assistance of such towing vessel, steam-tugs, or dredges, shall pay to the said commissioners such reasonable rates or compensation for the use thereof as shall from time to time be established by the said commissioners."

It was also proved by the evidence of a proprietor of one of the steam-tugs employed in the harbour service, and who is also one of the Harbour Commissioners, and was a Harbour Commissioner when the aforesaid resolutions were passed, that the Harbour Commissioners had nothing to do with the steam-tugs up to the end of the year 1843; that the steam tugs had previously been under the management of different captains or masters; that the resolution of the Harbour Commissioners was passed in order that the tugs should be under the control of the Commissioners, with the view of controlling the dues of the harbour, and that the control of the steam-tugs was given to Captain Lowther, the harbour master, because he was the harbour master. It was contended that, by virtue of the said section of the said Act of Parliament, and on the above evidence, the said commissioners were liable for the damage occasioned to the said ship of the respondent by the negligence, carelessness, and want of skill of the master of the tug-boat.

On the part of the said commissioners evidence was adduced, but failed to prove that the injury to the respondent's ship arose from the negligence and want of skill on the part of the master and pilot of the Grace Darling. It was further proved, in order to shew that the commissioners were not liable for the damage done to the said ship, that the tug-boat Dragon Fly was the property of a private company, and not the property of the commissioners; that the proprietors of the tug-boats appointed their own collector or agent, and that they or their agent appointed or hired the master and crew of the Dragon; that such agent, master, and crew were paid their salary and wages by the proprietors of the tug-boats, and that such proprietors alone and exclusively received the proceeds arising from the towage of ships into and out of the port and harbour of Neath, and all the other earnings of the said tug boats; that the harbour-master was appointed by the proprietors of the steam tugs in the year 1843 exclusive manager of the tugs employed in the harbour service, and has continued to be so up to the present time. On the above evidence the judge of the said County Court was of opinion that the damage done to the respondent's said ship was occasioned by the negligence and want of skill of the master of the said tug-boat; and that the said commissioners, by reason of the arrangement disclosed by the said minutes of proceedings and the 206th section of the said Act of Parliament, were liable and responsible to the respondent for such damage, and he ordered judgment to be entered for the respondent for the amount claimed in his said particulars against the said commissioners. The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether, upon the evidence, and under the circumstances hereinbefore set forth, the said judgment given for the respondent was right.

Quain, for the appellant.—The question here is, whether the relation of master and servant subsisted between the proprietors of the tug-boat and the commissioners. The latter cannot be said to be in the position of a master, for they have no control over the boat; they cannot appoint or remove the officers who navigate the boat; and the sum of 225*l.* which they pay is expressly paid for the benefit of the trade of the harbour. (Reedie v. The London and North-Western Railway Company, 4 Ex. 254.) The Court here interposed and called on Baddeley, for the respondent.—There are cases where the Court will not at all interfere, and this is one of them. First, here questions of law and fact are mixed; the Court, therefore, will not interfere. It has not jurisdiction. (The East Anglian Railway Company v. Lythgoe, 20 L. J. 84, C.P.; Cawley v. Furnell, 20 L. J. 197, C.P.) Secondly, where the judgment went almost entirely on a question of fact, the Court has no jurisdiction, and will not interfere. It is so laid down in The East Anglian Railway Company v. Lythgoe (supra). Thirdly, where no jury has been summoned, and there has been a decision by the judge of the County Court on the facts, his judgment will not be interfered with, for he is like an arbitrator, to whom both law and facts are submitted. Fourthly, where the decision of the judge can be supported by any view that can be taken of the case, and it can be inferred that he has decided rightly, the Court of Appeal will not interfere. (Cawley v. Furnell, supra.) As regards the first point, the facts are jumbled together. It is not shewn whether the party who did the injury was in the employ of the commissioners. There is no clear point of law raised before the Court, but your lordships are asked to decide on the evidence and upon the facts. As to the second point, the real and material question is, whether the owners and navigators of the steam-tug were or were not the servants of the appellants in this case. The judge having determined on the question of fact, the Court cannot interfere. Taking the third point, there was no jury summoned here, but the judge was called on to decide as if he were an arbitrator between the parties; the case, therefore, fails as an appeal. Then, with regard to the fourth point; if it can be considered that the judgment is supported by the facts, the Court will not disturb it. (He referred to the 206th section of the Neath Harbour Act, and argued that the steam-tugs were pro hac vice the property of the commissioners, and therefore the latter were answerable for whatever happened in the use of them). The commissioners, instead of building steam-tugs themselves, made arrangements with persons already possessing some. They were placed under the direction of the harbour-master, who clearly is the servant of the commissioners. Suppose negligence in the employment of defective steam-tugs; the boiler bursts, or the tug sinks, carrying down with it the vessel it has in tow, who but the commissioners would be liable, who by Act of Parliament are required to provide the tugs? The Act throws on them the duty of providing steam-tugs, and compels the parties availing themselves of such aid to pay for their use; if the commissioners employ defective tugs, or negligent persons to navigate them, they are clearly liable. This point alone would entitle the plaintiff below to succeed, and it may be that the judge decided rightly and strictly according to law. (Bush v. Steinman, 1 Bos. & Pul. 405.) This was a contract made by the commissioners for their own benefit and that of the harbour.

MAULE, J.—There is no doubt at all, that if it could have been made to appear by any inference that could legitimately be drawn from the evidence, that the decision might have been in favour of the plaintiff below, without any miscarriage in law of the County Court judge; in that case the judgment could not be disturbed, notwithstanding the more probable inferences which the Court of Appeal would draw from the same, would sustain a different judgment without error in point of law. But we all feel no difficulty in saying that, drawing any inferences from the matters of fact and the evidence, as stated in the cases which could be properly drawn, the judgment could not have been arrived at without error in point of law; the Court is, therefore, justified in reversing this decision, which in this case can be done without in any way conflicting with the cases cited. Judgment reversed, with costs.

COUNTY COURT APPEAL.

KELLY, Appellant; WEBSTER, respondent.

Statute of Frauds, 29 Car. 2, c. 3, s. 4—Contract for sale of interest in or concerning land—Quitting possession—Partly executed contract.

The plaintiff being tenant of a house, held under an agreement with his landlord for a seven years' lease, agreed verbally with the defendant to give him immediate possession of it, together with certain fixtures therein and improvements made on the premises by the plaintiff; and the defendant, in consideration of the foregoing, agreed to pay plaintiff 100l. The landlord assented to the exchange of tenants. The plaintiff performed his part of the contract, and the defendant in part performed his by paying to the plaintiff 51l. On his refusal to pay the balance plaintiff brought his plaint to recover it:

Held, that he could not recover, this being a contract concerning an interest in land, and, therefore, void within the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds, as not being in writing.

Appeal from the County Court of Yorkshire.

This action was brought into the County Court of Yorkshire, holden at Leeds, to recover 49*l.* stated in the plaintiff's particulars of demand annexed to the summons to be due to him from the defendant for "balance due to me from you of a sum of 100*l.* in consideration of my giving up possession to you of a messuage or dwelling-house and premises, situate in Wellington-street, Leeds, on the 6th day of July, 1850, and for the valuation of certain Venetian blinds, passage lamp, and partitions therein contained, and certain paperings, painting, and other improvements made by me in the said house."

The facts as proved at the trial were that the defendant occupied as yearly tenant a house on the south side of Wellington-street, in Leeds, which he kept and used as a beer-shop. The landlord being desirous of pulling down the house, gave the defendant notice to quit it.

The plaintiff occupied as a private dwelling-house, a house on the opposite side of the street, at a rental of 36*l.* per annum, as tenant to James Holdforth, esq. under a parol agreement for a lease for seven years, commencing in July, 1849, but no lease was ever executed. In or about the month of May, 1850, the plaintiff being desirous to quit the last-mentioned house, the defendant applied to the plaintiff to let him have the same. The plaintiff thereupon wrote to Mr. Holdforth, the owner of the house, the following letter:—

"14, Wellington-street, 6th May, 1850. To James Holdforth, esq. Dear sir,—From unforeseen circumstances, I find I shall be obliged to remove to Kirkstall, to take management of our mill, much against my inclination. I have shown the house to three or four different parties, and all complain both of the rent for the situation, and very noisy. It is my opinion that it will answer your purpose better to let it as an inn, and I think the bearer would give perhaps 50*l.* or more if tried. If you think proper to accept him as tenant, please to say so, that I can make arrangements accordingly, as I find he wishes to enter to it in three weeks' time. I can only add my sorrow for leaving it after getting it into such nice order, and laying out what I have done in it.—I am, dear sir, yours respectfully, S. P. WEBSTER."

The defendant applied to Mr. Holdforth to let him the house to be used by him for the purposes of a beer-shop, and as Mr. Holdforth appeared to have no objection to do so on certain terms, a verbal agreement was, after some negotiations, come to between the plaintiff and defendant on the 4th day of July, 1850, that the defendant should pay to plaintiff the sum of 100*l.* in consideration that the plaintiff would give up immediate possession of the house to the defendant, in order that the defendant might enter on it as Mr. Holdforth's tenant, and also as compensation for the improvements made by the plaintiff, and for the value of the articles mentioned in the particulars of the plaintiff's demand. Mr. Holdforth and the plaintiff agreed that the plaintiff should quit his possession of the house on payment of the rent then due; and Mr. Holdforth and the defendant agreed that the latter should become the tenant at an advanced rent of 50*l.* And accordingly, in pursuance of this arrangement, on the 6th day of July, 1850, the plaintiff gave up the key to Mr. Holdforth's agent, and paid him the rent up to that time, and Mr. Holdforth's agent then and there delivered the key to the defendant, who has occupied the house from that time to the commencement of this action. About ten days after the 6th day of July, the defendant paid to the plaintiff 51*l.* in part of the said sum of 100*l.* and this action was brought to recover the balance of 49*l.* The agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant of the 4th of July, 1850, on which this action was brought, was not nor was any memorandum or note thereof in writing. It was objected, on the part of the defendant, that this action was brought upon a contract for the sale of lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or some interest in or concerning them, and that it could not be maintained on a verbal agreement. The judge overruled the objection, and ruled and determined that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, and accordingly gave a verdict for the plaintiff for 49*l.* There was no evidence of an account stated, the defendant having always alleged that the 51*l.* which he had paid was all he had agreed to pay. The question for the opinion of the Court of C. P. was, whether the ruling and determination of the judge of the County Court, that this action could be maintained on the verbal agreement of the 4th of July, was correct in point of law, and if the Court of Law should be of opinion that such ruling and determination were correct in point of law, then the said Court were to set aside the verdict entered for the plaintiff, and make such further order thereupon as the said Court might think proper.

Udall, for the appellant.—The simple question here is, whether, upon the case before the Court, the ruling of the judge below, that it was not necessary that the agreement should be in writing, was or was not a proper ruling. This appeal should be affirmed, because, first, the agreement is void, and an action cannot be maintained upon it, for it falls within the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds, 29 Car. 2, c. 3, as a contract for the sale of lands, or interest in them; secondly, if it does not amount to the sale of an interest in lands, the contract is void under the 4th section of the statute, as relating to an interest concerning lands. The agreement relates to the sale of an interest in lands, because i is to give up the house, and because part of it relates to improvements, such as papering the house (Cocking v. Ward, 1 C. B. 858.) It is distinctly found by the case that there was no evidence of an account stated; it is entirely an executory consideration, the money not being paid. In the next place, the painting and papering the house and the improvement of the premises surely amount to an interest in lands. It has been held that a person cannot recover for work and labour expended on lands under the common count for work and labour (Earl of Falmouth v. Thompson, 1 Cr. & Mees. 89.)

Hall, for the respondent.—This appeal should be dismissed, because the agreement does not fall within the prohibition in sec. 4 of the Statute of Frauds. The case of Cocking v. Ward does not apply here because there the circumstances materially differed that was altogether a different contract. [Cresswell, J.—How was the old tenant to get rid of his interest?] By surrender of the key. [Williams, J. referred to Dodd v. Acklom, 7 Scott, N. R. 415.] Here there was a surrender by operation of law; the plaintiff had at that time agreed to surrender to the landlord [Cresswell, J.—There is this difficulty in your position: you are proceeding on this agreement; are you not bound to shew it is binding on both parties?] That question may be answered in the affirmative, so far as a Court of Equity is concerned. [Cresswell, J.—It may be so; but that will not do here.] The defendant has taken possession of the goods, which is part performance of the agreement; there is no case where it has been held, that where there is complete performance of an agreement upon the one part, and partial performance on the other, that that is a case within the Statute of Frauds. (Souch v. Strawbridge, 2 C. B. 808.) In that case it was held that "a contract for the maintenance of a child, at the defendant's request," to enure "so long as the defendant should think proper, is a contract upon a contingency, the performance of which is not necessarily to take place beyond the space of a year, and therefore not within the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds." Tindal, C. J. there expressed an opinion that the statute does not apply when the action is brought upon an executed consideration. As to part performance of the agreement, there is the dictum of Lord Ellenborough, C.J. in Inman v. Stamp, 1 Stark. 12. That was an action of assumpsit for not occupying plaintiff's lodgings, pursuant to the defendant's verbal undertaking. Lord Ellenborough was there of opinion that this was a contract for an interest in land, within the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds, and was therefore void, but held that it would have been otherwise if the defendant had entered upon the premises, since that would have been a part execution of the contract. As to the argument that papering the house gives the agreement the character of an interest relating to land, that is completely answered by the case of Hallen v. Rundell, 1 Cr. M. & R. 266. Neither does the delivery of possession constitute it a contract for the sale of any interest in lands. The giving up of possession has been considered in Buttemere v. Hayes, 5 M. & W. 456. There Parke, B. intimates an opinion that a mere agreement to relinquish possession of premises would not amount to a contract for an interest in land. The effect of the present agreement was merely to suffer the defendant below to enter without being guilty of trespass. This is not a contract relating to the sale of lands because it does not amount to an assignment; the defendant has taken quite a different term, which begins at a different time, and is for a different rent. [Maule, J.—The right was to have a seven years' lease. That was surely an equitable interest in lands. Is not this substantially an agreement to have a seven years' lease?] No; for although the plaintiff had an equitable interest for a term of seven years, the letter he wrote to his landlord shews he was desirous of getting rid of it; he divested himself of his interest in order that he might go and keep a mill. [Williams, J.—Surely the tenant had in him an interest in the lease.] He had it for two days, from 4th to 6th of July, and for no longer; it extended only until the new term of the incoming tenant commenced. [Maule, J.—The Statute of Frauds does not speak of assignments of interest in lands, but of sales. The statute does not contemplate this or that mode of conveyance, only whether there is a sale of any kind of interest in land.] If the Court should uphold this appeal, it will be the first instance in which it has been held that where there has been part performance of an agreement on one side, and complete performance of it on the other, that is a contract which shall not be enforced. (Seaman v. Price, 2 Bing. 437.)

Udall, in reply.—The Court will see that this is clearly an action upon the agreement itself.

By the Court.—After the case of Cocking v. Ward, we must hold that the judgment of the Court below was wrong. Let the appeal be affirmed with costs. Appeal affirmed with costs.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Reported by Frederick Bailey and C. J. B. Hertslet, Esqrs. Barristers-at-Law.

April 29 and June 26.

The Galvanised Iron Company v. Westoby.

Joint-stock company—Winding-up—Shareholder—Liability.

An agreement to take shares is a conditional contract, and if the whole capital of the company is not subscribed for, a person who has taken shares and paid the deposit is not liable as shareholder unless he assents to the company's proceeding on the smaller capital:

The defendant accepted an allotment of shares, and paid the deposit thereon, and he was registered as a shareholder, but he never signed the deed:

Held, that he was not liable to calls as a shareholder.

Martin, B. dubitante.

This was an action brought to enforce payment of a call of 2*l.* per share on 100 shares, with interest from August 18, 1848, held by the defendant in the Galvanised Iron Company. It appeared that the company was started in the year 1845, and at one of the meetings a director procured an allotment of 100 shares to be made to the defendant, without any formal application having been made by him. The secretary caused a letter of allotment to be written to the defendant, and directed to the address mentioned by the director at the meeting. That letter requested that payment of the deposit of 1*l.* per share should be made to Messrs. Prescott and Grote, the bankers of the company, within a certain time. The deposit was duly paid, and the defendant's name was entered in the register as the holder of 100 shares, but he never signed the deed. Subsequently, several calls were made, and letters, announcing them, were sent to the defendant at the same address; to these letters no replies were received, nor were any of the calls paid. In 1847, upon a suggestion that the defendant was not in circumstances to pay the calls, the directors passed a resolution forfeiting all his shares, and the secretary struck his name out of the register; but no general meeting of the shareholders was held to confirm this forfeiture, as required by the terms of the deed. In 1848 the company became embarrassed, and on the 22nd of July, in that year, an Act passed (11 & 12 Vict. c. 103, local and personal), to enable the directors to wind up its affairs, and for that purpose they were authorised to make certain calls on the shareholders. Under this Act a call of 2*l.* per share was made on the 24th July, and for that call this action was brought, to which the defendant pleaded that he was not a shareholder of the company at the time the call was made. The cause was tried before Pollock, C.B. on the 13th December, 1851, when a verdict was returned for the plaintiffs for 233*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* with leave reserved to the defendant to move the Court to enter a nonsuit. A rule nisi having been obtained accordingly,

Thesiger (with him Willes) showed cause.

Crowder (with him Millward) in support.

Cur. adv. vult.

JUDGMENT.

Parke, B.—In this case the point reserved on the trial before my Lord Chief Baron was, whether the defendant was a shareholder, and liable to contribute to the debts of the company under the private Act, the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 103 (local and personal), passed for the purpose of winding up the affairs of the company. He had applied for and obtained an allotment of shares; he had paid the deposit upon them, but he had not executed the deed of settlement of the company, or any deed referring to it. The capital of the company was to consist of 500,000*l.* in 50,000 shares. The defendant applied for and obtained shares; the full amount never was subscribed, but the company began business with less, and not succeeding, a private Act of Parliament was passed for the purpose of winding up the concern. That Act recites the deed of settlement, and that, at the time of the execution, the number of shares taken was not 50,000, but 45,407 only, of which 25,000 were considered as fully paid up, and the rest in part only; that the company was completely registered, and 51,652*l.* remained unpaid on 20,407 shares. That in consequence of irregularity in the proceedings of the company and the directors, doubts were entertained as to the power of the company to enforce, without expensive litigation, the payment of the total amount remaining unpaid. That the company was in pecuniary embarrassment, and it had become necessary to wind it up. That in the then present state of the affairs of the company the liability of each shareholder exceeded the nominal amount of the shares, and that in the deed of settlement no provision was made for the then existing condition of the company, and it was necessary to wind up their affairs. The Act proceeds to enact, that the company shall be dissolved; that the 20,407 shares mentioned in the second schedule to the deed of settlement remaining shall be paid up; and it provides, by sec. 29, that the directors may, when they think fit, call up and compel payment of the sums of money as instalments of capital in respect of the 25,000 and the 20,407 shares as they shall think necessary, at certain intervals. Then follows a clause enacting, except as by that Act otherwise provided, every such call shall be made according to the provisions of the deed of settlement, and as regards the liability of the shareholders, a forfeiture of shares and otherwise shall be deemed to have been made under such provisions. Another clause, the 32nd, provides, that if at the time appointed any shareholder shall fail to pay the call, the company may sue such shareholder, and the form of declaration is given. It is enacted, that at that trial it shall be sufficient to prove that the defendant was a holder of shares at the time of the call; and by sec. 35 the production of the register of the shareholders of the company shall be primâ facie evidence of the number of shares held by him; and the 54th section is as follows:—"Provided always and be it enacted, that this Act, or anything therein contained, shall not, except so far as is therein expressly enacted, render liable to any creditor of the company, or any person having or alleging any claim or demand against the company, or any shareholder or other person, if the company, or such shareholder or other person, would not have been so liable if this Act had not been passed, or render liable to any call, contribution, debt, claim, or demand the company or any shareholder or other person, if the company or such shareholder or other person would not have been liable thereto if this Act had not been passed." It appears from the deed itself that, amongst the subscribers holding shares parcel of the 20,407 in the second schedule mentioned, there is the defendant's name, and if the statute had enacted that those who are named as shareholders in the second schedule should be compelled to pay, this express enactment, however unjust, would have rendered the defendant liable, and he, under this clause, would not have been exempted, though otherwise not liable. But there is no such express enactment, and it would be certainly most unjust if there had been; nor is it implied that those named in the deed as shareholders who should not execute it should be obliged to pay. The statute enacts that the directors should call for money or instalments on so many of the 25,000 and the 20,407 shares as shall exist, and makes the shareholder—that is, the real shareholder—who fails to pay such call liable to an action; but it leaves the question open, who is a shareholder. Who, then, is such a shareholder? In the interpretation clause, the word "shareholder" is declared to mean shareholder of the company, and to include former shareholders and their representatives. By the Act 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, under which the company was completely registered, the word "shareholder" is by the interpretation clause, clause 2, declared to mean any person entitled to shares in any company who has executed the deed of settlement, or any deed referring to it. By section 25 the shareholders are incorporated. Sec. 55 gives a remedy for the company's calls against the shareholders. Under this Act of Parliament a shareholder, therefore, must be one who has subscribed the deed of settlement, or one referring to it unless there is something in the context to give a different meaning. Certainly, there is nothing in that clause to give a different meaning, but in the 26th section there is provision that no shareholder of any joint-stock company completely registered under this Act shall be entitled to receive any dividend or profits, or be entitled to the remedies or powers hereby given to the shareholders until he shall have executed the deed of settlement of the said company or some deed referring thereto, and also have paid up all instalments or calls due from him, and shall have been registered in the registry office aforesaid. In this last section the word "shareholder," by reason of the context, may have a different interpretation, but not in the other part relating to the enforcements of calls. The argument used by the Attorney-General, that this clause shews that a shareholder may be liable to calls before he has executed the deed, does not appear to us to be of any weight; the meaning is, that a shareholder who has executed must nevertheless pay the calls before he is entitled to a share of the profits. From these references to the Act of Parliament, it is no doubt clear that there was a primâ facie case against the defendant, that he was a shareholder within the meaning of the later Act, as his name appeared in the register which is made primâ facie evidence. But we think that on the facts in proof in this case, that primâ facie case was rebutted, and the defendant was not a shareholder liable to calls under the private Act. First, because that Act applies to "shareholders" only, and "shareholders" are, by the general Act, the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, those who have executed the deed; and by sec. 13 of the private Act, the liability of the shareholder to calls is to be according to the deed of settlement, which could attach only on those who have signed. And again the private Act expressly provides that no one shall be made liable by it who would not have been liable if the Act had not passed, that is, provided there is no express enactment; and, as I have before said, it appears to us there is not. By the general Act shareholders only, that is, those who had executed the deed, were liable. The object of the private Act appears to us merely to give greater effect to the provisions of the deed, and extend its operation against the parties to it only. As it appeared by the evidence in this case that the defendant never did execute the deed, and therefore was not a shareholder in the proper sense, the primâ facie evidence of the register is rebutted. But, secondly, if this view of the construction of the private Act is wrong, and it extends to subscribers or persons who have taken shares and who have not executed the deed, we are still of opinion that the defendant is not liable. This agreement to take shares in a concern which was to have a capital of 500,000*l.* is, upon the authority of many cases, Pickford v. Davis, 5 M. & W. 2, among others, a conditional contract that is provided that that capital is subscribed for, and unless that condition was performed or waived the defendant is not a shareholder in the sense of a person having agreed to take shares. Then although the register is primâ facie evidence that the defendant was a shareholder, the fact of the agreement to take shares having been conditional is proved in this case, and also the non-compliance with that condition, for the Act shews that less than 50,000 shares were taken. This, we think, proves that he was not bound to take the shares unless the plaintiff proved affirmatively that the defendant waived the condition and agreed to take shares in a concern with a less capital than 500,000*l.* which certainly was not done. We think that the rule to enter a nonsuit should be absolute. This is the judgment of my Lord Chief Baron, my brother Alderson, and myself. My brother Martin is not entirely satisfied with it. He still entertains some doubt about the propriety of that judgment principally on the ground that he thinks it may be inferred from the private Act that the Legislature meant that those whose names were in the second schedule to the deed should be all obliged to pay.

MARTIN, B.—If I were to give judgment I should think it would depend much more upon the private Act of Parliament itself than upon the public Act, and I own if this man is not liable, I doubt whether any other man is liable for this call.

Rule absolute.

ERROR FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH.
Tuesday, Feb. 3.

HALLETT, and OTHERS, v. DOWDALL.(a)

Insurance company—Partnership—Joint contract—Limited liability of shareholders.

A policy of insurance, signed by three directors, but purporting in terms to be made between an insurance company by name and the insurers, contained an express agreement between them that the capital stock and funds of the company should alone be liable to answer and make good all claims and demands whatsoever, under or by virtue of the said policy; and also that no proprietor of the company should in anywise be liable or charged by reason of the said policy beyond the amount of his shares on the capital stock of the company. Upon this policy the insurers declared as upon a joint contract by four of the proprietors, alleging that there was sufficient capital stock and funds of the company to pay the amount of the policy. Upon demurrer thereto, Held, affirming the judgment of the Q. B. that inasmuch as the demurrer admitted a joint contract, the declaration was good.

Upon a plea of non-assumpsit to the same declaration the deed of settlement of the company containing the above-mentioned stipulations was given in evidence; and by that deed it appeared that the capital of the company was to be one million; that policies were to be si[illegible] three directors, and to contain the above stipulations. It was proved that in fact when the policy in question was signed, only 500,000l. had been subscribed towards the capital of the company. Upon the trial of the issue the learned judge told the jury that there was evidence of a joint contract by the defendants; and upon a bill of exceptions tendered to that ruling:

Held (Cresswell and Williams, JJ. dissentientibus), that the ruling was wrong; and that although by the terms of the policy the company was described as the party contracting with the insurers, yet, according to the proper construction of the stipulations above mentioned, there was no joint contract by the shareholders to pay the sum insured.

This was a writ of error from the Court of Q. B. upon demurrer to the declaration by one defendant, and upon a bill of exceptions tendered to the ruling of Lord Campbell, C.J. at Nisi Prius by another defendant.

The declaration was on a policy of insurance effected by the plaintiff in the office of the General Maritime Insurance Company, and alleged a joint contract by the four defendants, who were proprietors of shares in the company, to pay the amount insured.

The case was argued November 26 and December 3, 1851, by Peacock, for the plaintiffs in error.

Mellish, contrà.

The great length of the judgment, and the full consideration given to the arguments urged and authorities cited on both sides, renders any repetition of them here unnecessary. Cur. adv. vult.

JUDGMENT.

MARTIN, B.—This is an action on a policy of insurance on the ship Vindicator, dated the 18th of November, 1846, and signed by three directors of the Maritime Insurance Company, called the General Maritime Assurance Company. The defendant Hallett demurred to the declaration. This demurrer was argued in the Court of Q. B. and judgment given for the plaintiff. There were various pleas by the other defendants, but it is only necessary to refer to the plea of non-assumpsit, which was pleaded by the defendant Gooden. The case was tried before Lord Campbell, at Guildhall, when the verdict was found for the plaintiff, and final judgment was afterwards signed against all the defendants. A bill of exceptions was tendered at the trial to the direction of the learned judge, and the whole case has been brought before us by writ of error. Two points have been made by the learned counsel for the plaintiffs in error. First, that the judgment of the Court of Q. B. on the demurrer was erroneous; and, secondly, that the direction of the Chief Justice at Nisi Prius was also erroneous. The declaration stated that the defendants were proprietors and shareholders of, and partners in, the General Maritime Assurance Company; and that the plaintiff made a policy of insurance with the company. The declaration set out the policy; whereby it was declared and agreed by and between the company and assured, "that the capital stock and funds of the company, should alone be liable to answer and make good all claims and demands whatsoever, under, or by virtue of, the said policy; and that no proprietor of the said company, his or her heirs, executors, or administrators, should be in anywise subject or liable to any claims or demands, nor be in anywise charged by reason of the said policy beyond the amount of his or her share or shares in the capital stock of the company, it being one of the original and fundamental principles of the company that the responsibility of the individual proprietors should in all cases, and under all circumstances, be limited to their respective shares in the said capital stock." The declaration proceeded to allege that in consideration that the plaintiff, at the request of the defendants, had paid to the defendants the sum of 92*l.* 8s. as a premium, &c. the defendants promised the plaintiff, that they, the defendants, would become, and be insurers to the plaintiff of the said sum of 1,100*l.* upon the said ship, and would perform and fulfil all things in the said policy contained on their part as such insurers to be performed and fulfilled; and the defendants then became, and were, insurers to the plaintiff, and then duly subscribed the policy as such insurers of the said sum upon the said ship. The declaration then contained the usual averment of the plaintiff's interest, and the loss of the ship, and proceeded to allege that "although the capital stock and funds of the said company always from the time of the making of the said policy hitherto have been, and still are, sufficient to pay the plaintiff the said sum of 1,100*l.*; of all which premises the defendants had notice, and were, after the loss, requested to pay the said amount; yet the defendants have not paid the said sum, and the said sum is still wholly unpaid." The objection was, that there was no personal obligation on the defendants to pay. I am, however, of opinion that there is no fatal objection upon the face of the declaration. It is there alleged that the defendants made the promise and subscribed the policy, both of which facts are admitted by the demurrer; and it seems to me that the declaration alleges and imports a direct personal promise by the defendants to pay the amount insured, if the capital stock was sufficient for the purpose, and which it was averred in the declaration and admitted by the demurrer to have been. The breach is, that the defendants did not perform what, as it appears to me, they admit they promised should be done, namely, the application of the capital stock to the payment of the loss. The cases of Andrews v. Ellison, 6 J. B. Moore, 199, and Dawson v. Wrench, 3 Exch. Rep. 359, are directly in point, and I am not prepared to say they were not rightly decided. So also the cases of Gurney v. Rawlins, 2 M. & W. 87, and Reid v. Allan, 4 Exch. Rep. 321, are to the same effect; and I think, therefore, that the judgment of the Court of Q. B. on the demurrer to the declaration ought not to be reversed. The second question arises upon the bill of exceptions, and the point that has been argued before us is, whether there was any evidence to go to the jury against the defendant Gooden upon the issue upon the plea of non assumpsit. The following was the evidence adduced by the plaintiff:—The deed of settlement of the company, dated the 23rd of April 1840, executed by all the defendants. The parts material are set out in the bill of exceptions. That all the defendants severally and individually held shares in the capital stock of the company; that the defendant Gooden was a director, and held 250 shares, of 100*l.* each, in the capital stock; that Brightman, Owen, and Chambers were three directors, and as such signed the policy. The policy itself, which is set out at length in the bill of exceptions. That a total loss was adjusted at 1,100*l.*; that 7,500 shares had been subscribed for, and held originally by the defendants and others; that 5,000 were so held at the time of the commencement of this suit, the remainder having become forfeited in various ways; that calls had been made to the extent of 25*l.* per share, the last being a call of 10*l.* made on the 29th day of September, 1847; but that nothing was paid upon it, although certain directors and proprietors had advanced 10,500*l.* in anticipation of it. That in September, 1847, the company ceased to underwrite policies; but the directors continued to attend the office for some months, when it was given up. On behalf of the defendant Gooden it was proved that the company had not at the time of the accruing of the causes of action, or at any time after, any money, property, or available funds in their hands wherewith to satisfy the plaintiff's claim. Upon this evidence, the counsel for the defendant Gooden submitted that there was no evidence to go to the jury upon the issue on the plea of non-assumpsit. The chief justice ruled that there was: and thereupon the bill of exceptions was tendered. The points submitted to the chief justice, as stated in the bill of exceptions, were:—First, that no action at law would lie upon the policy; secondly, that the defendants were not jointly liable upon it; but if liable at law at all, were only liable severally to the extent of the shares held by them individually. Thirdly, that no action would lie against Gooden, as he had not signed the policy. Fourthly, that the promise laid in the first count had not been proved, as the promise therein alleged was a general promise by defendants to be and become insurers, whereas the only promise to be collected from the policy was to pay out of the capital stock and funds, if they were sufficient. Lastly, that the policy was illegal and void, by reason of 35 Geo. 3, c. 63, the names of the defendants not being expressed in the policy. In the argument for the plaintiff in error, it was contended that the partnership created by the deed of settlement of the 23rd of April, 1840, was a lawful partnership; that there was nothing illegal in the capital of the partnership being divided into shares, and the partners or shareholders agreeing that no one should be liable to be called upon to pay more than the amount agreed to be subscribed by him; that the plaintiff below had agreed with the company by an express term contained in the policy, that the capital, stock, and funds in the company should alone be liable to make good all claims under the policy, and that no proprietor should be in anywise subject, or liable, to a claim made by reason of the policy beyond the amount of his share or shares in the capital stock, it being one of the original and fundamental principles of the company that the responsibility of the individual proprietor should, in all cases, and under all circumstances, be limited to their respective shares in the said capital stock; that, except as against the individuals who signed the policy, the plaintiff below could not, in any event, maintain an action against more than one shareholder, without a violation of the express condition that the liability of each shareholder should be restricted to the amount of his own share, and that he should not be responsible for his co-shareholders. It was also contended that no action at law was maintainable upon the policy except against the persons who actually signed it: that in this there was no repugnancy; for that a suit in equity was maintainable against all the shareholders of the company, and that it was no valid objection to a contract, that in the event of a breach of it, the proceedings to obtain redress were confined to the Court of Equity. The case of Reid v. Allan, was cited to show what was the real nature of the legal liability, as alleged by the counsel for the plaintiffs in error, namely, a separate one, confined to the extent of the shares not paid up. And the cases of Halkett v. The Merchant Traders' Ship Loan Association, 19 Law J. Q. B. 59, and Hassell v. the same, 4 Ex. Rep. 525 were cited as authorities, that the defendant was not liable at all at law. On the the other hand, it was contended on behalf of the defendant in error, that the General Maritime Assurance Company was a mere trading partnership, that in law there was no distinction as to liability between a joint-stock partnership, as this is usually called, and an ordinary partnership, that throughout this policy the company were universally described as the contracting party, and that in this action, there having been no plea in abatement, the plaintiff below was entitled by law to consider every shareholder as the company, and as if the company were named as defendants upon the record; that the true rule as to partnership liabilities was that laid down in Hawken v. Bourne, 8 Mee. and W. 703, namely, that the partner authorised to make a contract was in the nature of a general agent, and had by law authority to bind his co-partners in contracts usually made in the partnership business, although in direct contradiction to the actual authority given by the co-partners. And the case of Smith v. The Hull Glass Company, 8 Com. B. 668 was cited, to show that there was no distinction between joint-stock companies and other partnerships. The question which arises here is one of great importance; there are very many companies (life insurance and others), carrying on business under deeds similar to that in the present instance; and provisions substantially the same as those contained in the present policy, are, I believe, universally inserted with the view of restricting the liability of the shareholders. The circumstance that Gooden was himself a director, will make no difference, for even assuming that the liability of a director, who has not signed the policy, is different from that of a mere shareholder, there are in the present case other defendants, who are mere shareholders, and it is quite clear that in order to fix the defendant Gooden on the plea of non-assumpsit, evidence must be given of the liability of all the defendants upon the promise alleged in the declaration. The question of the general liability of the question is, are the stipulations in the deed as to each subscriber, or partner, being responsible only to the amount subscribed for by him, lawful and valid, as amongst themselves? I entertain no doubt that they are. Such stipulations have been long in general use. Their object is to restrict, as far as possible, the liability of the partners to the same extent as that of shareholders. In the various corporations which have for a long period been created by Acts of Parliament for the purpose of effecting great public works, the partners agree amongst each other that each shall subscribe, and be responsible for, a certain amount only, and that in the event of one being compelled to pay a demand, the others will indemnify him separately, and in proportion to the extent of their respective interests and no further; and it seems to me clear that, as amongst themselves, when one has paid up the whole amount subscribed for by him, he is no longer responsible to any further amount to his co-shareholders, their liability to each other being precisely the same as that of shareholders in the ordinary joint-stock corporations created by Acts of Parliament, in which the subscribers are liable to the extent of their subscriptions only, and when they have once paid up all their calls, the legal liability to contribute further is at an end. The further question then arises, what is the liability of shareholders and partners in such companies to third parties, on contracts made by the directors in the ordinary course of business? and it seems clearly established by the authorities, that with respect to third persons, who have no notice of the terms of the partnership, the shareholders and partners in joint-stock companies are liable to the same extent and in the same manner as the partners in ordinary partnerships; and that the law pays no regard to the stipulations contained in the partnership deed as to the restriction of liability, or to any particular provision as to the mode of carrying on the business different from that ordinarily used in such concerns. In the case of King v. Dodd, 9 East, 527, Lord Ellenborough, in delivering the judgment of the Court, stated that the holding out in the prospectus of two proposed trading companies, one for manufacturing paper and the other for distilling spirits, that no subscriber would be responsible beyond the amount of the shares for which he subscribes, was a mischievous delusion: that as amongst the subscribers themselves, they might stipulate with each other for such restricted liability; but that, as to the rest of the world, it was clear that each subscriber was liable for the whole amount of the debts contracted by the partnership. So, also, Lord Eldon, in Carlen v. Drury, 1 Ves. & Bea. 117, stated that he held it to be clear law that each individual in a joint-stock brewery company was answerable for the whole of the debts of the concern. (After referring at some length to the cases of Hawken v. Bourne, and Smith v. The Hull Glass Company, his lordship proceeded)—The result of these authorities, therefore, is that when persons constitute a partnership, whether in the form of a joint-stock company or otherwise, the individual or individuals who are authorised to make contracts for the partnership have authority to bind all the partners in the manner usual and customary in the same trade or business, and even to delegate to others the authority so to bind them, if it be usual so to do, notwithstanding an express agreement not so to deal, and it is, I apprehend, upon this principle that partners in a trading company in a business in which bills of exchange are usually issued can bind their copartners, notwithstanding the issuing of bills is expressly prohibited by the partnership agreement. In the present case, therefore, if the policy contained no notice of a restricted liability, proprietors, shareholders, or partners, by whatever name they may be called, would be liable upon it, for it was a contract made in the way of their business, and by the partners authorised to make such contracts for the company. But the plaintiff had express notice on the face of the policy of the restriction, and he agreed that the capital stock and funds should alone be liable to him, and that no proprietor should be in anywise subject to his claim beyond the amount of his shares, which the defendant Gooden would certainly be if the plaintiff was entitled to recover on the promise alleged in this declaration; for to hold that the defendants promised as alleged would render them all liable to any extent, and each for the other, which is directly contrary to the restrictive clauses. It was argued that this view was repugnant to the contract contained in the policy, and that a contract cannot at the same time be made, and a provision be inserted that an action shall not be maintained in the event of its being broken; and that the case of Furnivall v. Coombs, 5 M. & G. 736, is an authority to this effect. This may be so, but I think that this principle does not apply to the present case. There are two sets of actions which, in my opinion, may be maintained upon a policy in the present form. First, I think, upon the authority of Andrews v. Ellison and Dawson v. Wrench, that the individuals capital stock or funds of the company should be applied to answer the claim on the policy; and, secondly, that each individual shareholder may be sued and recovered against to the extent of his unpaid subscription. The contract is contained in a policy which, I have no doubt, was in a great measure copied from the form of the policy used by the two incorporated companies,—the Royal Exchange and the London Assurance Companies,—who were respectively authorised by Act of Parliament to insure as companies or partnerships on joint capital. The policy expressly declares that the capital stock and funds of the company shall alone be liable to make good all claims under it; and the meaning of this seems to me to be, that the plaintiff agreed or consented to look, not to the general property of all the shareholders, but to confine himself, first, to a fund expected to be accumulated from the payment by the shareholders of a portion of the sum subscribed from time to time and the premiums received in the course of business, and kept by the directors for the purpose of current demands upon the company; and, secondly, as a sort of reserve fund, to the liability of each shareholder to the extent of his shares not paid up. But the policy proceeds further, and expressly declares that no shareholder shall be liable to any claim, nor be in anywise charged, by reason of the policy, beyond the amount of his shares in the capital stock. Now, it seems to me that it is here declared, first, that the shareholder shall be liable to the extent of his unpaid shares; and, secondly, that he shall not be liable further; and to hold the defendants liable in the present action might render them further liable, and would render them jointly liable, which is equally inconsistent with the above provision, which clearly contemplates a separate liability only. The plaintiff was under no obligation to insure with the company, but as he thought proper to do so, he is, in my opinion, bound by the express declaration in the policy. I am unable to understand how a shareholder can, upon a contract, or, in other words, by his own agreement, be rendered liable to an unlimited extent, when he and the party with whom he has contracted have, as it appears to me, in the most plain and unambiguous terms, agreed that he shall be liable only to a limited extent. If this agreement be illegal, it is, of course, void and of no effect, but I see nothing illegal in it; and if it be legal, the proper duty of the court of law is to carry it out; and even if it were incapable of being carried out, I do not think that such incapacity would empower a court of law to impose upon the shareholders a liability or obligation, which they, and the parties with whom they contracted, expressly agreed that they should not bear. In my opinion, however, the contract is capable of being carried out; and although the remedy is an inconvenient one, and may probably lead to a multiplicity of actions, I see no objection in point of law to a separate action being maintained against a shareholder to recover from him upon the policy to the extent of his unpaid shares. Upon a common marine policy each underwriter incurs a separate liability, and to a limited amount. Upon the present policy I think also each shareholder incurs a separate liability, and to an amount limited to his unpaid shares. It seems to me that each shareholder authorises the pledging of his personal liability to this extent. This liability is referred to in the judgment of the Court in Reid v. Allan, and as I have already observed, I see no objection to it in point of law, as it seems to me to be entirely consonant to the intention of the parties expressed in their contract. In reality, it is an agreement to perform a contract, with a proviso, that in the event of a breach, the payment to be made in respect of it shall be made by each contractor separately, and be so much, and no more. In my judgment it is lawful for parties so to agree. It may be observed, that by the 36th section of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, execution may be issued against a shareholder to the extent of the shares not paid up, if a judgment against the company cannot be made available against the property of the company; which is a liability very like that which I consider to be the contract of the individual shareholder in the present case. The cases of Halket v. The Merchant Traders' Company, and Hassall v. The Merchant Traders' Company, were relied upon as authorities directly in point for the plaintiffs in error. By the statute 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, the Act for the regulation of joint-stock companies, provision is made by the 66th section for enforcing judgments; and it is enacted, that execution shall be enforceable not only against the property and effects of the company, but also, if those funds be unavailing, against the persons, property, and effects of the shareholders. (His lordship then referred particularly to the former of the two cases last mentioned.) From this judgment it appears that the Court of Q.B. considered that no action at all lay at the suit of the assured against the individual shareholder; and I have already stated that I do not concur in this view; but in the case of the Q.B. the policy was under seal, and the point was not much discussed at the Bar. The case of Hassall v. The Merchant Traders' Company, in the Exchequer, is precisely to the same effect. I am therefore of opinion that there was no evidence of any joint liability of the defendants to go to the jury, which was one of the points submitted to the learned Chief Justice, and stated in the bill of exceptions, and that the final judgment of the Queen's Bench ought to be reversed, and that there must be a venire de novo.

TALFOURD, J. concurred in the judgment above given.

WILLIAMS, J.—I am of opinion that the direction of the Judge to the jury upon the trial of this cause was unexceptionable, and the judgment ought to be affirmed. Although I have the misfortune to differ from most of my learned brothers in this respect, yet we all agree, I think, that no objection can be made in support of the writ of error, upon the ground that the company of which the defendants below were proved to be members, did not authorise the making of the policy upon which the action is founded. No such point is properly raised on the bill of exceptions; it must, therefore be taken that it was duly proved at the trial, that the defendants below, together with the other members of the General Maritime Assurance Company, entered into such a contract with the plaintiff as is constituted by the terms of the policy. It was, however, contended on the part of the defendants below, that those terms do not amount to a joint contract by them, and all the other members of the company, but to a several one with each of them, and consequently that the declaration being founded upon a supposed joint contract was not sustained by the evidence, and that the Judge ought accordingly to have directed the jury to find for the defendant on the issue of non assumpsit. But I am of opinion that the terms of the policy constitute a joint contract by all the members of the company, and therefore this exception fails. With respect to the form of the policy, the company in the ordinary way become the assurers of the ship upon the specified terms, and promise to perform those terms, and acknowledge the receipt of the premium as the consideration for their promise; and but for the introduction of the special clause hereafter to be considered, this would be the plainest possible case of an association of assurers entering into a contract of insurance for the joint benefit of all the partners in the ordinary course of their partnership business. But it is expressly stipulated that the capital stock, which is stated in the heading of the policy to be one million, shall alone be liable to answer any claim under the policy. And it has been held in several decided cases, and seems to be undisputed, that by reason of this stipulation it is a good plea in bar of any such claim that the company have no assets to meet it, inasmuch as they have spent the whole of their capital stock. There is, however, a further stipulation, which is said to demonstrate that the contract is not joint by all, but several by each of the members who authorise the policy to be made, namely, it is carefully stipulated that no proprietor shall be in any way charged by reason of the policy beyond his share in the capital stock; and it has been mentioned as one of the principles on which the policy is founded that the responsibility of the individual proprietors shall in all cases and under all circumstances be limited to their shares in the capital stock. It is argued in support of the writ of error that this shews that each member contracts not jointly but severally to bear the loss in proportion to his share or shares. It may be observed, however, as was pointed out by Lord Denman, in giving judgment in the case of Halkett v. The Merchant Traders' Association, that there is no provision that where the shareholder has paid up the full amount of his shares to the company he shall not be liable in proportion to his shares to the assured. This responsibility, it is conceded, is to exist, but, it is said to be limited to the amount of his shares; and it seems to follow that he could not be allowed to plead that he is not responsible to that amount, because he has paid up the whole of his shares, that payment having been made since the policy was effected, and the money appropriated to claims on the company, which have arisen later than the plaintiff's claim. Supposing, therefore, an action was brought against a single shareholder, and suppose a certain contract contained in that policy such as the present, where there has been an indisputable loss recoverable under the policy, practically speaking if the company were solvent no defence would be made, and the loss would be paid; but supposing the company to be insolvent and the capital stock all spent, must the defendant at his peril ascertain the amount of the loss, and whether that exceeds the amount of the shares he holds; and if it does, confess the action, and plead payment of money into Court to the amount of his shares; and as to the residue that he is only a shareholder to the amount he has paid into Court? This seems to be the only course of pleading open, unless, indeed, he has paid up all his shares, and it were considered competent to him, notwithstanding the difficulty I have above suggested, to plead that fact as in itself a bar to the action; but in neither case would there be any room for the plea that the capital stock of the company has been exhausted; for that would be altogether immaterial, if the defendant's liability is to be confined to the amount of his own shares. The only answer to this difficulty is the proposition contended for by Mr. Peacock, that the signature of the policy by the directors enures to make it a joint contract on their part to pay all just claims on the policy, provided the capital stock be sufficient, and that the rest of the company who have authorised the making of the policy on their behalf, but have not signed it, contract severally, and not jointly, and contract only to pay in proportion to their own shares. I am, however, of opinion, that the signature of the directors has no such operation, and purports merely to testify the contract, and that the company are content with the assurance; and there is nothing in the language or in the nature of the instrument which indicates that those who subscribed, intended, by reason or by force of the signature, to increase their liability beyond that of the other contracting parties, or to do any thing more than to authenticate the instrument as the policy under which the company have become the insurers. It is not required by law that such a contract should be signed by those who are to be charged; and I feel it difficult to understand how the signature, not being necessary for the validity of the contract, or in any way of the essence of it, can be capable of varying its meaning or effect, or how the members being directors who signed it, or other members of the company, by whose actual authority such a contract purported to be made and was made on their behalf, can be at all in a different position from that in which they would have been if the instrument had not been signed at all, or had been signed by all the individuals instead of by some of them, on behalf, and by the authority, of the rest. I therefore think that the plaintiffs in error cannot sustain the proposition that the liability of the directors who signed the policy is different from that of the other members of the company who authorised the signature. And if their liability be identical, another argument arises against the validity of the plea in an action against a single shareholder, that he has paid up all his shares; for if this were the only plea, and all shares were paid up, it is obvious that each member would have a good answer to an action against him. Therefore, unless a joint action can be maintained against all, no action whatever would lie upon the policy, notwithstanding the capital stock of the company was fully sufficient to answer the claim. Perhaps the explanation of the matter is this, that the form of the policy was introduced in earlier times when the system of allowing the shareholders to keep back part of the money due on their shares was unknown, and therefore the policy assumes that there is a capital stock of one million in the sense that every member has actually brought the whole amount of his shares into the partnership stock, and it is accordingly stipulated that recourse shall only be had to this fund for satisfaction of all claims under the policy. If, therefore, all the capital stock happen to be spent this would be a good answer to any such claim in any action whether brought against all or any of the members, and thus the individual members having already contributed the whole amount of their shares, cannot be compelled to pay more or be made further responsible, as they might have been but for the special clause. If this be so, the whole difficulty arises from the members choosing to sanction the modern practice of allowing part of the capital stock to remain in the shape of money unpaid upon the shares, and thus introducing the question of one member being made responsible for another's paying up his shares, which could not possibly arise if the theory of such partnerships were carried into due effect, and the capital really existed in the shape of contributed capital stock. Unless the policy will admit of this construction, I think the latter al clause must be rejected in construction, as being repugnant to the general effect of the contract, which, in my opinion, is a joint contract of insurance by several insurers. If such a contract contains stipulations for restricting the liability of the insurers, the legal consequence is that it must be rejected as impracticable in law, as was done in the case of Furnivall v. Coombes, 5 M. & G. 736, where the defendant entered into a personal covenant, and then endeavoured, by the introduction of a proviso, to relieve himself from all personal liability. It was also contended, on the part of the plaintiff in error, that the Court of Q. B. had erroneously given judgment on the demurrer for the plaintiff below, but I am of opinion that that judgment is right. On this question, however, as I do not differ from any other member of the Court, I do not deem it necessary to explain the grounds of my own opinion. Upon these grounds I think the judgment of the Court below ought, in all respects, to be affirmed.

Platt, B. (after stating the declaration and the special clause in the policy).—To this declaration one of the defendants demurred. With regard to that demurrer it is sufficient to say, that the judgment of the Court may be founded upon other parts of the objections to this record, without deciding upon the validity of that demurrer. Upon the question raised by that I have considerable doubt; but another of the defendants has pleaded, amongst other pleas, non assumpsit, raising, therefore, the question whether there was a joint promise made by the four defendants in the manner in which it is stated upon the record. (His lordship then stated the points raised at the trial.) Now, it was contended, in the course of the argument, that this was in fact an attempt on the part of partners to do that which the law would not permit. And it seems to me, I own, that that proposition was founded on a fallacy; because there is no magic in a number of persons becoming partners, which will prevent them from acting independently with persons with whom they contract; and the general responsibility, beyond all question, may be modified and varied. What objection could be raised to a contract by which four parties agreed to buy of a merchant merchandise upon the terms of one of them paying half the price, and the three others paying each a third of the remainder, and by which it was distinctly stipulated between the buyer and the seller that the seller should not be entitled to demand payment except in the several proportions, and severally against the different parties? Is that an illegal contract? Is the law to make a contract which the parties never contemplated? That is the bargain which they have made, and that is the bargain by which all ought to be bound. It is no answer to say that they contracted as partners, and that by the general law partners are jointly liable. In the case supposed, they would not have contracted on that footing. Now, upon the evidence, it appears that the policy was made according to the deed of settlement, and according to that deed no power whatever was given to the directors to bind the shareholders jointly. The contract which they have made pursuant to the deed of settlement is no evidence whatever of the other contract alleged upon the record, and for that reason I think that the defendant Gooden ought to have had the verdict upon that plea. With regard to the question, whether separate actions may be brought upon this contract against the several shareholders, possibly the contract may be such as to enable the parties to sue the persons who sign as directors, or to sue any one of the several parties who would be liable to the extent of their unpaid contributions to the capital stock; but there is considerable difficulty in making a contract with two aspects, and great difficulty, as it strikes me, in that respect as regards this particular contract; therefore, with respect to that, I beg to be understood as not expressing any opinion.

Cresswell, J. (after stating the pleadings).—On demurrer by one of the defendants, the Court of Queen's Bench decided that the declaration was good, they must, therefore, have held that it disclosed a joint contract enforceable at law. The promise is laid merely as a promise to perform what the policy contained, on their part, to be performed; and if the policy did not contain anything to be performed by them jointly, the promise would not enure as a joint promise. The natural meaning of the words is, that they promised according to the terms contained in the policy. If the contract was joint, the promise would be joint; if several, the promise would be construed as several. I apprehend, therefore, that the Court of Q. B. must have been of opinion that the contract, as set out, independently of the promise, is joint; and the language which they are reported to have used is not consistent with any other view of the case. I am of opinion that their judgment was right, and that the declaration shews a joint contract by those who entered into the obligation which it contains, whatsoever those obligations may be, and that such contract may be enforced by action at law. The first question raised at the trial was on the plea of non-assumpsit, namely, whether all the defendants became insurers by the policy, or, in other words, whether the contract of assurance was made in a manner, and by persons competent to act for, and bind, the defendants being themselves members of, and shareholders in, the company. In order to prove the affirmative, the plaintiff put in evidence the deed of settlement and the policy. The latter was issued by the company in the form always used by them, and no question was made as to the propriety of issuing policies in that form, and it was signed by three members or shareholders, who were also directors, but neither the directors, nor any other member of the copartnership had authority to act for the other members, except in their capacity of directors; they could make no contract for them as individuals, and therefore the contract in question must either bind them jointly, or not at all. If the case is looked at as one of an ordinary copartnership, the contract of insurance having been made by three members of the firm, in the name of the firm, and in the course of business carried on by the firm, is binding upon all the members; if it is considered in a different point of view because the copartnership appears to be a joint-stock company, and it is considered necessary to shew the directors had authority by the deed of settlement to make such contract; I think it appears that they had. It was not objected that the policy was not in conformity with the deed of settlement, the directors, therefore, in issuing it, acted within the limits of the authority conferred upon them, and their contract was the contract of all the copartners just as much as if each member had signed it. On non assumpsit, therefore, it must be held that the defendant entered into the contract alleged in the policy; but on non assumpsit it is also said that the declaration is on a joint contract, and that the policy shewed a several contract only. Let us look at the terms in which the policy is made. It is headed "General Maritime Assurance Company. Capital one million," importing that it is a policy of the company. Then, in describing the risk against which the insurance was made, it says, "Touching the adventures and perils which the said company are contented to bear, and do take upon them," not "which the members of the company are content, &c. and do take on themselves respectively." Again, as to the expenses of "suing, &c. by the assured," it says, "to the charges whereof the company will contribute according to the rate and quantity of the sum herein assured." And "it is declared by and between the said company and the assured." Again—"And further it is agreed by the said company that this writing or policy of insurance shall be of as much force, &c. and so the said company are contented and do bind themselves and their successors to the assured for the true performance of the promise, confessing themselves paid the consideration due unto the company for this assurance." Read co-partnership for company, and it would seem impossible to contend that the engagements entered into are not joint. I now proceed to consider what the contract entered into is; undoubtedly it is a contract of insurance. The policy begins by stating that Buckley and Company caused themselves to be assured, and the company bind themselves for the performance of the promises in the policy whatever they may be, confessing themselves paid the premium for that assurance, they undertake to insure, and we must look to the earlier part of the policy to see against what they insure, and there the risks usually insured against in such policies are found. Now, by insuring against certain risks they undertake to indemnify against them. But now we come to the provision that the capital stock and funds of the company shall alone be liable to make good demands, which has been construed as a proviso upon a general contract to indemnify, which must therefore be read that the company undertake to indemnify against the risks enumerated, provided the capital stock and funds are sufficient for that purpose. (Gurney v. Rawlins, 2 M. & W. 87, and Dawson v. Wrench, 3 Ex. 359.) We now come to the consideration of the clause in the policy,—"That no proprietor, &c. shall be in anywise subject or liable to any claim, &c. beyond the amount of his or her share or shares, &c." It is not very easy to determine the meaning of this proviso. In considering it, perhaps we should assume that the company are in possession of the whole of the capital which they profess to have, which is a capital equal to the amount of the shares held by the different members; or, in other words, that the whole has been paid up. If that were so, as by the conditions in the policy the assured are only to be paid if the stock suffices, if they establish a right to be paid, there must be a fund adequate to make the payment, and any individual proprietor affected by a judgment would have a fund to resort to for indemnity; and the deed of settlement provides for indemnifying the individual shareholders in such cases. If this proviso is construed to mean that the individuals shall have such indemnity, there is nothing in it repugnant to the primary contract contained in the policy; if it is construed so as to compel the assured to sue each separately for his share of the loss, it is repugnant to the original joint contract to pay, if the funds of the company suffice. Again, there is no stipulation that each shall pay only a part of the loss in proportion to his share in the joint stock of the company, but that he shall not by this policy be made liable to more than the amount of his shares. Construing that strictly, any one shareholder might, upon every policy issued by the company, be compelled to pay a part of the loss equal to the whole amount of his shares; a situation not much preferable to that from which these defendants seek to escape. I am, therefore, much disposed to think that the clause in question is incapable of receiving any intelligible meaning, and if insensible or uncertain it must be inoperative. If it receives any construction other than that which I first suggested, it is repugnant to the contract of insurance entered into by the policy, and therefore void. (Furnivall v. Coombes.) If the construction contended for by the defendants is correct, that the policy contains a separate contract by each proprietor only, and that the having paid up the amount of his shares furnishes a good plea in bar to the action, which is a necessary consequence of that construction, it follows that if all the shareholders have paid up the full amount of their shares, and the whole capital is in the hands of the company, no action at law can be maintained on the policy issued by them;—not against all the members, for the policy contains no joint contract;—not against individual members, for each is supposed to have paid up the whole of his share in the capital. This shews that even if the contract to pay, if the capital stock fail, be several, the proviso is repugnant to it. I am therefore of opinion that Lord Campbell was right in telling the jury that upon the evidence they might find a verdict for the plaintiff on the issue upon non-assumpsit On the other point argued before us, namely, whether there was evidence that the capital stock and funds of the company were sufficient to pay the plaintiff, I think that the direction was right, for that the company must be taken to have available funds so long as a large portion of the capital stock remained uncalled for. I think that the judgment of the Court below should be affirmed.

ALDERSON, B.—I shall confine myself to that question upon which alone I differ from the judgment of the Court of Q. B. and from the opinions delivered by my learned brothers Cresswell and Williams to-day. (After stating the question, and the terms of the special clause, his lordship proceeded:)—Now, if words can clearly express an intention, these words do so; therefore, if we can in any way construe this policy so as not to fix the individual proprietors in all cases of policies thus claimed upon, we shall only be effecting the plain intention of those who framed it, and those who were parties to the contract; and I think we may construe this policy as shewing that the directors contracted, not for the individuals, but that the funds of the company should indemnify the plaintiff, and that they should be alone liable in the hands of the signing directors for the claim; or if this be not so, and if we must construe the word "company" to mean the individuals for whom the three directors contract, that then the meaning may be that the different members of the company are to be taken as signing each for himself through his agents, the three directors, for the amount of his shares remaining unpaid, just like a body of separate underwriters signing for one another, and thus we shall make them separately liable to that extent, and so give effect to the declared intention limiting their liability. In either way of construing it, the issue, on non assumpsit, must be found for the defendants. If we look carefully at the deed under which the directors have the power to bind the defendants, we shall find that it directs all policies to be signed by three directors in a given form. It provides that every policy shall state that the subscribed capital, and stock, and funds of the company remaining undisposed of at the time of the claim, shall alone be liable to make it good, adding affirmatively, that the directors signing such policy shall be responsible to the extent of the funds in their hands or power, and negatively that no proprietor, obviously meaning, therefore, no other proprietor, except the directors so signing, shall be liable beyond the amount of his unpaid shares. I doubt whether this policy was made according to the powers given by the deed, inasmuch as Gooden really never gave any authority to the directors to make any policy which did not state those three things; first, that the funds were alone to be liable; secondly, that the directors were to be liable to the extent of the funds in their hands or power; and thirdly, that the proprietors were only to be liable to the extent of their shares; the second clause, if it had been inserted, coupled with the other two, would have shewn clearly that the individual proprietors could only be made liable through the directors; and upon the issue on non assumpsit the defendant, Gooden, would have been entitled to the judgment of the Court.

PARKE, B.—In this case some important questions arise, partly on demurrer, partly on a bill of exceptions to the ruling of Lord Campbell, on the trial of the issues. [After stating the material parts of the pleadings the learned judge proceeded.] On demurrer, the question was, whether the first count was bad either in substance or form. The Court of Q. B. held the first count to be good, and I think they were right in so holding: the formal objections, the principal of which was the uncertainty whether the defendants became insurers, generally, and with all the obligations of ordinary insurers, or only insurers upon the terms of the policy, I think are untenable; for the context clearly shews that the declaration meant to charge them only as insurers by that policy with the obligations only which were created by it. The other objection as to the uncertainty of the time of the promise is equally unfounded. The objection of substance was, that there was no contract at all made by the policy on the part of any one; but only a charge of a joint-stock fund, and available in equity only; and that if there was a contract, it was not a joint one by all the defendants, but a separate one by each, whereby each agreed to be responsible only to the amount of his shares in the capital stock, and not for the whole loss if it exceeded it, nor did any or either agree to be liable for the non-payment of another's share. I think the Court of Q. B. rightly held that the declaration is good on general as well as special demurrer. In the declaration it is averred that the plaintiff paid the premium, and promised to fulfil and perform everything in the policy contained on the part of the assured to be performed and fulfilled; and that the defendants promised that they would become and be insurers to the plaintiff for the sums specified, and perform and fulfil all things on their part as such insurers to be performed and fulfilled; and there is an averment of the sufficiency of the capital stock of the company. In considering, therefore, the sufficiency of the declaration on demurrer we are to assume that a joint contract by all the defendants is admitted, and on that assumption to construe the terms of the policy. So doing I think it amounts to a joint contract that the company shall pay out of their capital stock, in other words, if the capital stock and funds should be sufficient. In Dawson v. Wrench, the Court of Ex. on demurrer held in an action on a policy by the same company, in which the declaration was against the subscribing directors, that the clause had that meaning, and the general course has been in actions on fire policies, in which there is usually a similar clause charging the funds, to bring an action as on a covenant or contract by the subscribing directors to pay out of that fund. The objection, therefore, in the present case, that on the face of the declaration the policy operated merely as a charge, cannot prevail. It was, secondly, contended that taking the declaration altogether there was no joint promise by the defendants, but only a several and limited promise by each, namely, to contribute to the amount of his share. This objection is certainly of more weight than the others and raises some doubt whether the allegation "that the defendants promised (which, as I have stated, means jointly promised) to be insurers on the terms of the policy" is not inconsistent with one of the terms of it, "that no proprietor shall be in anywise subject to any claims or demands, nor be in anywise charged, by reason of the said policy, beyond the amount of his share in the capital stock of the said company," it being stated to be one of the original and fundamental principles of the said company that the responsibility of the individual proprietors should in all cases, and under all circumstances, be limited to their respective shares in the said capital stock; for if there be a joint contract by all the proprietors to pay if the capital stock be sufficient, each is liable if the stock be sufficient to have the full amount of the loss levied upon him, and so he is charged, by reason of the policy, beyond the amount of his shares. It may be said, therefore, that where one of the material and alleged fundamental terms of the joint contract is wholly irreconcileable with the joint liability, there is no joint contract at all, taking all the averments in the declaration together. The sufficiency of the declaration is, therefore, questioned; but as upon demurrer it must be taken that the contract is set out according to its legal effect, we must assume that the defendant did jointly contract in the manner alleged, and thus we must either reconcile the apparently inconsistent provision with the joint liability of the defendants to the plaintiff, which follows from their joint contract, by supposing that it is a mode of regulating their liability inter se, though unnecessary to be introduced into a contract with the assured; or, if incapable of being reconciled, we must reject it as repugnant and void, as an attempt by the parties to do what by the law of England they cannot—contract jointly with a separate limited liability to damages for the breach of the contract. I therefore think that the judgment of the Q. B. on the demurrer ought to be affirmed. The next question arises upon the bill of exceptions. (The learned judge stated the evidence and the points raised.) First, that no action at law would lie on the policy, as there was no contract to pay, but only a charge in equity; secondly, that the defendants were not jointly liable upon it, but if liable at all at law, were only severally liable; thirdly, that no action would lie against Goodon, as he had not signed the policy; fourthly, that the promise alleged was general to become insurers to the plaintiff, and the promise proved was, to pay out of the capital in the terms of the policy; fifthly, that the policy was void by the 35 Geo. 3, c. 63, s. 2. I have already intimated my opinion, that the fourth of these objections is untenable. The third and fifth are equally so; indeed, the fifth, which was stated in one of the pleas, was given up, and the plea was admitted to be bad, as it could not but be after the judgment of Lord Cranworth in the case of Reid v. Allan; and the third is untenable, as no personal signature by the defendants is required; and if the objection had been, that the directors who actually signed were not authorised by the defendants to do so, the objection ought to have been pointedly and distinctly stated, which it certainly is not. The only objections which remain to be considered are the first and second. They are shaped in two ways. It is contended that, if the terms of the policy alone are looked at, the legal effect is, that the different proprietors do not thereby contract jointly at all, and that if the policy is construed to be a joint contract of all the proprietors, the directors have no authority from the proprietors to make such a policy for them. As to the second branch of the argument, the authority expressly given by the deed was certainly not pursued, and that in more than one respect. One difference is, that in the policy the stock or funds generally are pledged; in the deed the power is to pledge only the funds undisposed of at the time of the claim under the policy, and the directors ought to state that limitation in the policy, which they have not done; and further, that no shareholder shall be liable beyond the unpaid part of his share. There is no evidence that this particular form of policy so deviating from the directions given by the deed was sanctioned by the defendants; and whether unchartered companies of assurance against marine risks (which companies did not exist before the 6th George 4, and of the usage of which no evidence was offered) are on the footing of ordinary partnerships, so that in the absence of proof of the recognition of a particular form of contract, an authority to the directors would be implied as to all strangers to the real authority, is a question on which I need not on the present occasion express any opinion; first, because I think that the want of authority in the directors to make policies binding on each proprietor, was not objected to in a distinct manner as it ought to have been, the only objection really made being that the defendants were not jointly liable on the policy, and that the policy was not signed by the defendant Gooden; and, secondly, because I think that, looking at the policy alone, and construing every part of it together so as to give effect as far as possible to its different provisions, it does not contain any joint contract with the assured, by all the proprietors, and consequently no joint contract by the defendants. In construing the instrument itself we are not embarrassed by the admission of the fact, which on the demurrer was necessarily assumed, that the defendants did jointly contract; the question on the evidence is whether they did; nor are we to assume that the defendants duly subscribed the policy as assurers, which on the demurrer is admitted. This also is a question to be determined on the construction of the instrument. What, then, is the legal effect of the policy which is unquestionably a very confused and inartificial instrument, very difficult to understand, probably copied in a great measure from one of those used by the chartered insurance companies, and perhaps without understanding its meaning. (The learned judge read the material terms of the policy). It is impossible to doubt that the object of this clause, which is stronger than that in Halkett v. The Merchant Traders' Association, was to protect the proprietors from personal responsibility to any persons whatever beyond a limited amount; and in construing that instrument we must give effect to the provision, so clearly expressed, if we can consistently with the other provisions contained in it. I think we can do this by construing the term "company" to mean not the whole body collectively, so as to make the whole body joint contractors, but each individual of the company, so as to make each of them to contract to bear the loss in the same proportion as his share bears to the total capital, in the nature of the contract of a separate underwriter. It is true that there may be difficulties in ascertaining how much each is to pay in a case where the assurer has already been obliged to contribute to other losses; but a similar sort of difficulty would exist if all jointly undertook to pay out of the capital stock; if the capital stock had already been reduced by the payment of prior claims, the residue only would be capital liable to pay. But whatever difficulty might arise on this ground, the assured must suffer, for I think it quite clear that the individual proprietors were never meant to be responsible for any others than themselves. I think it unnecessary to decide whether the subscribing directors were responsible on the policy, by reason of their signatures as contracting parties, or not; all I think it necessary to decide is, that there was no evidence in this confused and ill drawn instrument, warranting the judge to say there was any joint contract by the defendants with the plaintiff, as alleged in the declaration. It may be, that there is no contract at all, but at all events, I think there is no joint contract by the proprietors, who are not directors, with the plaintiff, and therefore Lord Campbell ought to have directed a verdict for Gooden upon non assumpsit, and if so, all the other defendants were entitled to the benefit of that verdict. This makes it unnecessary to discuss the last question, whether the direction of Lord Campbell was right as to the meaning of the term "capital stock and funds," but I do not mean to intimate that I think the ruling in that respect was not correct, though it is not the same that the judges of the Queen's Bench appear to have put on those terms, according to the report in the 19 L. J. 37. Therefore, I think the judgment should be affirmed on demurrer, and a venire de novo awarded on the issues.

Judgment on demurrer to declaration affirmed. Judgment on issue on non assumpsit reversed, and a venire de novo awarded.

Reported by Dr. WADDILOVE, of Doctors Commons.

Feb. 13, 17, and 22, and May 14.

Ship abandoned at sea—Claim for salvage by part of her crew.

A ship was, under the orders of the master, abandoned, and her crew, who had taken refuge on board a steamer, landed at Vigo. There they were, by the British consul, put on board another steamer, to be taken to England. On the day following they fell in with the abandoned ship. Part of the crew boarded her and took her into the port of Corunna:

Held, that those of the crew who did so were entitled to remuneration as salvors.

This was a question of considerable importance to the underwriters and owners of sea-going vessels.

The ship Florence sailed from Liverpool, bound for the coast of Africa. Meeting with bad weather, after losing her rudder in the Bay of Biscay, she was taken in tow by a steamer (the Montrose). The tow-ropes breaking, she was abandoned, her crew taking refuge on board the steamer, which landed them at Vigo, whither she was proceeding; thence they were transhipped by order of the British consul on board the Madrid steamer, to return to England. Early on the day following that on which the Madrid left Vigo they fell in with the abandoned ship. A smack, which proved to be The Rising Sun, which also claimed salvage, was near her. The mate and part of the crew of the Florence volunteered to return on board her; the master and the rest of the crew remaining on board the Madrid. The mate and seventeen of the late crew then went on board the Florence: the master with the rest of the crew proceeded in the Madrid to Southampton. The Florence was, by the assistance of the smack, The Rising Sun, and some other boats hired for the purpose, taken into the port of Corunna. An agent sent from this country had settled the claims of the crew save those of three, who now claimed as salvors, viz. the mate, boatswain, and carpenter. The claim of the smack, The Rising Sun, was resisted on the ground that her crew had plundered the Florence, and so forfeited what salvage might be due to them. The claims of the mate and the two seamen were resisted, first, on the ground that being part of the crew, they had done no more than their duty, and were, therefore, not entitled to salvage; secondly, that by plundering and wasting the cargo and stores, and allowing others to do so, they had forfeited any lvage to which the Court might think them entitled, should it be of opinion that they could claim as salvors.

smack, with a view of shewing the amount of remuneration the smack's men were entitled to, cited the Columbia, 3 Hag. Adm. Rep. 428; and Rowe v. Brig, 1 Mason, Amer. Rep. 371.

Waddilove and Twiss, for the mate and seamen of the Florence, contended that the abandonment of the ship had put an end to the contract of hiring and service. They cited Cutter v. Powell, 2 Smith's L.C. 17, note; The Neptune, 1 Hagg. Adm. Rep. 227; Beale v. Thompson, 3 Bos. & Pull. 405; The Governor Raffles, 2 Dods. 17; Mason v. The Ship Blaireau, 2 Cranch, Amer. Rep. 240; 3 Kent's Com. JUDGMENT.

Sir JOHN DODSON.—I shall commence this judgment by a consideration of that very important legal question which was so fully and carefully discussed by counsel at the hearing; and I shall, in the first instance, state what I apprehend that question to be, without reference to the particular circumstances of this particular case. The course which I purpose to follow is this:—I mean first to discuss the general proposition which was so much argued at the bar, and then, whatever may be my opinion of the law, consider whether the facts of this case will bring it within that principle. The next step will be, whether Wills, who commanded the Rising Sun, and the persons with him, are entitled to be salvors, or whether their claims are barred by their conduct; and the same with regard to Veal. Finally, there is this consideration, namely, what are the principles with regard to the amount of salvage which the Court ought to adopt in dealing with a case of this peculiar kind? With respect to the question of law, I conceive it to be as follows: Whether, when a merchant ship is abandoned at sea—sine spe revertendi aut recuperandi—in consequence of damage received, and the state of the elements,—such abandonment taking place bonâ fide and by orders of the master, for the purpose of saving life—the contract entered into by the mariner is by such circumstances entirely put an end to, or whether it is merely interrupted, and capable by occurrence of any, and what circumstances, of being again called into force. I think all the circumstances I have stated are indispensable to the just framing of that proposition. First, the abandonment must take place at sea, and not upon a coast; for if the ship be driven upon a coast, and become a wreck, and the mariners escape to shore, the contract ends to this extent at least—that if they act as salvors, and successfully, so as to save enough to pay their wages, they will be entitled to those, if not to salvage. If they do not so exert themselves their wages will be lost. The well-known case of the Neptune (1 Hagg. Adm. Rep. 227) is an authority for this proposition. Secondly, the abandonment must be "sine spe revertendi;" for no one would contend that a temporary abandonment, such as frequently occurs in collisions from immediate fear, before the state of the ship is known, would vacate the contract. Thirdly, the abandonment must be bonâ fide for the purpose of saving life. Fourthly, it must be by the orders of the master, in consequence of danger, by reason of damage to the ship and the state of the elements. The master is, as I conceive, the proper person to form a judgment whether abandonment be absolutely necessary or not. He is the person whom the owners voluntarily entrusted with the command of their vessel, and the care of the property embarked in it. They must be supposed to have believed him competent to the discharge of the duties committed to him, and especially that he would not, without adequate cause, leave to destruction their property. I think, again, there cannot be a reasonable doubt that in all cases of bonâ fide abandonment the crew are justified in obeying the orders of the master to quit the ship. It must be presumed that he is the most competent judge of the degree of danger, and the last who should quit without a rational belief that there existed that degree of danger to life which rendered the abandonment a duty. I say a duty, for I consider it clearly to be a duty not to sacrifice human life. What is the degree of danger which would justify the master in adopting this measure cannot be defined. Assuming, then, all the circumstances I have stated to be combined, let me, before I consider whether the contract is put an end to, inquire what the contract is which is made with the mariner. The contract itself is for the services of the mariner, as a mariner, during a given voyage. The services are not defined in the contract: the duration is for a voyage or voyages, and sometimes for a specified time. In some special cases provision is made for the termination of the contract, on the occurrence of other circumstances, as the sale of the ship, or the impossibility of getting a cargo. The services, though not defined in writing, are defined by usage, and so, in some cases, is the duration of them, as, for instance, in shipwreck and capture. In shipwreck the contract continues to lie as long as a plank can be saved. By capture, certainly, if there be no recapture, the contract is at once put an end to; and this, I apprehend, whether by an enemy or by pirates; and I may here observe, that, by their calling, mariners are bound to incur a certain degree of danger, whether it proceeds from an enemy, or from pirates, or from the tempestuous state of the elements; but there is a limit to the risk to which every seaman is bound to expose himself. Human life is more valuable in the sight of God and man than any property; and if it should so happen that the choice should lie between them, there can be no doubt as to which should prevail. Fortunately, however, this state can but seldom occur, for if there be a reasonable chance of saving the ship, and consequently the cargo, there must, in almost all cases, be the same reasonable chance of saving the lives of the crew. What is generally the fate of a ship so abandoned at sea? In a large number of cases she is never heard of more; in some she is found by other vessels, which are enabled by their own undamaged condition, and perhaps from a change in the weather, to effect the saving of the abandoned ship. So far as my experience enables me to judge, there is not one case in many thousands in which the seamen obtain possession after her abandonment at sea. I use these words, "at sea," emphatically; for I hold that there is a wide distinction between an abandonment at a distance from land in the open ocean, and the quitting the ship on the coast. Take the crew of a vessel abandoned coming to any port at a distance from home, or from the place where the ship was left, are they not at liberty to form a fresh contract, or are they to wait at a foreign port, and how long; and what is to become of them in the interval? But if a crew so circumstanced are at liberty to form a fresh engagement, is not the former necessarily at an end? What owner or master could legally, or would willingly, engage a seaman followed by a former contract? Can there be any possible motive, as the law now stands, to induce a mariner to abandon his vessel, sine spe revertendi, for that is the proposition? Clearly none, for he loses his wages; and there is no fear, therefore, that a seaman will hastily abandon his vessel. Then, if a mariner's contract be at an end, may he not be a salvor? He then becomes precisely in the situation which belongs to a salvor, according to Lord Stowell's description of him in the case of the Neptune. If it should be said that, allowing a seaman who had belonged to the ship to become a salvor, after abandonment, might lead to an improper and hasty abandonment, I think the answer is twofold: first, that the proposition I am considering is a bonâ fide abandonment, and, if it be otherwise right, in such case, a mere possibility is no argument against it; secondly, that the occurrence of salving [illegible] mariners who have abandoned her at sea so rare, and necessarily so rare, that the danger of ——— by the hope of future salvage is all imaginary. I now turn to the authorities which bear on the question, for all of these I am indebted to the industry of counsel, for I have searched, but in vain, for cases other than those cited in the argument. This Court itself furnishes no direct authority; but from the American courts was cited the case of Mason v. The Ship Blaireau, 2 Crouch's American Rep. 240, which well deserves serious attention. That case appears from the report to have been very diligently argued, and the judgment of the first court was, so far as relates to the present point, affirmed on appeal. The facts of that case, so far as it is necessary to state them, were these:—The Blaireau was abandoned by her master and all the crew, except a seaman of the name of Toole, who was left on board, but under what circumstances does not clearly appear from the report. A Spanish vessel came to her assistance. Toole rendered very efficient aid, and he was held by both the Courts of America entitled to the character of salvor, and he was accordingly largely rewarded as such. I am aware that Lord Stowell repudiated the doctrine which had gained ground in the United States, viz. "that in the case of shipwreck the mariners exerting themselves to save part of the wreck were entitled to salvage;" Lord Stowell having held "that they were not, but to wages only." But the case of the Blaireau was not decided on those grounds. The claim for salvage was upheld expressly upon the principle that the master had discharged the mariner from his contract by the abandonment of the vessel. This case goes the whole length of the reasoning which I have already applied, and beyond it, for it decided that the abandonment was complete, and dissolved the contract with the mariner, although he remained on board the vessel; whether left behind with or without his will does not appear. I give no opinion, for it is unnecessary to do so, what would be the effect of mariners remaining on board against the orders of the master. It is sufficient at present to say that the effect of this case is to shew that the Court of America held abandonment by the master to be a dissolution of the contract. The authority of this case is strongly upheld by other very eminent judges in that country. The books have been cited at the bar, and to them I think it necessary to advert. Kent's Commentaries was one of them. In vol. 3, p. 198, it is stated, "that if a ship has been so abandoned as to discharge the mariner from his contract, if he subsequently contribute to the preservation of the vessel, he will be entitled to salvage." It is clear, then, that Chancellor Kent, a great authority, approved of the doctrine as laid down in the Blaireau, and that he entertained no doubt that a vessel might be so abandoned as to discharge the mariners from their contract; and he must at the same time have been aware that it was the doctrine of the American Courts, since, at p. 199, he cites the case of the Two Catherines, reported in 2 Mason, 319, in which it was laid down that "the character of seamen creates no incapacity to assume that of salvors, and though the contract be not dissolved by shipwreck, and it be the duty of seamen to remain and labour to preserve the ship and cargo, yet they may be entitled to recompense by way of salvage for their peculiar services." It matters not that the latter doctrine has not obtained in our courts, a clear distinction is taken between abandonment and shipwreck. The same doctrine is again set forth in Hobart v. Drogan, 10 Peters, 122. The facts of that case do not apply to the case before us, but some of the observations of Mr. Justice Story do, for he says, "That seamen, in the ordinary course of things, in the performance of their duties, are not allowed to become salvors, whatever may have been the perils or hardships or gallantry of their services in saving the ship and cargo; I say in the ordinary course of things, for extraordinary events may occur in which their connection with the ship may be dissolved de facto, or by operation of law, or they may exceed their [illegible] which cases they may be permitted to claim as salvors." "Such," he then says, "was the case of the Blaireau to which I have referred." To the extent, and to the extent only, that the connection of the mariner with the ship may be dissolved by circumstances beyond his control, such as abandonment for the preservation of life, I recognise this authority. Another case, that of Bele v. Thompson, 3 Bos. & Pull. 405, was cited, and much commented upon at the hearing. The substance of that case consisted in the question, whether the crews of British ships detained in Russia by reason of an embargo issued under the orders of the Russian government in the year 1800, were entitled to wages during the time the ships were so detained. In that case the seamen returned on board as soon as the Russian government released them and their ships, and they navigated them home. If the original contract was terminated by the Russian orders, of course the mariners could not be entitled by virtue of that contract to any wages after its termination. That it was so terminated, three out of four of the judges of the Court of C. P. decided; but these three were not unanimous in opinion, for one of them, Mr. Justice Rooke, was of opinion that the [illegible] to recover, but deferred his opinion in order that a judgment might be arrived at. Lord Alvanley alone declared himself in favour of the plaintiffs. I do not think this case throws much light upon the question under consideration. It was argued that an embargo does not dissolve the contract, and that clearly is so because it is but of a temporary character. It was argued that capture puts an end to the earning of wages, but the effect of a recapture was not distinctly argued. I cannot extract from this report any principle directly applicable to this case. The real question is, what is that vis major which puts an end to the contract? Lord Alvanley says, "That as long as the contract subsists, there can be no interruption; it is either entirely at an end or entirely subsists;" but he immediately follows this up by saying, "that capture puts an end to the contract, but not capture one day and recapture the next; but capture followed by a total loss does put an end to the contract." The effect of this latter dictum is, that capture does not put an end to the contract, but leaves it in abeyance, to be revived by recapture,—not easily to be reconciled with the former expressions. The true question is, whether there was a vis major of so permanent a character as to dissolve the contract, a permanent according to all human probability, for the law never can depend on mere possibilities. Assuming, then, the law to be, though I give no opinion upon it, that capture followed by a total loss puts an end to the contract, and that capture followed by recapture, the mariners remaining on board, does not either put an end to or revive the contract; I still think there is a strong distinction between capture and abandonment at sea; they are, it is true, both vis major, but the probability of recapture is not an unlikely event; the probability of recovering a ship abandoned at sea is so small as very seldom to occur, and can scarcely be in contemplation when the abandonment takes place. The present is the first instance of it to my knowledge. If capture alone puts an end to the contract, which appears to have been the leaning of Lord Stowell (The Governor Raffles, 2 Dods. 18), then à fortiori abandonment ex necessitate would do so. Upon the whole, I have come to the conclusion that, under the circumstances I have stated, an abandonment at sea does vacate the contract. The next inquiry is, whether the facts of this case bring it within the terms of the proposition stated. In the first instance I will look to the statement of the owners, which is, that the Florence was a vessel of 640 tons, manned with a crew of thirty-seven persons, and sailed from Liverpool on the 5th Dec. 1850, bound to the coast of Africa. The ship soon after leaving port encountered a series of tempestuous weather, whereby the rudder was ultimately carried away; that the ship became unmanageable, and that part of her cargo was thrown overboard; that in consequence of blue lights the steamer Montrose came down to the Florence, that she was taken in tow; that the hawser parted; that the lieutenant in charge of the mails refused to allow the steamer to continue to tow the vessel longer; that Pearson, the master, resolved then to abandon the ship, as there was no vessel in sight to render assistance in case of the return of stormy weather; that at two o'clock they all went on board the Montrose, Pearson being the last to quit; that they quitted so precipitately that the greater part of their clothes were left behind. The owners, after this statement, cannot aver that this was not an abandonment by order of the master, in apprehension, of danger to life. It was, too, a bonâ fide abandonment for that reason; and looking to the state of the ship, what she had suffered, the place she was in, above thirty miles from land, in the Bay of Biscay, and the season of the year, it is equally clear there was cause for that apprehension, and that the seamen were justified in obeying the orders of the master. I consider that the facts of the case do bring it within the terms of the proposition stated, and that it was an abandonment sine animo revertendi. If left to herself the wind must inevitably either have driven her out to sea or wrecked her upon the coast. The contract, then, with the mariners was, I think, at an end, not suspended, but terminated. Their right to wages was gone, and would have been if a year's wages had been due to them. I now proceed to state the claims of the two classes of salvors who have sued for a salvage remuneration. The first party are the owners, master, and crew of the Rising Sun, the second parties are Veal, originally the mate of the Florence, and two of the mariners who were with him. Holding that they may be entitled to salvage, I come to consider the services [illegible] performed, to what remuneration they are [illegible], and how far that salvage recompense, may be diminished, [illegible] wholly taken away by proved misconduct on their part. The vessel having been found by the smack, Rising Sun, she was taken in tow. At about 8 o'clock, on the morning of the 21st, the master, Wills, saw the Madrid steamer, bound for England; shortly after which, Veal, the mate of the Florence, came in a boat from the steamer, and asked him if he would stay by the ship, to which he consented. Sixteen or seventeen of the crew of the Florence also came on board from the Madrid steamer, and the vessel was ultimately conducted to Corunna, on the 30th of December. If this be a true statement, there can be no doubt that the Rising Sun assisted in the performance of a salvage service of great merit. The owners, however, have preferred a very serious charge against Wills—that of spoliation and robbery—which, if proved in the manner alleged, would extinguish all claim to any reward whatever. (The learned Judge then examined the evidence adduced as to this charge, and came to the conclusion that it was not proved.) With regard to Veal and the crew quitting the vessel, I do not doubt that, under all the circumstances, they were fully justified in so doing. I cannot perhaps form a very accurate opinion as to the degree of danger which the vessel was in, but so much is clear, that she had suffered greatly from tempestuous [illegible] ther, and that, in the judgment of the [illegible] was a case for abandonment. The next qu[illegible] the return of Veal and his companions on [illegible] ship. It appears, that by order of the lie[illegible] charge of the mails, the Madrid, upon falling with the Florence, was not allowed to take her [illegible] tow, and it is alleged by the owners that Pearson, the master, was ready to have returned on board, but that Veal and the crew refused to accompany him, and would only go without him as salvors. On the part of Veal, this is all denied; he alleges that Pearson would not go on board, and endeavoured also to discourage them. From the evidence of the captain of the Madrid, and the officers on board, I derive the conclusion, that Veal did not misconduct himself on this occasion, and that his courage in taking charge of the vessel, with less than half the original crew, was most praiseworthy. But a charge was brought against Veal and those who accompanied him of robbery, or connivance at robbery, and the improper waste and consumption of the ship's provisions—wines and preserved meats—part of the cargo. [After examining the evidence adduced in support of the charge, the learned judge said:] I am of opinion that the charge of robbery is not established; at the same time I think there is good reason to conclude that the expenditure of liquors and provisions was extravagant, though I am of opinion that great allowance ought to be made for persons who undertook the salvage of this ship under such difficult and trying circumstances. The only question, then, that remains, is the amount of salvage due to the parties. It was, no doubt, anciently the practice to award the moiety of the property found derelict to the salvors, but that practice has been departed from for a long space of time. The reason for a large reward in such cases was danger to the property in the highest degree, and no more. The value of the property salved is about 14,000*l*. I shall allot to the Rising Sun 1,200*l*. to Veal I shall decree 500*l*. and to each of the other two salvors 150*l*.

Erratum.—The name of Sir John Dodson was erroneously stated as that of the judge in this case, instead of Dr. Lushington. The title of it was also omitted; it is the case of The Florence.

Stoddart v. Grant and Others.

Probate—Several wills—Implied revocation—My "last" will—Same solicitor preparing several wills—Alterations and erasures.

An illiterate old lady left seven testamentary writings, each purporting to be "my will," and the third and fourth to be "my last will," and four were in her own handwriting. There were alterations, and words written on erasures, in the first four documents by testatrix, and blanks and misspelled words abounded. None of the documents revoked specially or generally any prior wills, though the first, fifth, and sixth were prepared by the same solicitor, and the sixth referred to the fifth, but to no other as an existing will. Several legatees had each legacies of different amounts under two or more of the instruments. No residuary legatee was named except by the first, though the sixth reserved power to do so, which power was never executed. There were ample funds to satisfy the legacies given by all the instruments:

Held, the whole seven instruments were to be admitted to probate as the will.

If a testator leave several documents, each purporting to be "my last will," this expression is mere matter of form, and does not imply revocation of preceding documents; and if the same solicitor has prepared several of the wills found at death, and in the last has not specially or generally revoked any prior will, this circumstance rather goes to support the supposition that testator intended all the instruments to be valid.

This was an appeal from the Court of Session in Scotland. Mrs. Agnes Bell, widow, died in Edinburgh, March 23, 1846. On examining her repositories, seven testamentary writings were found, nearly all of which purported to be wills. The executors named in the last of these submitted the whole of the documents to the Court of Session as a Court of Probate, and cited the next of kin and others interested, when Miss Martha Stoddart (the appellant), who was a legatee under five of the documents, contended that the whole seven were valid testamentary writings, and ought to be held as together making up the will. These writings were of the following description:—The first (No. 1) was dated 15th Aug. 1828, and was prepared by Mr. Gibson, the solicitor of the testatrix. It recited a deed of agreement and separation executed in the English form by testatrix and her husband, to the effect that a moiety of 8,333*l.* 6s. 8d. of Three per Cents. was thereby directed to stand vested in trustees therein named, who were to pay the same to testatrix if she survived her husband, and if she died during his lifetime then to such persons as she should by will appoint. This power she thus proceeded to execute:—"And now seeing that I am desirous to settle the succession in the event of my death to the above-mentioned moiety of the aforesaid sum of Three per Cent. Consolidated Annuities, therefore to prevent all disputes after my decease, and for the favour which I bear to the several parties hereinafter mentioned, I do hereby dispose, assign, give, grant, and bequeath,—first, the sum of five hundred pounds to Martha Stoddart," &c. The word five was written on an erasure, and there were three other similar words on erasures in the instrument. This will concludes with appointing a residuary legatee, trustees, and an executor, after which, "and I reserve full power at any time of my life to alter, revoke, or add to these presents, as I may think proper." The second document (No. 2) was dated July, 1837, and was in testatrix's handwriting. It began, "I, Agnes Bell, &c. hereby make my will and testament; I hereby nominate and appoint trustees as follows." (Then follow the names of trustees.) Amongst other bequests is this:—"To Miss Marty Stoddert (appellant), and her brother, Richard Stoddart, residing in Constitution-street, Leith, I leave and bequeath the sum of 50*l.* yearly, or the longest liver of them." Several blanks occur in this instrument, and no residuary legatee is appointed, but the last sentence is as follows:—"And also whatever other legacy, or whatever else I may afterwards name, either on this, or on any other piece of paper, they trustees will have the goodness to order to be paid." The third instrument (No. 3), is also in testatrix's handwriting, dated January 2, 1840, and begins,—"I, Agnes Barclay, &c. widow of Dr. Bell, do hereby make my last will, and I do hereby leave and bequeath," &c. Then follow bequests to charities and individuals, some of whom were former legatees, thus:—"I bequeath to Miss Marthy Stodd (appellant) 20*l.* yearly, to be paid yearly." No residuary legatee or executor is appointed, nor is any reference made to former wills. The fourth (No. 4), also in testatrix's handwriting, begins,—"This is my will and testament, 1842; 3, George's-place, Edinburgh. I, Agnes Bell, &c. do hereby make my last will and testament, and I do hereby leave, bequeath all the furniture," &c. She merely bequeaths the furniture and wearing apparel to her servant absolutely, adding, "this only in the event of my death, and leave myself a power of altering this at any time." No other bequests are given. The fifth document (No. 5), was prepared by Mr. Gibson, the same solicitor who prepared No. 1, and is dated June 26, 1844, and begins,—"I, Mrs. Agnes Bell, &c. with a view to the settlement of my property hereinafter conveyed, in the event of my death, do hereby assign and dispone," &c. She then gives her house and furniture to her servant, as in No. 4, for life only, then to Martha Stoddart for life, whom failing, to another, "equally between them and their heirs in fee." None of her personal property is bequeathed by this instrument, nor any executor appointed; and at the end is the following:—"And I reserve my own life-rent of the whole premises, and full power to alter or revoke these presents, in whole or in part, at any time during my life, as I shall think proper, but in so far as not altered, I do hereby declare the same to be valid and effectual, though found undelivered in my repositories, or in the custody of any person to whom I may entrust the same at the time of my death, dispensing with the delivery hereof." The sixth document (No. 6), prepared by the same solicitor, who drew No. 1 and No. 5, is dated May 3, 1845, and begins,—"I, Mrs. Agnes Bell, &c. considering that I some time executed a settlement of my dwelling-house furniture, and other articles therein contained, and that I have now resolved to make a settlement of my personal estate in manner hereinafter written, therefore I do hereby leave and bequeath, first." Then follow legacies to charitable institutions, and persons who were legatees in former documents; amongst others this—"And I leave and bequeath to Miss Martha Stoddart, of Charlotte-street, Leith, during all the days of her lifetime, and after her death to her brother Richard Stoddart, Leith, during all the days of his lifetime, a free yearly annuity of 30*l.*" At the end of this document is this clause,—"And I reserve full power to myself, at any time in my life, to revoke or alter these presents in whole or in part, as I shall think proper, and also full power to me hereafter to name residuary legatees, and to appoint executors for carrying my will into execution." No other reference was made to her former wills, and neither residuary legatees nor executors were appointed. The seventh document (No. 7), has no date, but from internal evidence was admitted to be subsequent to No. 6. It is in testatrix's handwriting, and begins,—"I do hereby add this codicil to my will, and do hereby nominate and appoint the following executors." Then follow the names of respondent and others, as executors, with occasional blanks in the designations. No residuary legatee is appointed, but a legacy is given of 200*l.* to each executor.

With respect to the above instruments, the following facts appeared. The testatrix, at her death, left ample funds to satisfy the legacies in all the seven instruments, and her property had been gradually increasing as she made these successive instruments. The early instruments contained several blanks, and words written on erasures—the latter in testatrix's own handwriting. The third and fourth documents began as "My last will," the others as "My will," or in words equivalent. In several instances the same person was legatee in two or more of the documents, and the legacies to such were sometimes of the same amount, but generally of a different amount. The same solicitor prepared the first, fifth, and sixth instruments. The sixth referred to the fifth, but to no other as a co-existing instrument but neither the fifth nor the sixth revoked special or generally any of the prior instruments. The first instrument alone named a residuary legatee, but the sixth reserved power to name both executors and residuary legatees, and in the seventh such executors were named, but no residuary legatee was ever appointed. In the fourth instrument, testatrix gave her house and furniture absolutely, and in the fifth she gave the same house and furniture to the same person for life only. On weighing all these circumstances, the Court below came to the conclusion that the three last instruments alone ought to be admitted to probate. From this interlocutor Martha Stoddart now appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord TRURO.—My Lords, the question in this case is, whether certain papers left by a lady of the name of Bell, should be held to form her last will and testament. It is a question of that nature which is exceedingly unpleasant to decide upon, and it is one upon which, from its nature and circumstances, very different opinions may be formed. From several papers left by the same person—an individual very illiterate, and in all probability not very nicely weighing the expressions which she adopted from time to time,—you have to collect what her will and intention was with regard to these several papers, whether it was her intention, that the one should supersede the other or others, or whether she intended that they should be all deemed to be her last will and testament, and that they should be executed, subject to alterations from time to time which she might express, leaving at the same time the matter in such a position as that it would be possible to execute these papers as her will, subject to such alterations as were made My lords, the general rule applicable to the case is perfectly clear. I am not aware that there is any exception to be found anywhere,—and the rule is this, that all questions relating to wills should be decided by looking to the whole contents of the documents, with a view to discover what is fairly to be inferred as the intention of the testator. I will just call your lordships' attention to various circumstances in this case, which are relied upon on each side. In the first place in support of the opinion that the will ought to be deemed to consist of the three last documents, reliance is placed upon the words used "the last will." Now several of those documents do profess to be the last will, as of course they were: but these words "last will," found in testamentary papers have for a very long time been the subject of comment. Such questions have more generally arisen, I should observe, with regard to real estate. The question of what constitutes a will in this country with regard to personalty is decided by the Ecclesiastical Courts; but the question, as to what constitutes a will with regard to real property, is decided by the Courts of Common Law, though the same principle applies to both. In Thomas v. Evans, 2 East, 489, which related to real property, Lord Ellenborough states the facts of the case, and he says,—"So circumstanced he makes another will, which he describes as his last will, on which stress is laid; and so indeed it was his last will with regard to his newly acquired property. But it is not enough to say, that by making this will in terms large enough to include all his property, he must therefore have meant to revoke the former will, unless it be shewn, that he has made a disposition of the same property inconsistent with it, especially since the case of Harwood v. Goodright, and of Hutchins v. Basset. It is said that he must have intended either to confirm or revoke the dispositions contained in the first will; but there is a third proposition,—he might not have contemplated to do either, but to make a more collateral disposition of other property, and that seems to have been the case." He then further remarks, "Here the devisor has concluded by declaring his intention to dispose of the rest of his real and personal estate by a codicil thereafter to be made." That seems equivalent to this lady's reservation (in No. 6) of the nomination of residuary legatees. "The plain sense of which is, that instead of having two distinct instruments, he meant to dispose of his personal property, the bequest of which had lapsed by the death of his mother, and also of his real property, which he had acquired subsequent to his first will, and by means of a codicil to connect the two instruments, and make it all one will." Lawrence, J. also says, "The circumstances relied on to shew that the subsequent instrument was a revocation of the former, are, first, that the testator calls it his last will; to which the true answer was given at the bar, that it is merely a word of form, and he meant no more by it than that it was the last of those instruments which he had executed." My lords, I do not apprehend that in reality those words ought to receive any weight whatever in deciding this question. The next ground which is laid down by the learned judges is, that the last of the papers, which the majority of the judges were of opinion should be deemed a testamentary paper, was prepared by a professional man. I own that it strikes me, that that argument rather tells the other way. Mr. Gibson appears to have been this lady's adviser for a considerable period, as he prepared the deed of 1828 (No. 1), as well as that of 1845 (No. 6). It is perfectly well known among professional men, that when called in to prepare a will, it is proper to ascertain whether there be any former testamentary paper; and if there be, what is the intention of the testator who is about to make a new will, whether he intends to revoke it, or to make this new will subsidiary and additional. And as this gentleman had prepared that deed (No. 1), in which there was a power of revocation expressly reserved, it does strike me that the circumstance is very much in favour of those papers, this document being prepared by a professional man, and not containing any clause of revocation on the part of this lady, whose disposition for making wills might to a degree have been known to her professional advisor; but whether it was so or not, it was very likely, that in the length of time that had elapsed, this lady might have made testamentary papers. I cannot help thinking, therefore, that if it had been intended to revoke such papers, the professional man would have inserted such a clause; and supposing him to possess, as no doubt he did, ordinary intelligence, I can hardly imagine he would have omitted inquiring whether there were any former testamentary papers, and more particularly as he had himself prepared one in 1828. I should have supposed, with a professional man making a will, who had prepared a former paper which was to operate as a testament, as the deed of 1828 (No. 1) was, that it was more natural that such a person would have introduced a clause of revocation, if the testator had intended it, and that he would have taken care clearly to understand whether there was any previous testamentary paper which she desired to revoke. That is one of the circumstances that is put forward; it is one of those from which different men may draw different conclusions of equal authority; but those are not circumstances which the law permits to revoke a will: it is not upon speculation of expressions used in the will, or circumstances which are just as much open to the one conclusion as the other, that the Courts act. The object is to ascertain the intention of the testator.

You find that she has left certain papers, which, from their import, are testamentary; having preserved them all, subject to another circumstance which I shall mention, primâ facie they are all to be taken as one will. Then, if you say a portion of them is not to be so taken, I think there should be something more than that upon which you may conjecture or may guess, for your guess and your conjecture may lead to the very opposite conclusion to that which a person of equal professional experience and equal common sense would draw. The next circumstance referred to is, that the will of 1845 (No. 6) refers to one paper only,—that one paper, your lordships will have observed, is the paper (No. 5) which disposes of the house in particular. That also had been prepared by Mr. Gibson, and he refers to that in very general terms. The paper says, "Having disposed of so and so by such a paper, I now propose to settle my personal estate." I own I cannot understand why, from the circumstance of that gentleman, when alluding to the disposition of a particular property, referring to a previous paper which had been prepared by himself, it should be supposed, from a reference to that paper and no reference to the others, that that was the only paper which was intended to be continued and confirmed by the subsequent documents—it strikes me that that is much too uncertain to form the ground of any such conclusion. It is further observed that the executors are named; but it is perfectly plain that there were yet important things to be done, that is to say, there was a disposition of the residue. Now, it is very true that she did a very important act in naming executors: she had done so before, and she had done it before in cases where it appears to me there was nothing whatever upon the face of the document to import an intention to revoke the previous documents, nor can I draw any inference from that circumstance. My lords, there is another circumstance relied on, which appears to me also rather to weigh against the conclusion which has been formed,—that is to say, that as to the earlier testamentary papers, some of them are altered by the lady—erasures are made, and new matter is written upon the erasures. My lords, that seems to me rather to imply that she altered it, as far as she intended that it should be altered; and the leaving the paper with those alterations rather imports an intention on her part that it should continue to operate as a testamentary paper, subject to the alterations, and that there was no intention to destroy it by those means; and further than that, when the paper is preserved in the house with others—and I believe that they were stowed in the same places of deposit, but at least they were stowed in places of deposit equally calculated to keep them secure,—I think that is a circumstance rather in favour of her intending them to operate than the other way. But that is another instance of the danger of drawing conclusions from slight circumstances, which are open to two constructions. I think that it would tend very much to diminish the power of testators over their property, if the rule were to be acted upon, that from any expressions which anybody can lay hold of, you may draw conclusions adverse to the continuance of the previous documents, and therefore hold that they might be revoked. I do not understand the law to be such: as I understand the law, if you can execute the whole of the papers as one testament, you are bound to do so. It is said that the dispositions are inconsistent. I can hardly call them inconsistent. It is very true that in one case she gives the house and furniture absolutely, and she afterwards cuts down that interest to a life interest. She gives the household furniture, except such as shall be marked; and that which is marked is to go to the person indicated by the mark. But has it ever been contended, that the mere circumstance of a subsequent testamentary paper, cutting down and diminishing the interest which had been given by the previous one, was to be held to be an entire revocation of the will. I am not aware of any authority whatever for that proposition, and I do not see, that in this case the subsequent bequests have any other effect than that of modifying the previous bequests. The next remark is, that legacies are repeated to the same persons. What is the inference from that? Why that happens constantly, viz. that the question arises, whether cumulative or substitutional legacies are intended to be given to the same persons by the previous and subsequent papers. But you do not hold that to be any evidence of an intention to revoke—it becomes a question with reference to the particular legacy, how you shall deal with it—whether you shall deal with it as revoked or not. But that this lady, whose property is said to have been growing from time to time, should give 30*l.* to an object of her bounty in one case, and 200*l.* to this person in another case, does not seem to me, the lady living and growing richer, inconsistent at all. My lords, I think I have adverted to all the circumstances which are relied on by the learned judges who held the former papers to be revoked. I think I have mentioned them all—not that the judges all adopted the same grounds—some think the erasure important—others think it not important—it will be found that there are differences of opinion, and different inferences drawn from some of the circumstances among the learned judges, who adopt the conclusion as to the revocation of the earlier testaments. Having stated what appears to me to have been the foundation of the opinion of the learned judges adverse to the continuance of the previous testaments, I will call your lordships' attention to what is relied upon by those who hold the contrary opinion. They rely upon the very alterations in the uncancelled papers, which formed the subject of the opposite inference by the other learned judges, and they also rely upon the papers being uncancelled—they also rely upon the continuance of the power which the lady refers to of revocation and alteration, because in several papers she says,—"I reserve to myself to alter them in all or in part,"—showing therefore the probability that an alteration might take place in her intention, without her intending absolutely to revoke the whole documents. That is to be found in three or four of the papers. I have remarked upon the last papers being prepared by a professional man, and that is another of the circumstances from which the judges draw opposite conclusions. One of the conclusions I draw from that is, that it rather tends to shew that revocation was not intended, when there is the omission of so necessary and so ordinary a provision, and one so likely to occur to a professional man, and I think the omission of that, where the document was drawn by a professional man, is much more favourable to the continuance of these former documents than if it had been drawn by the lady herself. And more than that, when I see that this lady is animated by the same benevolent spirit from the period from 1828 to 1845, and that she is constantly giving legacies to charitable institutions, I can discover no reason to warrant the conclusion that, because she gave legacies to new institutions, or increased her legacies to the old institutions, she meant to revoke the former bequest. I think, on the contrary, it marks the continuance of the same feeling, and, considering that her property was accumulating, it is but an exercise of the same benevolent disposition, and which leads to any conclusion rather than that she was disposed to do less for these institutions instead of more. I have explained to your lordships what I consider to be the general rule, viz. that all these documents, being found under circumstances which entitle them to consideration, are primâ facie to be regarded as one will. They may be altered, and they may be partially revoked, or they may be inconsistent, without the latter operating as an entire revocation of the former. The circumstance of a partial inconsistency, as it is called, that is to say, dispositions in two documents, both of which cannot be fulfilled, is held only to operate as a revocation pro tanto, and only to bear upon the particular legacy in which that inconsistency exists. And the general rule being that the onus is upon those who seek to impeach those documents, the question is, whether your lordships are satisfied with the reasons which are assigned by the very learned judges below. If those reasons satisfy your lordships, then they form a proper judicial ground from which to infer this intention to revoke the previous papers. I own they appear to me to be in themselves but slight, and they appear to me, being slight in themselves, to be outweighed by the circumstances which tend to the opposite conclusion. Therefore, my lords, I do not think it necessary to trouble your lordships by referring to the text-books for those principles, which are too well understood by the profession to render it at all necessary, and particularly as I do not find that any of them are in any respect impeached by what has fallen from the learned judges who have pronounced an opinion, which does not appear to be warranted by the principles which are admitted. I think that the principles are admitted, but that in this case there has been a misapplication of those principles to the particular case. Your lordships will have observed that the question as to what part of the will may be revoked, as to what legacies may be cumulative, or what may be substitutional, is a matter not now before your lordships. The interlocutor of the Court below is to the effect, that the testament is to be deemed to consist of only three documents to the exclusion of the previous four. Thus, therefore, if your lordships shall take the view which occurs to me as the correct view to be taken, namely, that there is nothing to be found upon the face of those latter papers to warrant the conclusion that the former papers were intended to be revoked, the case must go back to the Court of Session to consider those papers, and to give effect to different parts of them as by law they may: where there is an inconsistency it will operate as a partial revocation; where the inconsistency is only of such a nature as that the general intention can yet be executed, the general intention will prevail. I therefore fully submit to your lordships that this interlocutor should be revoked and the case remitted to the Court of Session.

Re The St. James's Club—Ex parte Greenway.

Winding-up Acts—Clubs—Contributory.

Clubs are not within the operation of the Winding-up Acts.

If any member of a club gives or concurs in the giving of an order to a tradesman for goods to be supplied on the behalf of the club, he is liable for its payment.

This was an appeal from an order of the Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce.

In 1848 the club was formed, for the benefit and convenience of officers of the Militia, the Yeomanry, and the East-India Company's Service, and its affairs becoming embarrassed, a meeting of its members took place, when it was agreed that it should be dissolved, and its business suspended.

On the petition of the committee of management for the winding up of its affairs under the Act, the Vice-Chancellor made the order. (17 Law T. Rep. 219.) From this one of the members of the club appealed.

The 7th and 8th clauses of the 5th section of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 45, provided that;—"If any company shall have been dissolved, or shall have ceased to carry on business, or shall be carrying on business only for the purpose of winding up its affairs, and the same shall not be completely wound up," "or if any other matter or thing shall be shewn, which, in the opinion of the Court, shall render it just and equitable, the company should be dissolved."

The 1st sec. of the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 108, declares that notwithstanding anything in the said Act contained importing a more limited application thereof, the same shall apply to all partnerships, associations, and companies, whereof the partners or associates are not less than seven in number, whether incorporated or unincorporated, and whether formed or subsisting before or after the passing of the said Act, or this Act, other than and except railway companies incorporated by Act of Parliament, to which companies such Act shall not apply."

Bacon and Burdon supported the appeal.

Malins and Toulmin, contrà.

The cases of Mountcashel v. Robertson (not reported); Fleming v. Hector, 2 M. & W. 172; Richardson v. Hastings, 7 Bea. 301, 323, 354; and 11 Bea. 17; and also the several Acts of Parliament which are referred to in the judgment were cited.

The Lord Chancellor.—The question involved in this case is of great importance, though of itself very simple. It is this—Are clubs, in the ordinary acceptance of that term, within the scope and operation of the Winding-up Acts? The judge in the Court below thought that they were. This must depend on the construction of certain Acts of Parliament, and in construing those Acts the nature and constitution of associations calling themselves clubs must not be overlooked. They are now very numerous, and nearly all of the same character, although, looking at the rules of the one now under consideration, they appear to be more than ordinarily stringent as to the character and conduct of the members, and are very definite as to the measures which should be proposed at the general meetings. In this club, however, as in all others, a man could not become a member without having been elected, nor after he had been elected unless he paid a large entrance fee and an annual subscription. Being in this manner admitted a member, what was his interest as an individual member, and what were his liabilities? No doubt so long as a person continues a member he has an interest in the general assets of the company; and if it were broken up while he remained a member he would maintain a suit for the administration of those assets; but he has no interest that is transferable; he cannot sell it; he cannot give, transfer, or bequeath it; and therefore it is not in the ordinary sense the interest of anything like, or approaching to, a partnership. If the club were dissolved he would be entitled to his share of the assets, and nothing more. As regards the liability of the members, nothing would be more mischievous than a decision of either this Court or of a Court of Law which would make clubs subject to the operation of the Winding-up Acts. Such a decision would have the effect of deterring persons from entering into or continuing members of them; and, considering the general utility of such associations, I am happy to say that the law does not, as has been erroneously supposed, render any of the members liable to the creditors of the club except for what they may have individually ordered or agreed to become liable. The law at one time took an unreasonable view of the liability incurred in such cases, for it held that a member was answerable for expenses and supplies to the incurring or ordering of which he had been no party, and I consider that the order of the Court below strikes very forcibly at the root of such associations, and it, therefore, becomes important to see whether such a decision can be supported. That must depend on the construction of several Acts of Parliament. What is the true construction of the Act 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110? That Act is expressly confined to "trading and commercial companies," and its provisions apply only to companies established for the purposes of profit; and are only applicable to such companies. In this club, so far as the members were concerned, there was undoubtedly a benefit,—a personal enjoyment; but profit, in the ordinary sense of the word, there was none. With respect to the next Act, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 45, that in a sense might be considered to have enlarged the provisions of the former Act, but it must be remembered that that Act was passed to wind up companies that were unable to meet ther pecuniary engagements. Then comes the 12th and 13th Vict. c. 108, the construction of which had given rise to the only difficulty that this case presents. Now, this last statute was meant to confine itself to the objects of the former Act, and was passed for the same purpose, to amend that Act, but the language used in the 1st section is certainly more extensive. Under that section it was contended that a club, being an association, came within the description, and was therefore subject to its operation. I am of opinion that it does not. The Court is bound to give not a literal, but a natural and reasonable construction of the language of the Act. The Act must be construed, not as standing by itself, but it must be taken in connection with the other Acts, of which it formed a part, and I must deal with it as if the whole formed one body of legislation. These latter Acts did not relate to the formation, but to the dissolution of companies, and their various enactments simplify the manner in which the dissolution is to take place. Those companies which can be brought within the operation of the Winding-up Acts are defined—they are described as "companies, associations, and partnerships, whereof the capital or the profits is or are to be divided," &c. In this club no man could ever receive any dividend; and although it may be an association, yet that is no reason that it should be such an one as is pointed out in the last Act. I cannot hold that it is. That Act I must construe as only interpreting the former Acts; and it is so dovetailed and incorporated into them, that to give it a more extensive signification would be a very dangerous proceeding. Were I to hold that all associations of gentlemen or clubs were subject to the operation of the Winding-up Acts, I must go further, I must say that every cricket club and archery society, or even charitable societies, can be wound up. The term "association" must have a limited signification. It is not, that because a society may have an annual subscription and an entrance-fee, and commensurate benefits, that it is to be an association within the meaning of the Act. Such associations as those to which I have alluded have benefits which no member of a club ever could have. An association may mean a partnership, yet to make it a partnership it must be associated for the purposes of trading and for the making of profits. As Lord Bacon was once said to have expressed himself on the Act applying to uses, so shall I to this; I shall not state what associations are within the operations of the Act, but what are not; and looking at the character and objects of these clubs, the connection with which is purely voluntary, I cannot say that they are associations within its provisions. Many a man belongs to a club not intending ever to set his foot within the door of it; others pay their annual subscription and never interfere in their management. Members cease their connection with clubs by stopping their subscriptions, and on their leaving they can claim no benefit. They may be turned out, they cannot be compelled to pay their subscriptions; if they cease to pay they lose all their interest; there is no liability between the members, and, therefore, there is no partnership. It is impossible to say that the word "club" can come under any of the denominations specified in the Act. The judges are bound not unnecessarily to extend the meaning of those words. I have given the word its real meaning—its true and natural meaning. At the passing of those Acts clubs were well known; and had the Legislature meant that they should have been included, they would have been particularly mentioned. Adhering, therefore, to the natural construction of the Act, I am of opinion that the association therein named does not apply to a club. Although I have decided that individual members of those clubs are not liable to its debts and engagements, yet, if any member should give or should concur in giving an order to a tradesman he would become liable on his own contract. I am of opinion that the power which the committee had to raise money did not authorise them to borrow the 5,000*l.* in the manner in which they have done: they have exceeded their powers. They were to raise money by debentures: instead of that they borrowed, and gave their promissory notes for the amounts; and they, and not the general body of members are responsible for its payment. It is with great deference that I discharge the order for winding up the affairs of this club, inasmuch as I am differing from the very able judge who decided the case in the court below. I shall give no costs. Appeal allowed.

Private nuisance—Injunction restraining the burning of bricks—Waiver of issue at law on the hearing of a motion.

Prior to the year 1829 W. erected a dwelling-house on land belonging to him, and laid out the land adjoining as a garden and pleasure-ground. S. the owner of the adjoining land, in 1850, converted part of his property into a brick-field, and began burning the bricks in a clamp, whic was erected within forty-eight yards of the windows of W.'s house:

Held, affirming the decision of the Court below, that W. was entitled to an injunction to restrain S. from continuing to burn bricks.

Where parties, defendant and plaintiff, decline to try an action as to matters alleged in a bill, and request the decision of the Court upon a motion without any assistance from a jury or a Court of Law, from that decision they cannot appeal.

This was an appeal motion from an order made by the Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce, restraining the defendant from burning or making bricks, as a nuisance; and which order commenced with a declaration that the defendant and plaintiff declined to try an action, and requested the decision of the Court upon the motion, without any assistance from a jury or a Court of Law.

The case is fully reported 17 Law T. Rep. 103.

Malins, Shebbeare, and E. G. White, appeared in support of the appeal motion, and contended that, although bound by the decision of the Court below to admit the nuisance, yet that the nuisance being such a one as the Court would not restrain by injunction, the order ought to be discharged. They cited Duke of Grafton v. Hilliard, mentioned by Lord Eldon in The Attorney-General v. Cleaver, 18 Ves. 219, 211; Barwell v. Brooks, 1 Law T. 75 & 454; Elmhirst v. Spencer, 2 Mac. & G. 45; Soltau v. De Held, 19 Law T. Rep. 162.

Rolt and G. W. Collins appeared in support of the order of the Vice-Chancellor, and referred the Court to Rex v. White, 1 Burr. 333; and Stewart v. Forbes, 1 Mac. & G. 137. They were not called upon for any argument.

The LORD CHANCELLOR confirmed the order of the Court below, observing that there was no question as to the jurisdiction of the Court to deal with matters similar to that now under discussion, if a case had been made out. As to the authority of The Duke of Grafton v. Hilliard, his lordship had a MS. note, from which he was induced to think that the ground upon which the ex parte injunction was dissolved rested on the fact, that although there might be a nuisance, yet that no nuisance was then proved to exist. His lordship also considered that, as the parties had taken the opinion of the Vice-Chancellor in the place of an issue at law, they were bound by his decision, and could not be heard as appealing from it. Such a declaration of the Court was tantamount to a verdict of a jury, and therefore in a case of established nuisance he could not interfere. His lordship could not do otherwise than consider this a nuisance, and it was not competent for him to enter into the question as to what nuisance it was. The parties had, in fact, agreed upon the injunction, and that injunction must be contnued. Appeal dismissed, with costs.

Injunction—Covenant in Lease.

A covenant contained the words, "that the lessee should not carry on any trade, business, or calling," on the premises in question:

Held, that the carrying on of a school for young ladies was a calling, within the terms of the restrictive covenant, and the Court (affirming the decision of the Vice-Chancellor) granted an injunction restraining the same from being carried on.

This was a motion to discharge an injunction granted by the Vice-Chancellor Lord Cranworth, restraining the defendant from carrying on the business of a school-mistress at Sussex-square, Brighton.

The facts of the case, the authorities cited, and the names of the several counsel who appeared, will be found, 17 Law T. Rep. 117.

The LORD CHANCELLOR affirmed the decision of the Court below, and said, that the covenant must receive the same construction in equity as at law; it was an express covenant to restrain such an occupation or calling as the carrying on of a ladies' school, and unless some special ground could be shewn, the injunction must go as of course. Since the covenant had been entered into, the property had not been dealt with in any manner which could induce the Court to waive the further performance of the covenant.

Practice.

A motion cannot be reheard before the Lord Chancellor without leave of the Court.

In this case an injunction had been refused by the Vice-Chancellor Lord Cranworth; but, on appeal, had been granted by the late Lord Chancellor. (3 Mac. & Gor. 311.)

Bethell (with him Giffard) moved to dissolve the injunction.

Rolt and Fooks, as a preliminary objection, contended that the rule requiring leave to be obtained before an appeal could be reheard, was, by the modern practice, applicable as well to the rehearing of motions as to causes.

Bethell, in arguing against the existence of any such practice, cited Deerhurst v. Duke of St. Albans, 2 R. & M. 702; and Mousley v. Carr, 3 M. & K. 205. A second rehearing had been repeatedly had on interlocutory applications, and the prohibition only extended to the rehearing of causes, as was proved by the observations of his lordship when counsel in the former case.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said that without doubt such was the practice when he was at the Bar, but as it was a point of great importance he had consulted with the registrar (who had obtained the opinion of three other of the registrars upon the practice), and from what he had been informed he must consider the practice, which was a modern one even as respected causes, to have become extended to motions: consistently with what he believed now to be the practice of the Court, he could not rehear this motion until leave having been obtained. The practice, his lordship considered, as settled, was a wholesome one, and he had always been at a loss for a reason for the distinction between the rehearing of motions and the rehearing of causes, as to leave. If there were any new circumstances which could be shewn why the case should be reheard he would hear them, and if they warranted his so doing he would give leave for a second rehearing at once.

It was ultimately arranged that the cause should be brought to a hearing without delay, and that in the meantime the motion should stand over.

Re PAYNE.

Practice—Commissioner of bankrupts, insolvency of—Substituted affidavit for payment of annuity granted by way of compensation.

A commissioner of bankrupts to whom compensation had been awarded, upon his insolvency refused to make the affidavit required by an order of the Lord Chancellor made in pursuance of the Act of Parliament, to enable his assignees to receive the annuity. The Lord Chancellor, on the petition of the assignees, ordered that the accountant-general should make the payment to the assignees upon their affidavit that they had made all proper inquiries and that they believed that the insolvent held no other office.

The insolvent was a commissioner of bankrupts for the county and district of Bristol at the time of the passing of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122; under that Act he was entitled to an annuity of 199*l.* To this it was decided his assignees were entitled (Spooner v. Payne, 18 Law T. Rep. 322), but the insolvent refusing to make the affidavit required by the Lord Chancellor's order, the assignees were unable to obtain its payment. On a petition by the assignees, the Lord Chancellor directed the annuity to be paid upon their substituted affidavit, with liberty to the accountant-general to apply.

Will—Construction—Annuity—Residue.

A testator directed his executors to invest a sufficient portion of his personal estate in the public funds to produce an income of 2*l. a week, to be paid by them to his son J. for life, and after his decease the sum so invested was to fall into residue of the testator's personal estate, and, after dividing freehold and leasehold property amongst all his other children, he directed that, as soon as the youngest should attain twenty-one, the executor should divide the residue among all his children except J. equally. And, in like manner, he* directed, on the decease of J. that the sum to be invested to produce and pay the annuity of 2l. a week, should be divided unto and amongst all his other children who should be then living, or the issue of such of them as might be dead, share and share alike. The testator's residuary personal estate, when invested, was not sufficient to produce an income equal to the annuity given to J.:

Held (reversing the decision of the Court below), that the annuitant was entitled to have the deficiency raised from time to time, by the sale of the sum invested for the purpose of paying the annuity.

The testator, William Wright, after giving a pecuniary legacy, and directing his debts and funeral and testamentary expenses to be paid out of his personal estate, directed them to get in such personal estate, and to stand possessed thereof, upon trust to invest a sufficient portion thereof in the public funds of Great Britain, or upon other Government securities, to produce an income of 2l. a week, to be paid by his executors to his son James Wright, during the term of his natural life, to and for his own use and benefit, for his support and maintenance; the said annuity to be in bar and satisfaction of all claim, right, or title to the testator's real and personal estate, or any part thereof; and from and after the decease of his said son James, the said sum so invested to fall into and become part of the residue of the testator's said personal estate. The testator then, after a recital in his will that he was seised and possessed of certain freehold and leasehold estates particularly mentioned, gave the same, in certain specified shares, to his other children, Thomas, Isaac, Rebecca, and Hannah, absolutely, at the age of twenty-one respectively; and he adds, "And whereas, when and as soon as the youngest of my said children shall attain that age, upon trust that my said executors do and shall pay and divide my said residuary estate (all such parts of which as do not already consist of public stocks, funds, and securities, I direct may in the meantime be invested in the public funds or on Government securities), after deducting the several payments aforesaid, and all due allowances to my said executors, unto and amongst all and every my said children, except my said son, James Wright, share and share alike, to and for their own absolute use and benefit, and in like manner I direct, that, upon the decease of my said son James, the sum to be invested to produce and pay his annuity of 2l. a week, shall be divided unto and amongst all my other children who shall be then living, or the issue of such of them as may be dead, share and share alike." The testator died on the 20th July, 1841, and his executors proved the will, paid the debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, and the pecuniary legacy. They then invested the whole of the testator's residuary personal estate in the purchase of 2,200l. 17s. 6d. Three per Cent. Consolidated Bank Annuities; the dividends of the stock were regularly applied in payment of the annuity of 2l. a week to the testator's son James, until January, 1852, the executors from time to time making up the deficiency of such dividends by payment of the annuity out of the capital. The executors then refused to pay more in respect of the annuity than the dividends of the 2,200l. 17s. 6d. whereupon the testator's son James filed this claim, praying that a sufficient sum might be set apart out of the personal estate of the testator, and invested in the public funds, or upon Government securities pursuant to the terms of the will; or otherwise to have the annuity valued, and the sum at which the same should be valued paid to the annuitant out of the testator's personal estate.

The claim coming on to be heard before the Vice-Chancellor Sir R. T. Kindersley, he was of opinion that there was not a specific gift of the annuity charged upon the whole personal estate of the testator, since the fund upon which it was secured was given over, on the death of the annuitant, to a different class of persons to those entitled to the residue. His Honour, therefore held, that the testator's son James was only entitled to be paid the annual dividends of the fund arising from the investment of the testator's residuary personal estate.

From this decision the plaintiff now appealed.

Malins and Drewry, for the appellant, contended that the annuity was charged upon the whole personal estate, and that the appropriation of a fund for its payment could not affect his right to be paid the whole annuity. (Gordon v. Bowden, 6 Madd. 342.) That the testator's direction that the appropriated sum should, on the decease of the annuitant, become part of the residue of his personal estate, and his gift of it to his children other than the annuitant; and his subsequent gift of the appropriated sum, "in like manner," on the decease of the annuitant, to the children of the testator other than the annuitant and their issue, although held by the Vice-Chancellor to be a circumstance in favour of the respondent, did not in reality vary what would have been the rights of the parties had the appropriated fund been simply directed to fall into the residue, as no intention of the testator could be inferred from a difference in the destination of the appropriated fund and the residue, which in reality only arose from the awkward expressions the testator had inadvertently made use of. That the direction to set aside a fund for payment of the annuity was merely a means for the end of securing the annuity, and substantially the gift was the gift of an annuity. That the appellant according to the authorities ___ entitled either to have the annuity valued, and be paid the amount of the valuation (Wroughton v. Colquhoun, 1 De G. & S. 36, 357; Carr v. Ingleby, 1 De G. & S. 362; Long v. Hughes, 1 De G. & S. 364), or he was at any rate entitled to have the deficiency from time to time made up by the sale of part of the capital of the appropriated fund. (May v. Bennett, 1 Russ. 370; Davies v. Wattier, 1 Sim. & S. 463; Ex parte Wilkinson, re The London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company, 14 Jur. 301.) Moreover, the annuity was clearly intended as a certain provision for James, the testator's other children being provided for by the gift of his freehold and leasehold property, and also the residue, after satisfying the annuity.

Stuart and Shebbeare, for the executors, insisted upon the distinction relied upon by the Vice-Chancellor, and the different destination of the appropriated fund from the residue, in the last clause in which it was mentioned; that although in the first clause it was directed to fall into the residue, yet, in a subsequent clause, it was given to different persons, and where there were two inconsistent clauses in a will, the first was to be rejected. [Lord Justice Knight Bruce.—Whatever may be the order of the clauses of the testator's will, every part of the instrument becomes his will at the same instant, viz. that of the execution of the will by the testator. The rule of construction you rely upon is, that the general residue of the personal estate is given in one way, and the capital of the appropriated fund in another, notwithstanding the introductory words, "in like manner," occurring in the latter clause, and notwithstanding the direction in the prior clause that it shall become part of the residue.] That is so; James is, we submit, only entitled to the dividends of the appropriated sum, for his life and the other children, or their issue, take it upon his death. The testator could not have intended that the appropriated fund should go to purchase an annuity for James, or be applied in payment to him of a sum equal to the value of such annuity.

Drewry, in reply.

Lord Justice Lord Cranworth said he did not express a very confident opinion, and that in a will so obscurely worded it was not to be wondered at that different minds arrived at a different conclusion. He was, however, bound to confess that he did not concur in the view taken by the Vice-Chancellor. The view he took was this, the testator had by his will, in effect given to his son James an annuity of 104l. per annum, and had directed that such annuity should be secured by means of a fund out of which it might be paid. He left assets insufficient to raise a fund out of the dividends, for the purpose of paying the annuity in full; in fact, it would not be sufficient for the payment of more than 60l. or 70l. per annum. The question then arose, what was to be done under these circumstances? It was hardly controvertible that if there had been a mere gift of the annuity, and afterwards a simple gift of the residue, the annuitant would be entitled to be paid in full. The Vice-Chancellor, however, had proceeded upon this distinction, that the fund to be appropriated to secure the annuity, though directed by the will to fall into the residue of the testator's estate, was by a subsequent clause of the will in effect given to a different class of persons from those who were to have the residue. So far he went with the Vice-Chancellor in thinking that the same persons did not take the appropriated fund and the general residue, but that did not affect the question. The testator in substance said that an annuity of 104l. should be secured to his son James, and as a means of doing it, directed an investment in Consols; now that was nothing more than the law itself would have directed to be done. There was nothing in the terms of the gift over shewing that the testator intended the fund to be preserved in its integrity during the life of James. It is a gift over, in that event, of so much as shall then remain. There was, in reality, no distinction between this case and that of May v. Bennett, 1 Russ. 370. There, as in the case before the Court, the question arose between the annuitant and the residuary legatee. The testator, in that case, having directed his executors to lay out in what Government security they pleased, so much money as would produce an annual interest, and having given that annual interest to his wife during her life, in case she did not marry again, the executors invested in the Five per Cents. a sum which yielded dividends exactly equal to the specified income. Eighteen years afterwards the dividends were diminished by the conversion of the Five per Cents. into Four per Cents. and became, therefore, insufficient to meet the annuity. Lord ___ (Master of the Rolls) held that the setting apart a fund was only a means to the end, and that if that means failed, the intention was, that the nominal amount of the annuity should be made up out of the other assets. What Lord Gifford said was this:—"If there is any difficulty in making good the difference out of the general estate of the testator, the widow must have the deficiency raised from time to time by the sale of parts of the appropriated stock." Now, that was, in his opinion, equity, and the only equity which the annuitant in the principal case had. He could not agree that the law was as had been stated by the counsel for the appellant, viz. that where the question arose between the annuitant and those entitled to the residuary estate, the annuitant was entitled to have the annuity valued, and to be paid the amount of the valuation in respect of his annuity. In all the cases which had been cited in support of that view of the law, the question had arisen, not between the annuitant and the residuary legatee, but between the annuitant and pecuniary legatees. But as between an annuitant and pecuniary legatees, the Court held that there must be an abatement pari passu in case of deficiency of assets, and knew of no other way of dealing with the subject but by means of a valuation. The case was different where the claimant was entitled, as against the residue, to an annuity and something else, namely, the investment of a fund as a means to secure the payment of the annuity. Then, all that could be asked, was payment of the annuity, and an investment of the fund by way of security; and, in the event of the dividends of that fund being insufficient to meet the annual payments in respect of the annuity, then to have the deficiency made good from time to time, either by a sale of portions of the appropriated stock, or out of any other part of the residue which could be made available. It might happen, certainly, that by this means the whole appropriated fund would, in the end be exhausted, if the annuitant lived long enough. In that case, the annuitant would only be in the situation of any other person to whom a testator bequeaths a benefit without leaving assets to provide for it.

Lord Justice Knight Bruce said, that in electing between the two different constructions which had been put upon the language of the will in question, he arrived at the same conclusion with Lord Cranworth, differing from the Vice-Chancellor. The opinion which he had formed when he first read the will, and which had continued unchanged during the argument, was, that the plaintiff was entitled to have the will read as if he had been named in it simply and merely as a legatee of an annuity of 2l. per week for life. He certainly was not at present disposed to direct that the annuity should be valued, or to do more than allow the annuitant from time to time to break into the capital of the appropriated fund, for the purpose of making good any deficiency in the dividends to pay his annuity. If the parties could not agree upon that mode of raising the deficiency, the case might, as to that, be mentioned again to the Court.

The order ultimately made declared that the plaintiff was entitled to be paid his annuity in full, and to have the arrears then due, as well as any deficiency in the dividends of the appropriated fund to meet the future payments, raised by sale from time to time of part of the capital of such fund.

Long v. Long!
Long v. Watkinson.

Will, construction of—Gift to executors, whether beneficial or in trust.

A testator by his will directed his executors to pay over his residuary property to his sister F. and in case of F.'s death, "to the executors or executrixes whom F. by her will, might appoint." F. died before the testator, having by her will given the residue of her estate to W. and appointed L. her executrix. L. the executrix of F. filed her bill against W. the residuary legatee of F. claiming to be beneficially entitled to the residue under F.'s brother's will:

Held, that L. did not take beneficially, but only on the trusts of F.'s will.

The suit in this case was instituted to determine who were the parties entitled to the residuary estate of a testator under a bequest to the executors or executrixes of his sister, who died after the date of the will, but before the testator. William Long, by his will bearing date the 2nd of November, 1848, bequeathed to his sister, Mary Fowler, his sister-in-law, Mary Long, and to George Sandeman, all the property to which he should be entitled at his decease, and appointed them his executrixes and executor, and provided thus:—"My instructions to my executor and two executrixes are, that they do pay out of the above my just debts and funeral expenses, the expenses of proving this my will, likewise my servants' wages, also a legacy of 20*l.* to my executor, and a legacy of 20*l.* to my executrix, Mrs. Mary Long; and that they then pay over all the residue and remainder of my estate and effects to my sister, Mrs. Mary Fowler, my other executrix; but in case of my said sister's death, my instructions are then to pay over all the residue and remainder of my estate and effects to the executors or executrixes which my said sister, Mrs. Mary Fowler, by her will may appoint." Mrs. Mary Fowler died on the 1st January, 1849, in the lifetime of the said testator, having by her will, bearing date the 28th December, 1846, bequeathed the residue of her property to Isabella Watkinson, and appointed the said Mary Long her sole executrix. William Long, the testator, died on the 25th of January, 1849, and on the 22nd of February following, George Sandeman having renounced probate, Mary Long alone proved his will, and on the 28th of February, 1849, she also proved the will of Mary Fowler, and became the sole executrix of both testator and testatrix. Mary Fowler having predeceased her brother, William Long, a question arose as to who were entitled under the residuary bequest in William Long's will, and to determine this, Mary Long, the executrix of both wills, filed her bill against Isabella Watkinson, the residuary legatee under the will of Mary Fowler, who claimed to be entitled as such residuary legatee to the residue given by the will of William Long to the executors or executrixes of his sister's will in case of her death, Mary Long herself claiming the same residue beneficially as executrix of Mary Fowler's will. A question also was raised as to the rights of Mary Fowler's next of kin. The cause having come on to be heard a decree was made referring it to the Master to ascertain who were the next of kin of the testatrix, Mary Fowler, living at her death, and at the death of the testator, William Long. The Master made his report, finding that at the death of the testatrix, William Long, the said testator, was her sole next of kin, and that at the death of William Long, certain other parties therein particularly mentioned were her sole next of kin. It being necessary to bring those parties who were Mary Fowler's next of kin at the death of William Long before the Court, a supplemental bill was filed for that purpose, and the cause now came on to be heard for further directions in the original and supplemental suits. The first question for the consideration of the Court was, whether the executrix of Mary Fowler took beneficially, and if not, and she took only as a trustee; then, secondly, whether in trust for the residuary legatee, or next of kin of Mary Fowler.

K. Parker and Shebbeare, for the plaintiff, Mary Long, contended that she was beneficially entitled, and took a distinction between the present case and that of Palin v. Hills, 1 Myl. & K. 170, on the ground that in Palin v. Hills, the bequest was to the "executors and administrators," here only to the "executors." They relied upon Evans v. Charles, 1 Anstr. 128, as in point, and cited Bridge v. Abbot, 3 Bro. C. C. 225; Price v. Strange, 6 Madd. 159; Sanders v. Franks, 2 Madd. 147; Sibley v. Cooke, 3 Atk. 572; Collier v. Squire, 3 Russ. 467; Stocks v. Dodsley, 1 Keen, 325; Holloway v. Holloway, 5 Ves. 399; Nurse v. Oldmeadow, 5 L. J. N. S. 300, Ch.; Holloway v. Clarkson, 2 Hare, 521; Allen v. Thorp, 7 Bea. 72; Daniel v. Dudley, 1 Phill. 1; Long v. Blackall, 3 Ves. 486; Wallis v. Taylor, 8 Sim. 241.

Lloyd and Hardy, for the residuary legatee, Isabella Watkinson, were proceeding to argue against the executrix as taking beneficially, but

The MASTER of the ROLLS said he was of opinion that she did not, and they need not trouble themselves on that point. His impression, subject to what might be said on behalf of the next of kin, was, that the personal representative of Mary Fowler took the property in question but as part of her assets, and subject to the dispositions thereof made by her will.

Lee and Eddis, for some of the next of kin, cited Ripley v. Waterworth, 7 Ves. 425; Bulmer v. Jay, 3 Myl. & K. 199; Morris v. Howes, 4 Hare, 599; Cotton v. Cotton, 2 Beav. 67; Wallis v. Taylor, 8 Sim. 241.

R. Palmer and James, for other next of kin, cited Clapton v. Bulmer, 10 Sim. 426; S. C. 5 Myl. & Cr. 108; Wilkinson v. Garratt, 2 Colly. 643.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—I think it is clear what the decision ought to be, though there is some conflict in the authorities. There are two questions to be considered on the words of the will. The brother and sister were both old, and he made his will in 1848, and she hers in 1846. The bequest in his will was, in case of her death, to pay over all the residue of his estate and effects to the executors or executrixes of Mary Fowler. The sister died first, on the 1st day of the month of January, 1849, and he on the 25th of the same month; and thereupon a question arose as to who were entitled under the words of the testator's will. Mr. Kenyon Parker and Mr. Shebbeare have contended that the executrix of Mary Fowler's will is beneficially entitled to the property. I was of opinion that she was not, and stopped the argument as to that on the other side, considering that the executrix took only as a trustee and not beneficially. The decision in Evans v. Charles, 1 Anst. 128, is no doubt irreconcileable with this view of the case, and with the decisions since, and I think Evans v. Charles has, after being doubted for a considerable time, been overruled by several authorities, and is not now law. Before I go on I may here say I except all classes of cases where the parties to take are specified. The testator might have directed that his sister's executors should take beneficially, and they would do so if any intention to that effect were shewn, but there is no expression of intention here, and therefore all I can do is to act upon the words used. The question, then, is, on what trusts do the executors of his sister take under William Long's will? and it must be remembered I am construing the will of the testator, not the testatrix, and the testator gives property to the executrix of the testatrix, and the question is, how she takes, if not beneficially. I am of opinion she takes it in trust to administer according to the will of her own testatrix, and therefore you must specify the trusts on which the executrix holds, or if not, then it is on the trusts of the will constituting the executor. It the original testator did not express any trust, it would be an intestacy; but if he says his sister, or her executors, are to take, on what ground can you say it is a trust for the residuary legatee? Neither the residuary legatee nor the next of kin can take as personæ designatæ, but the trust is an office to be administered by the executor. I take the case to be the same now as if the sister had made a deed conveying property to A. and B. on trust, and the testator had given his property to A. and B. on the trusts of that deed. I think the will of the testator has said just this,—"The property goes to the executors of my sister, to be administered according to the trusts of the office." I am of opinion, therefore, that the residuary legatee takes the property, but she takes it as forming part of the property of the testatrix. The residuary legatee is not persona designata, but one of the cestui que trusts of the will of the testator, and the property does not pass by the will of the testatrix. But there is nothing to prevent me saying, I wish a legacy to go to the executor of another, to be administered according to the trusts of that other's will; that is, first, the creditors of the person, then the residuary legatee. It is said, I am concluded by authority, and that I cannot distinguish this case from Palin v. Hills, and undoubtedly that case is entitled to great weight, but I cannot reconcile it with Daniel v. Dudley, Allen v. Thorpe, Holloway v. Clarkson, and other cases of that class. If, therefore, I look at authorities, I am concluded by the Lord Chancellor's decision, the latter of which has been followed by later authorities, I must hold that the proper construction of the testator's will is, that he has directed his property to go to the trustees of his sister's will, to be administered as her estate, and I am of opinion that, on principle, I must make the same decision. The result is, that the fund is to go to the executrix, and if the debts and legacies are paid, the residuary legatee will be entitled. Costs of all parties must be paid out of the fund; those of the plaintiff as between solicitor and client.

LODGE v. PRICHARD.

Claim filed by specific legatee—Assent by executors—General administration suit—Decree for an account of assets not specifically bequeathed—Residuary legatee.

A residuary legatee, who was also a specific legatee, filed a bill as residuary legatee, against the executors, for administration of the testator's estate, and obtained a decree for an account of assets not specifically bequeathed. Pending this suit, the plaintiff filed a claim against the executors for payment of the specific bequest, to which they had assented, but of which they resisted payment, on the ground that they had paid the plaintiff various sums in respect of the residuary estate, and it would probably turn out, on the balance of accounts, which were being taken, that the plaintiff had received more than was due to him. On this latter ground, without going into the question of assent by the executors, the claim was dismissed, with costs.

This was a claim filed by a specific legatee to enforce payment of a specific legacy, to which the executors had assented. It appeared that the testator, Adam Lodge, had bequeathed to the claimant twenty-five shares in the Liverpool Marine Insurance Company, and had devised to him certain real estate, and appointed him residuary legatee. The testator died in April 1837, and in the same year the defendants, the executors of the will sold the shares for 252*l.* having assented to the specific bequest thereof, but the proceeds of the sale had never been paid to the plaintiff. Delays subsequently took place in winding up the affairs of the testator's estate, in consequence of its being subject to debts of a considerable amount, which were partly charged on the real estate. Ultimately, the plaintiff, in his character of residuary legatee, filed a bill against the executors, for the administration of the testator's estate, and obtained a decree for an account of the assets not specifically bequeathed. Pending the taking of the accounts, under this decree, the plaintiff filed a claim against the executors to enforce payment of the specific bequest, or of the proceeds of the sale thereof, on the ground that they had assented to the bequest. The executors resisted payment, on the ground that they had advanced various sums to the plaintiff, amounting to about 560*l.* on account of the rents of the real estate, and the residuary bequest, and that, on taking the accounts, the plaintiff would be found to have received more than he was entitled to.

The plaintiff appeared in support of his own case and cited Smith v. Brooksbank, 7 Sim. 18.

Follett and Tillotson, for the executors, contended that the claim ought to be dismissed, for it would turn out on the balance of accounts in the administration suit, that the plaintiff had received more than he could claim.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—This gentleman being devisee and residuary legatee, has instituted a suit as to the residue in this court, and has obtained a decree for an account of assets not specifically bequeathed. Pending that account he files a claim in this branch of the court, claiming 250*l.* the produce of certain shares specifically bequeathed to him and sold by the executors. The executors say, "There are claims by us against the plaintiff in respect of transactions between us, in which we have advanced to him the sum of 560*l.* and upon the taking of the accounts it may turn out that a balance will be owing from the plaintiff to the executors, and, therefore, we may have to receive something." Now nothing can be clearer than that this Court never does partial justice, but always endeavours to do complete justice between the parties; and, therefore, does not treat the question of set-off in the same way as courts of law, but will take a much wider view of the case. There are accounts pending between the plaintiff and the executors under the decree in the administration suit, which the plaintiff has himself obtained, and if more has been paid him than he is entitled to, it may be set off against what is due under the specific legacy; and where there is a sum due to or from him there will be an account taken of it, and a balance will be paid either way. It is impossible, therefore, to allow him to come here to enforce a claim as to one particular part of a transaction, respecting which an account is now pending. And, therefore, without going into the question of the effect of the assent of the executors, I dismiss the claim, and with costs.

Ex parte LOWE, re BIRMINGHAM, WOLVERHAMPTON, AND STOUR VALLEY RAILWAY COMPANY.

Petition—Investment of purchase-money—Title—Terms of contract—Reference to the Master.

One of the terms of the contract for the purchase of land taken by a railway company was that the title previous to the year 1824 should be taken to be good. A petition being presented, praying a reference to the Master to ascertain whether a good title could be made since 1824, the Court refused to make the order as prayed, but directed an inquiry whether it was for the benefit of the parties interested that the contract should be entered into, and if so, then whether a good title could be made according to the contract.

This was a petition of the tenant for life of certain estates, of which a part had been taken by the Birmingham, Wolverhampton, and Stour Valley Railway Company, for the re-investment of the proceeds of the sale in other lands. It appeared that one of the terms of the contract for the sale to the company was that the title to the land should be considered as good previous to the year 1824. An affidavit of a solicitor in support of the petition was produced, stating that he well knew the property and the title thereto; that he had been concerned for the petitioner on the sale in 1824, and that the previous title had continually been investigated and always approved. The petition prayed that it might be referred to the Master to ascertain whether a good title was shewn since 1824.

Speed appeared in support of the petition.

The MASTER of the ROLLS refused to make the order without further and satisfactory evidence of the validity of the title previous to 1824—such evidence as would have been produced to the Master; as, for instance, the opinions of conveyancers, &c.; but he referred it to the Master to ascertain whether it was for the benefit of the parties interested that the contract should be entered into, and if he was of opinion that it was so, then that he should inquire whether a good title could be made according to the contract.

VICE-CHANCELLOR PARKER'S COURT.

Reported by GEO. S. ALLNUTT, Esq. of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law.

WRIGHT v. WRIGHT.

Will—Construction—Conditional gift.

A testator gave the residue of his real and personal estate upon trust to convert the same into money, and out of the said money to apply such sums for the maintenance and education of his sons A. B. and C. D. during their minorities, and apprenticing them, as his trustees should think proper, and when his said sons attained their respective ages of twenty-one, to pay the residue of the moneys to A. B. and C. D. in equal parts, provided they should be at that time, in the opinion of his trustees, of competent understanding and sufficient discretion to manage and take due care thereof; and if either of his sons should die under twenty-one, the share of such son so dying should be paid to the survivor upon attaining twenty-one, provided he should then be of sufficient discretion, &c. A. B. and C. D. attained twenty-one, but were then lunatics. C. D. afterwards died, and it was Held, that notwithstanding the proviso in the will, A. B. and C. D. took absolute interests.

William Wright, the testator in this cause, by his will, dated the 3rd of September, 1813, gave his real and personal estate to L. Wright, W. Wright, and J. Lambert, their heirs, executors, and administrators, upon trust for sale and conversion into money, and then, after directing the payment of certain legacies to his daughters, the testator proceeded as follows:—"And that they, my said trustees, or the survivors or survivor of them, or the executors or administrators of such survivor shall from and out of the said moneys pay and apply such sums of money for the maintenance and education of my said sons, Joseph Wright and Jonathan Wright, during their minorities, and for apprenticing them to any trade or business, and paying any fee or fees in respect thereof as they my said trustees shall think most proper and for their advantage, and when they my said sons shall have attained their respective ages of twenty-one years, then upon trust that they my said trustees, and the survivors and survivor of them, and the executors and administrators of such survivor shall pay all the then residue of the moneys which may have arisen from my said real and personal estates as aforesaid unto my said two sons, Joseph Wright and Jonathan Wright, in equal parts and proportions, share and share alike, as tenants in common for their own respective use and benefit, provided that they my said sons shall be at that time in the opinion of my said trustees, or the survivors or survivor of them, or the executors or administrators of such survivor, of competent understanding and sufficient discretion to manage and take due care thereof; and if it shall happen that either of my said sons shall die during his minority, then my will is, that the part and share of such son so dying shall be paid unto the survivor of them, my said sons, upon his attaining his said age of twenty-one years, provided he shall then be of sufficient discretion to manage and take proper care thereof. And my will is, and I hereby direct that my said trustees, and the survivors and survivor of them, and the executors and administrators of such survivor, shall, from time to time, as occasion shall require, during the minority of my said children, place out at interest upon some sufficient mortgage security, or securities, all the moneys which they may receive from and in respect of my said real and personal estates, except what may be then paid and applied in discharge of my debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and in the maintenance and education of my said children during their minorities, or in the payment of any apprentice-fee or fees to be paid upon the apprenticing of my said sons to any trade or business as aforesaid." The testator appointed the said L. Wright, W. Wright, and J. Lambert, his executors, and died shortly after the date of his will. In 1819 Joseph Wright attained twenty-one, and in 1823 Jonathan Wright attained twenty-one, and afterwards died. The suit was instituted by Joseph Wright (who had been found a lunatic), by his committee, and the administrators of Jonathan Wright against L. Wright, the surviving trustee, and the representatives of the deceased trustees for the administration of the testator's estate. Joseph Wright and Jonathan Wright, the two sons of the testator, were both lunatics at the time they attained their majority; and L. Wright, the surviving trustee, stated in an affidavit filed by him, that, in his opinion, and, as he believed, in the opinion of his cotrustees, they were not, on their attaining their majority, of competent understanding and sufficient discretion to manage and take due care of the property. The question arising in the suit was as to the effect of the proviso contained in the testator's will.

Roll and Prior appeared for the plaintiffs.

Malins and Amphlett for the defendants.

Prior, in reply.

The cases of Festing v. Allen, 5 Hare, 573; and Bland v. Williams, 3 Myl. & K. 411, were referred to.

Thursday, June 9.—The VICE-CHANCELLOR said, the question in this case turned upon the construction of the will of the testator, William Wright. The question was, whether his sons Joseph and Jonathan, who had both attained the age of twenty-one years, took absolute interests under the residuary gift contained in the testator's will, or whether that gift was subject to the condition of the proviso that the testator's sons should be at that time, in the opinion of his trustees, or the survivors or survivor of them, or the executors or administrators of such survivor, of competent understanding and sufficient discretion to manage and take due care of the subject of the gift. It was quite plain that, but for that proviso in the will, the testator's two sons would take the subject of this gift absolutely, and that construction of the will which would find a conditional gift to them in this proviso would be a very absurd construction as regarded the intention of the testator, because it was to be observed he made a very anxious provision for these sons until they should attain twenty-one, which was to take effect not only out of the income, but out of the corpus of this property, and yet the Court was asked to say that the gift entirely failed, and there was an intestacy as to that share. The construction contended for, moreover, would make the failure of the gift depend on the capacity or incapacity of these parties at the time of their respectively attaining the age of twenty-one years, though they might afterwards recover. There was a gift over as between themselves, in case either of them should die under age,—the whole was given, on that event, to the survivor; but, on the construction contended for, if one of them attained twenty-one, and the gift failed by reason of his incapacity, there would be an intestacy as to that share. This was a residuary bequest framed under the notion that the testator was making a complete disposition of his property. If this was conditional, it must be so construed, but it appeared to his Honour that it was not conditional. The gift was not attached to the condition at all. It consisted of a direction to pay to the sons their shares, provided they were of competent understanding and sufficient discretion to manage the property, and to take due care of it. The condition was part of the direction to pay, and not attached to the gift. A direction to pay, subject to a proviso of this kind, did not make the gift conditional, but it remained absolute. It appeared, therefore, to his Honour, that the two sons took absolute interests.

ABBOTT v. SWORDER.

Vendor and purchaser—Costs of reference as to title.

Where in a suit for specific performance, which had been occasioned by the purchaser's conduct, a reference to the Master as to the title was directed, the purchaser was ordered to pay the costs of the reference, as well as the other costs of the suit, although the Master found that a good title was only shewn a few days before the date of his report.

This was a suit by the vendor for the specific performance of the following contract:—

"Memorandum of an agreement made the 10th October, 1848, between William Ward Abbott, of, &c. of the one part, and Thomas Sworder, the younger, of, &c. of the other part, whereby the said W. W. Abbott, for himself, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, agrees to sell, and said Thos. Sworder, for himself, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, agrees to purchase all that freehold messuage or tenement called or known by the name of Ceunen Tower, and also all that farm called Cefuyfodw containing by estimation, &c. together with all common rights, members, and appurtenances whatsoever to said messuage or tenement and farm belonging, or in anywise appertaining, upon the following terms (that is to say) the purchase-money for the estate is to be 5,000*l*. and is to be paid and satisfied unto the said W. W. Abbott in manner following (that is to say), &c. The said W. W. Abbott is to deliver unto said Thos. Sworder an abstract of his title to said estate, and a good title being shewn, he, said W. W. Abbott, hereby agrees to convey and assure [illegible] unto said T. Sworder, free from all incum[illegible]hatsoever, except the land-tax and the chief rent of [illegible] payable yearly to Earl Cawder, and said W. W. Abbott is to give immediate possession of said estate unto said Thos. Sworder, and is to pay for all the materials supplied and the labour and work done to said messuage or tenement and buildings up to the 14th instant."

The performance of the contract was resisted on the ground of the price being far beyond the value of the farm, but no question was raised as to the title.

The cause came on to be heard on the 28th of April, 1851, before the Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce, when it was declared that the plaintiff was entitled to a specific performance of the agreement, and it was referred to the Master to inquire whether the plaintiff could make a good title to the estate, and if so, when such good title was first shewn. The Master by his report, dated the 29th of April, 1852, certified that an abstract of title was left in his office on the 3rd of November, 1851, and an additional abstract and certain affidavits on the 8th of December, 1851, and he found that the plaintiff could make a good title to the estate, and that such good title was first shewn on the 1st of April, 1852.

The cause now came on upon further directions.

Russell and Hardy for the plaintiff.

Malins and Hislop Clarke, for the defendant, contended, that as the plaintiff had not shewn a good title until the 1st of April, 1852, the costs of the reference as to title ought to be borne by him.

The following authorities were cited: Long v. Collier, 4 Russ. 269; Townsend v. Champernowne, 3 Y. &. C. Ex. 505; Croome v. Lediard, 2 Myl. & K. 293; Scoones v. Morrell, 1 Bea. 251; Monro v. Taylor, 8 Hare, 51; and 3 Sugden's Vendors and Purchasers, 10th ed. 143.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR (after disposing of the other parts of the case) said that the decree reserved the consideration of the costs of the suit until the Master had made his report. The investigation of the title seemed to have proceeded up to a certain point, and then the defendant insisted that the contract was not binding on him for a certain reason, and thereupon the further investigation of the title stopped, and the plaintiff filed his bill to enforce specific performance of the contract, and obtained a decree. His Honour entertained no doubt that a plaintiff getting a decree for specific performance was entitled to the general costs of the suit; and the only question was as to the costs of the reference as to title. The rule of the Court was very clear as to that when the parties had a dispute as to the title, and the question of specific performance turned on the title to the property. In such a case the Court, if it found that the plaintiff was in the wrong at the time when he filed the bill, was accustomed to consider that fact in disposing of the costs of the suit, and sometimes made a decree for specific performance only on the terms of his paying the costs, because he was in the wrong when the bill was filed. But this did not belong to that class of cases. Here the reason for refusing to complete was a question on the validity of the contract. According to the case of Croome v. Lediard, the general rule would entitle the plaintiff to the costs of the reference as well as the general costs of the suit. The plaintiff was under a condition to make out a good title, which he would have done at his own expense if there had been no suit instituted. He thought the defendant had brought upon himself the costs occasioned by having the title investigated in the Master's office. The only doubt his Honour had was occasioned by the direction in the decree, which seemed to be in some degree inconsistent with that view. By the decree it was referred to the Master to inquire when a good title was first shewn. In the case of Long v. Collier, the purchaser took his stand on a particular investigation, and there it stopped short: the Master found against the purchaser on the ground on which he took his stand. Something that the purchaser had not asked for until he was in the Master's office was not supplied until after the bill was filed. Here a preliminary objection was taken on the contract. If the Master's report shewed that the ground of title in that case on which the purchaser took his stand was unsubstantiated, it was not material to the question of costs, that the other matters were supplied in the Master's office. His Honour thought that he was not bound by the form of the decree in this case to depart from the general rule, that where the purchaser's conduct had led to the institution of the suit, he was not entitled to the costs before the Master. He thought that the purchaser must pay the costs of the suit.

Re REYNOLDS.

Practice—Receiver.

Receiver of the rents of real estates appointed on petition.

Phillips appeared in support of this petition, which, among other things, prayed the appointment, without suit, of real estates belonging to an infant. He referred to Re Leeming, 17 Law T. Rep. 231, and Re Gascoigne, 20 L. J. N. S. 550; 18 Law T. Rep. 3.

Saturday, July 3.—The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that he had looked into the cases which had been cited, and would make the order.

Saturday, July 3.

Re ———, an Infant.

Infant.

An allowance out of an infant's income to his father, who was in great need, refused.

This was a petition by an infant, seventeen years of age, stating that he was absolutely entitled to property which produced about 220*l.* per annum; that it was proposed that he should be articled to a solicitor, named in the petition, who was willing to take him; and that he should, during his minority, live with an uncle who resided in the same town as the solicitor. The father of the infant, who was a clergyman of the church of England, holding no preferment, was not entitled to any property, and his only means of subsistence were the emoluments derived from teaching a village school, which amounted to 20*l.* a year. He resided at a distance from the town where it was proposed that the infant should be articled. It was proposed by the petition that the infant's uncle should be appointed to act in the nature of a guardian to him, and that an allowance of 90*l.* a year should be paid to him for the infant's benefit, and that the father consented to this arrangement, and did not wish to interfere with the infant in any way. Under the circumstances of the case, it was proposed that an allowance of 20*l.* a year should be paid to the father out of such part of the infant's income as was not required for his maintenance.

B. L. Chapman, for the petition, in support of that part of it which prayed that an allowance of 20*l.* a year should be paid to the father out of the income of the infant, referred to Heysham v. Heysham, 1 Cox, 179, and Allen v. Coster, 1 Bea. 202.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said, that in the case of Heysham v. Heysham a benefit was given to the mother. The present case was different. A father was bound to maintain his children, and he thought he could not make an order giving him a direct benefit out of the income of the infant's property. In Allen v. Coster there was a kind of compromise. He must decline to make any order as to that part of the prayer of the petition which asked for an allowance to the father. An order might be made as to the other objects of the petition.

Ex parte THE VICAR AND PATRON OF CREECH ST. MICHAEL, SOMERSET, re THE BRISTOL AND EXETER RAILWAY COMPANY.

Railway company—Investment of purchase-money—Costs.

By a Railway Act provision was made for the re-investment of the purchase-money of vicarage lands upon the petition of the vicar and patron with the consent of the ordinary of the diocese. An order was made referring it to the Master to inquire as to a proposed investment in land. The Master having reported in favour of the title, a petition was presented by the vicar and patron to confirm the report, and for consequential directions

Held, that the bishop was entitled to his costs of [illegible]

By the 9th section of the Bristol and Exeter Railway Company's Act (6 Wm. 4), provision was made for the purchase by the company of the vicarage house and part of the glebe of the vicarage of Creech St. Michael, in the county of Somerset, and that the purchase-moneys might, on petition to the Court, "by the vicar and patron for the time being of the vicarage, and with the consent of the ordinary for the time being of the diocese," be laid out and disposed of in the purchase of other lands, &c.

The 44th section provided that it should be lawful for the Court to order all the costs, charges, and expenses of or which might be incurred in consequence of the purchase or taking or using of such lands by the said company under or by virtue of that Act; and also of the investment in Government Securities or in the reinvestment in land, together with the necessary costs of obtaining the proper orders for such purposes, to be paid by the company. For the lands belonging to the vicarage, and taken by the company 2,450*l.* were paid into court, and were afterwards invested in the purchase of a sum of Consols, the dividends whereof were ordered to be paid to the vicar. Investments having being made of the greater part of the amount of stock, it was referred to the Master to inquire as to the propriety of the purchase and as to the title of a piece of land on which it was proposed to invest 184*l.* 11s. 6d. Consols (the remainder of the stock) and a small sum of cash. The Master, by his report dated the 4th of May, 1852, approved of the purchase and the title, and the present petition was presented to confirm the Master's report, and for consequential directions.

Prendergast appeared for the petitioners.

Fooks appeared for the Bishop of Bath and Wells to consent and asked for costs.

Osborne, for the railway company, objected to pay these costs, as the appearance here was unnecessary.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR made the order, and allowed the Bishop his costs, to be paid by the company, as he had a right to be present at all the proceedings.

MASTERS v. JOHNSON.

Defendant about to leave the country—Arrest by warrant of bankruptcy — Commissioner under 14 & 15 Vict. c. 52—Issuing and serving writ of capias within seven days from the date of such warrant.

The defendant was arrested under a warrant issued by a bankruptcy commissioner upon an affidavit satisfying him that defendant was about to leave the country. A writ of summons was sued out, and also a capias, but not within seven days afterwards, as required by the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 52. The defendant having been discharged after the seven days, he was again taken on the writ of capias:

Held, that he was entitled to be discharged, and to have the deposit he had made returned to him.

Field moved that the deposit made upon the arrest of defendant be returned, and the defendant discharged. The defendant had been arrested pursuant to the warrant of a Commissioner in Bankruptcy, at Birmingham (upon an affidavit stating that the defendant was about to leave the country); under the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 52, entitled "An Act to facilitate the more speedy Arrest of absconding Debtors;" by the 2nd section of which it is provided, "that every creditor who shall cause such warrant to issue shall forthwith cause to be issued a writ of capias, and also in cases where no action shall be pending, shall, before the issuing of such writ of capias, cause a writ of summons to be issued out of some one of the Superior Courts of Law against such debtor or debtors, and that upon such capias all mandates and warrants shall issue according to the practice now in use, notwithstanding that the defendant shall have been arrested by virtue of any warrant or warrants granted by such commissioner or judge, and such debtor or debtors shall, if in custody, be served with such writ of capias within seven days from the date of such warrant, including the day of such date, and thereupon such debtor or debtors shall be considered and deemed to have been arrested by virtue of such writ of capias, and all proceedings shall be had upon such writ of capias as if the same had been issued prior to the issuing of such warrant, and the arrest made on such writ of capias, and according to the practice now observed in the said Superior Courts of Law." And by the 3rd section it is enacted, "that the warrant or warrants which shall be issued by virtue of this Act, shall be auxiliary only to the processes now in use, and shall be wholly void and of none effect whatsoever as a protection to the person on whose behalf such warrant shall have issued, unless such writ of capias shall be issued and served in manner aforesaid." And by the 6th section it is provided, "that if no writ of capias be issued and served within seven days from the date of the said warrant, including the day of such date, the person arrested under such warrant shall be entitled to be discharged from custody, or in case the deposit has been made with, or bail bond given to, the said messenger or high bailiff, then the said deposit shall be returned, and the said bail bond given up to be cancelled." The warrant was dated the 4th May, 1852. Defendant was taken and detained in custody until the 11th May, but as his time expired on the night of the 10th, application was made for his discharge on the morning of the 11th: he was not discharged until the evening of the 11th, the capias was tested on the 11th, and in the evening of that day, on his return home, he was arrested on the capias. First, it was contended he was wrongly arrested; second, he could not be arrested twice for the same thing. The detention on the 11th was wrong and illegal as against the sheriff and the plaintiff; he was entitled to be discharged under the 6th section by the sheriff, and under the 3rd section by the plaintiff; if the detention be illegal then no process of detainer would be available. He referred to Chitty's Prac.; Burch v. Podger, 1 N.R.; Loveridge v. Plaistow, 2 Hy. Black. 29; Hooper v. Lane, 10 Q.B., where all the cases are collected; and see also Anon. 1 Dowl. 157.

Phipson contrà, shewed cause in the first instance, and contended under the Act of Parliament the writ and the arrest were good: when defendant was taken on the 11th he was on his return home; it was a detainer under the Act, so that it was, in fact, an original arrest or a second arrest.

Cur. adv. vult.

Saturday, June 26.—ALDERSON, B. delivered judgment.—This was an application to restore to the defendant sums deposited in this case. It appeared on the affidavit that under the provisions of the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 52, s. 1, application had been made to the commissioner of bankruptcy in the county, founded on certain facts as to the defendant's intention of leaving the country, and a warrant in due form was issued for apprehending him and lodging him in gaol. The parties then proceeded, and as we must presume on the same facts, to sue out a writ of summons, and to apply for a capias to be issued from this Court, in order that the defendant might be treated as arrested under such capias, and all proceedings taken under the commissioner's warrant under such writ, as by the Act is required to be done within the space of seven days after the date of the commissioner's warrant. This was not done; then the gaoler, after detaining the defendant in custody for the seven days, and even longer (an excess which does not seem material to our judgment, although unquestionably utterly indefensible), discharged him from custody; he was afterwards apprehended under the capias and detained until he made deposit, for the return of which this application was made. We think the rule must be made absolute. This capias was applied for, not on independent grounds, but on the same grounds on which the commissioner's warrant was originally obtained, and is in truth a part of and a completion of the proceeding, and, inasmuch as it did not comply with the Act by being issued and served within the limited time, the seven days, we think the defendant could not legally be arrested and detained under it. The 6th section of the Act provides that all the proceedings of making deposit or giving bail under a writ of capias may take place under a commissioner's warrant, but subject to the proviso, that if the writ of capias applied for does not arrive and is not served within the limited seven days, the deposit shall be restored and the bail-bond cancelled. Now we think the Legislature could never mean that this should be served, yet that if the writ of capias come down a little too late, the deposit should be made again, or a fresh bail-bond again. We think, therefore, that this falls within the principle of law "nemo debet bis vexari pro una et eadem causa," and a capias thus applied for legalising the proceedings under the warrant, and on the same ground as those on which the warrant was itself void, falls with the warrant, unless it be granted and served within the seven days limited by the Act. We do not, however, say that no fresh capias could issue; on the contrary, if applied for on fresh grounds, and at any time afterwards, it would be valid, and the defendant may be lawfully detained under it, then it will not be a second arrest "pro una eadem causa." In the present case we are of opinion that the rule must, for this reason, be made absolute. The other grounds on which it was applied for seem to us to be untenable. Rule absolute, but without costs.

SWATMAN (Clerk to Commissioners) v. AMBLER.

Letting of Tolls—Local Act of Parliament directing how letting to take place, and number of commissioners to sign lease—Less number executing—Action for rent.

A certain number of commissioners, by virtue of a local Act of Parliament, had power to let and demise certain tolls, and to sue by their clerk. The tolls were properly let, and the demise purported to be made by and between five of the commissioners (the number required) and the lessee: the whole five commissioners did not sign the deed. The lessee entered and received the tolls. In an action of debt on the demise,

Held, that the commissioners could not recover.

Action on an indenture purporting to be made by and between five commissioners, under an Act of Parliament for letting tolls, and the defendant, for the recovery of the rent due in respect thereof.

Plea.—That the number of commissioners named in the indenture never executed the lease, and that the nature of the occupation was at the will of the commissioners only, and not under the demise. The question turned upon the validity of that plea on a special demurrer to the replication.

Malcolm argued for the defendant, and relied upon Pitman v. Woodberry, 3 Ex. 4, and the local Acts of Parliament as to the tolls, and Doe d. Barlow v. Wiggins, 4 Q.B. 376.

Jas. Wylde, contrà.—This case is distinguishable from Pitman v. Woodberry; that was for letting land, and to repair, &c.; this is for letting tolls,—it is a letting for one year, and the money is to be payable monthly; and although it is reserved under the denomination of rent, yet, in fact, it is not rent at all, as is usually understood by that term "rent;" in cases of rent, there is a right of distress, also a reversion (Sheppard's Touchstone, tit. "Exposition of Deed," c. 5, 80), and therefore it is a covenant to pay a specific sum of money, which distinguishes it from Pitman v. Woodberry, and sufficient may be collected to support an action of debt. (Rose v. Poulton, 2 B. & Adol. 840.) Cur. adv. vult.

Saturday, June 26.—MARTIN, B. delivered judgment. This was a demurrer to the replication to the plea to the first count of the declaration. The count was in debt on an indenture, dated the 27th of December, 1849, alleged to have been made between five commissioners of an inland navigation, under the authority of several Acts of Parliament on the one part, and the defendant on the other part, whereby the commissioners, as the plaintiff alleged in the declaration, in consideration of the rent therein mentioned, demised the tolls of the said intended navigation to the defendant for one year, from the 1st of January, 1850, at a rent of 3,470*l.* payable monthly, together with some other payments, and the defendant's covenant with the commissioners, parties to the said indenture, and also with the whole body of commissioners of the navigation, as a separate covenant for due payment of the rent. The declaration then averred entry by virtue of the demise, occupying and receiving tolls during the entire year, and concluded in the usual way, alleging nonpayment of the rent. To this the defendant pleaded that the commissioners, the lessors named in the indenture, never executed the lease, and that the nature of the occupation was at the will of the commissioners only, and not under the demise. There was an immaterial replication to the plea, and demurrer to the replication. The only question argued before us was, whether the judgment of the Court, in Pitman v. Woodberry, in 3 Ex. 4, governs the present. It was argued, on the part of the plaintiff, that the principle of that case only applied to rent properly so called; that in the present case there was really no rent at all, but merely a sum in gross covenanted to be paid, and which was recoverable under a covenant, either by the body of commissioners at large, or by the five commissioners, parties to the indenture; and, inasmuch as the defendant actually enjoyed the tolls in precisely the same manner as if the lease had been executed, he was liable upon a covenant to pay the stipulated compensation, it being a gross sum; there is no doubt that this was not rent properly so called, this rent could only issue out of a corporeal hereditament, which tolls are not. We nevertheless think the principle of the judgment of Pitman v. Woodberry applies. That which the defendant stipulated for, and for which he was to pay the sum of money mentioned in the indenture, in the first count of the declaration, and in both designated as rent, was an estate in the tolls for the year, or a legal right to use an incorporeal hereditament for a year. The payment was to be made by him in consideration of his having such an estate or right as would, if the lessors had executed the indenture, have been an estate permanent, and continuing the right during the term of the demise. It is true that he had enjoyed the tolls during the whole term, but he had them under a different right altogether than that stipulated for by the indenture. In reality he occupied and enjoyed them under a licence, revocable at any moment; he, therefore, never had, nor did he enjoy, the interest for which he contracted to make the payment. We think the principle of Pitman v. Woodberry applies, as the true consideration for the payment stipulated in the indenture, viz. certain estates in the tolls for one year, never arose as a consideration, which has wholly failed, and the liability of the defendant could only, in our judgment, be enforced in a form of action totally different from that framed by a demise under the indenture, and the entry and enjoyment under it, which is the form of the claim set up in the first count, and which in reality never took place at all. The judgment will be for the defendant.

Judgment for defendant.

THOMPSON v. EASTWOOD.

Pleading—Replication de injuria.

The interest which excludes this replication must be an interest of the defendant in the land of the plaintiff, as to a common or rent out of the land, or a highway or passage over the land, and the authority which excludes must be an authority pleaded as coming from the plaintiff given to the defendant to do the act which is justified.

The case was argued by Cleasby and Lush. The facts and arguments sufficiently appear in the following

JUDGMENT.

Saturday, June 26.—ALDERSON, B.* delivered judgment.—This was a demurrer to a replication de injuria. The action was an action of trespass for entering the plaintiff's close, and pulling down stables. The defendant pleaded that he was possessed of a dwelling-house adjoining the plaintiff's close, and was entitled to have the light and air enter through a certain ancient window therein; that the stable wrongfully and unlawfully obstructed the ___ and darkened the window, wherefore he entered the plaintiff's close and pulled down the stable in order to remove the obstruction. To this ___ the plaintiff replied de injuria, to which the defendant demurred specially, setting forth the usual cause of demurrer to such a replication. We are of opinion the replication is good. The learned counsel on both sides applied to Crogate's case, 7th Rep. B, as laying down the rule,—namely, that such replication is proper when the plea consisted merely of excuse; and on no matter of interest or of authority or power mediately or immediately derived from the plaintiff. It was argued on behalf of the plaintiff that the defendant's enjoyment of the plaintiff's land was of the nature of a negative easement, and did claim an interest in the nature of a negative easement on the plaintiff's land, namely, to have no obstruction there to his window; and, secondly, he could only have the right to this light as entering the window by virtue of some authority from the plaintiff or those under whom the plaintiff claimed. But we think this plea claims no interest as set up, and no authority from the plaintiff or those under whom he claims, in the sense laid down in the rule which excludes this replication of de injuria. We think the interest which excludes this replication must be an interest of the defendant in the land of the plaintiff as to a common or rent out of the land, or a highway or passage over the land, and the authority which excludes must be an authority pleaded as coming from the plaintiff given to the defendant to do the act which is justified. The plea in the present case claims no interest in or profit to arise out of the plaintiff's land, but only claims the right on the part of the defendant to enjoy his own land in a given way, and without inconvenience or any nuisance erected on the plaintiff's land. Nor does it at all shew that the defendant's right to do the act complained of arose out of any authority given by the plaintiff or those under whom he claims, as is the case in a right of way; in which the going on the land to do the act complained of arises either directly in the exercise of the authority given to go on the plaintiff's land, or indirectly, where, there being an obstruction, it is removed in order to facilitate the exercise of the right of way given. Here the plea only shews a lawful excuse given by the law to the defendant for entering the plaintiff's land and pulling down the stable there because it was a nuisance and obstruction to the right he has to enjoy his own land without inconvenience. This is a plea, therefore, merely of excuse, and the plaintiff had a right, therefore, to reply de injuria as he has done. Our judgment, therefore, must be for the plaintiff.

PLATT, B.—The plea, in fact, admits a trespass, but excuses it on that ground. It comes completely within the rule. Judgment for the plaintiff.

Doe dem. SARAH JOHNSON v. E. H. JOHNSON.

Will, construction of—Estate in fee, or an estate in tail—(Glover v. Monckton, 3 Bing. 13.)

This was a special case, stated for the opinion of this Court, upon the construction of a will. The question being, whether Samuel Johnson took under the devise an estate in fee or an estate in tail only. The plaintiff contended it was an estate tail only, and the defendant that it was an estate in fee.

Walters appeared for the lessor of the plaintiff, and referred to Lord Scarborough v. Lumley, 3 A. & E. 1; Glover v. Monckton, 3 Bing. 13; Doe dem. Bloomfield v. Eyre, 5 C. B. 713.

Fooks, contra, for defendant, referred to 2 Jarman on Wills, 428; Roe v. Jefferys, 7 T. R. 589; Eastman v. Baker, 1 Taunt. 174; Doe dem. Smith v. Weller, 1 B. & Ald.; Doe v. Frost, 3 B. & Ald. 546; Ex parte Davies, 2 Simons, n. S. 114. The devise was as follows:—"I give and devise unto my dear wife, E. Johnson, all and singular my freehold and copyhold estates, situate, &c. in the parish of Great Coggeshall aforesaid, and Fearing, in the said county of Essex. To hold unto my said wife Elizabeth, and her assigns, for and during the term of her natural life, she keeping the same in good and tenable repair; and from and after her decease, I do give and devise the same unto my nephew Samuel Johnson, who now resides with me, his heirs and assigns, for ever, provided always, and my will is, that in case my said nephew, Samuel Johnson, should depart this life before he should attain the age of twenty-one years, and if after he shall have attained twenty-one years, should die unmarried, or having been married, without lawful issue, then I do give and devise the same in manner following; that is to say, I do give and devise unto my brother, E. H. Johnson, and his heirs, all that my copyhold farm and estate called Roots Farm, situate in the parish of Fearing, in the said county of Essex, to hold to my said brother, E. H. Johnson, his heirs and assigns, for ever; and I do give and devise my said estate in Great Coggeshall aforesaid, [illegible] others T. Johnson, Joseph Johnson, [illegible] and James Johnson, and [illegible], to hold to them (naming them), their heirs and assigns, for ever, as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants."

The testator died in 1827, the wife and devisee, Samuel Johnson, survived the testator, and Samuel Johnson survived the widow.

Cur. adv. vult.

JUDGMENT.

Saturday, June 26.—MARTIN, B. delivered judgment.—This was an action of ejectment, to recover the possession of certain lands in the parish of Coggeshall, in the county of Essex, in which, by consent of the parties, and on order of the judge, a case was stated for the opinion of the Court. The question is, whether the lessor of the plaintiff, Susanna Mary Johnson, was entitled to the lands above mentioned by virtue of a devise in the will of her grandfather, one William Johnson. If her father, Samuel Johnson, took an estate in fee by virtue of the devise she is not entitled; but if he took an estate tail she is. William Johnson, the devisor, being seised in fee of the lands devised in substance as follows: "I give and devise unto my wife Elizabeth the lands, to hold the same as to her and her assigns for and during her natural life, and after her decease, I give and devise the same to my nephew, Samuel Johnson, his heirs and assigns, for ever; provided always, and my will is, that in case it should happen that my said nephew should depart this life before he should attain the age of twenty-one years, or dying unmarried without lawful issue, then I give and demise the same unto my brothers, Thomas, Joseph, Edward, and James, and their heirs for ever, as tenants in common." The nephew, Samuel Johnson, attained twenty-one, and conveyed away the land, assuming to be tenant in fee simple thereof. He died, leaving two children, a son and a daughter, the lessor of the plaintiff surviving him. The son died an infant in the lifetime of Elizabeth Johnson, the tenant for life, and on her death the daughter brought the present ejectment, insisting that, by the devise above set out, an estate tail was created in her father, Samuel Johnson, and this estate not being barred by conveyance executed by him, she was entitled to recover possession of the lands in question. The case was fully argued before us, and we are of opinion Samuel Johnson did not take an estate tail, but took an estate in fee simple, with an executory devise over, in the event of his dying under twenty-one, or after that age dying without issue living at the time of his death. The estate expressly devised to him was an estate in fee simple to him and his heirs for ever; then there came a proviso, first, if he should die under twenty-one; secondly, if he should die after twenty-one, or marriage; thirdly, if he should die, he having been married, without lawful issue. Now, the first two of these events directly point to the period of his death. We think it would be a very forced construction of the devise to hold the third event pointed not to his death without leaving issue then living, but failure of issue of his body at any period however remote, which is the construction contended for on behalf of the lessor of the plaintiff. The same words "if he die under twenty-one, &c. if he should die after twenty-one unmarried, or dying, married, without lawful issue;" we think it was a state of things existing at the time of Samuel's death, which was to determine whether the future estate of the uncle, Thomas Johnson, and Joseph Johnson should come into the enjoyment or not. Indeed, the estate which it was contended by the learned counsel for the lessor of the plaintiff was created by the will was of such a shifting character, namely an estate in fee to Samuel Johnson, with an executory demise to his uncle in the event of his dying under twenty-one, but on attaining twenty-one, an estate tail to himself, with the remainder over to his uncle, we think that very plain and express words would be necessary to create such an estate. If the case stood alone without authority, we should have been of opinion Samuel Johnson took an estate in fee-simple, with an executory devise over. The case of Glover v. Monckton, 3 Bing. 13, seems to us expressly in point. There was there a devise of the real and personal estate in the first instance for the benefit of the son and daughter of the testator until they attained twenty-one, or the daughter married, and then to raise 5,000*l.* for her, then to his son, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns for ever, according to the respective nature of the estate; but as to the real estate, in case his son should not live to attain twenty-one, and his daughter should be living at his decease, or in case his son should live to attain such age, and should afterwards die without lawful issue, then to his daughter for life, the Court of C.P. certified to the Master of the Rolls in their opinion the son took an estate in fee of the real estate, with the executory devise over in the event of his dying without issue living at his death. This case seems to us directly in point, and confirms our view as to the true construction of the devise in the present case. None of the ___ cited by the learned counsel for the lessor of the plaintiff appear to us at all at variance with the C.P. in Glover v. Monckton, and we therefore, in pursuance of the power given to us, direct the judgment of Non pros. to be entered.

The Eastern Union Railway Company v. Hart and Another.

Mortgage by a railway company—Mortgagee's right to sue the company on covenant in mortgage to repay—Local Acts.

A Railway Act, 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85 (local), enacted (sec. 51) that if any interest due on any mortgage to the company should remain unpaid for thirty days after it had become due, and demand thereof had been made in writing, the mortgagee might sue for the interest in the Superior Courts, or require the appointment of a receiver. The 52nd section enacted, that if the principal money and interest were not paid within six months after it had become payable, and after demand in writing, the mortgagee might sue for the same in the Superior Courts. The 10 & 11 Vict. c. 174 (local, July 9, 1847), repealed the above Act; but by the 43rd section, re-enacted in substance the 52nd section of the repealed Act, so far as regarded the recovery of the interest due. The 10 & 11 Vict. c. 225 (local, July 22, 1847), under which the money hereinafter mentioned was borrowed, enacted, sec. 8, that the several provisions in certain recited Acts, amongst which was the repealed Act, 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85 (local), should apply to moneys "by this Act authorised to be borrowed." The Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, enacts, in sec. 50, that "the company may, if they think proper, fix a period for the repayment of the principal money so borrowed, with the interest thereon, and in such case the company shall cause such period to be inserted in the mortgage-deed or bond, and upon the expiration of such period the principal sum, together with arrears of interest thereon, shall, on demand, be paid to the party entitled to such mortgage or bond." The defendants, a railway company, having borrowed 1,000l. of the plaintiffs, executed to them a mortgage-deed in the form given in Schedule C, annexed to the Companies Clauses Act. The deed contained the following stipulation:—"The principal sum to be paid on the first day of January, 1851." An action having been brought by the plaintiffs to recover the principal sum lent:

Held, first, that the stipulation in the mortgage-deed that the principal sum was to be repaid on the 1st of January, 1851, imported a covenant by the defendants for the repayment of that sum on that day; that by virtue of that clause, and of the Companies Clauses Act, section 50, if that sum were not repaid on the day fixed, the plaintiffs had a right of action for the recovery thereof, and that such right was not taken away or affected by any other part of the Companies Clauses Act, or by the special Acts:

Held also, that where a corporation is created for certain purposes, with power to sue and to be sued, to borrow money for the completion of those purposes, and to secure the repayment of such money by an instrument which, on its face, imports a covenant for repayment, if money be so borrowed and so secured, an action may be maintained against the corporation on a breach of the covenant; and as all these circumstances concurred here, the company were bound by their covenant so as to give, in this case, a right of action thereon:

The money here was borrowed under the 10 & 11 Vict. c. 255 (local), under the same or the like provisions as contained in the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 94 (local), which authorises their borrowing pursuant to the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85. The 37th section gives power to borrow and secure repayment by mortgage of the railway and future calls. The 49th section enables the company to fix the period for repayment of principal and interest, which was done, and the security was in all respects in the form prescribed by the Legislature; the 51st section provides for the recovery of the principal, interest, and costs at the respective times at which the same became due, and that if the interest shall remain unpaid for thirty days after it shall have become due, and demand thereof made in writing, the mortgagee or bond creditor may either sue in an action of debt, or require the appointment of a receiver; and the 52nd section enacts, as to principal, interest, and costs, that if the same be not paid within six months after the same have become payable, and after demand thereof in writing, the mortgagee or bond creditor may sue for the same: or if his debt amount to 5,000l. and if not, in conjunction with other creditors to 10,000l. may require the appointment of a receiver:

Held, that these enactments do not alone give any right of action as upon a condition not complied with; they only recognise the pre-existing right of action, and add thereto another specific remedy at the option of the borrower: these clauses provide only specifically for the case of default for thirty days or six months respectively after demand made in writing, and in either of these specified cases to enact that the company would be subject not only to an action, but at the option of the lender to have a receiver put upon them.

Debt.—The declaration stated that after the passing of four Acts of Parliament, to wit, "The Eastern Union Railway Act, 1844," "The Eastern Union Railway Amendment Act, 1845," "The Eastern Union, Hadleigh, and Colchester Railway Act, 1846," and an Act of 11 & 12 Vict. entitled "An Act to amalgamate the Eastern Union and Ipswich and Bury St. Edmunds Railway Companies;" and after the making of the deed of mortgage hereafter mentioned, it was proved to the satisfaction of the Commissioners of Railways, and certified by them, that one-half of the whole amount of the capital, exclusive of loans, by the several Acts of Parliament relating to the company, namely, the Eastern Union Railway Company mentioned and referred to in the first-mentioned Act of Parliament, authorised to be raised, and also half of the capital authorised to be raised by the Acts of Parliament relating to the Ipswich and Bury St. Edmunds Railway Company mentioned and referred to in the said Act fourthly above mentioned, had been actually paid up and expended for the purposes authorised by the several Acts of Parliament relating to the said two last-mentioned companies respectively; and that thereupon and by virtue of the Act of Parliament fourthly above mentioned, the defendants became incorporated by the said name of "The Eastern Union Railway Company." That after the passing of the said Acts of Parliament and of the Eastern Union and Harwich Railway and Pier Act 1847, and before the granting of the certificate, the Eastern Union Railway Company, in pursuance of the provisions of the said last-mentioned Act, and also of an order of a general meeting of the last-mentioned company, them empowering, by a certain deed of mortgage, in consideration of the 1,000l. by the said company then borrowed at interest from the plaintiffs, the company did assign to the plaintiffs the undertaking in the said last-mentioned Act mentioned, and all the tolls and sums of money arising by virtue of that Act, and all the estates, right, &c. of the company in the same, to hold unto the plaintiffs until the sum of 1,000l. with interest at 5l. per cent. should be satisfied; and by the said deed it was stipulated that the principal sum of 1,000l. should be repaid on the 1st of January, 1851, being the period fixed by the company for the payment thereof, which period elapsed after the certificate, before the demand hereafter mentioned, and before action, averment, that before the making of the said order of the said general meeting and the borrowing of the money, all the moneys by the Acts of Parliament, first, secondly, and thirdly above mentioned authorised to be raised by shares, had been subscribed for, and that half thereof had been paid up, and that the sum so borrowed of the plaintiffs did not, at the time of the borrowing, and at the date of the mortgage, together with other sums then borrowed, under the authority of the said Acts, exceed the sum of 66,666l. in addition to the sum which, by the said three last-mentioned Acts, the Eastern Union Railway Company was empowered to borrow, and that from the making of the said deed the plaintiffs have been and still are the holders of and entitled to the said deed of mortgage, and that the said principal sum of 1,000l. was not paid to the plaintiffs on the 1st of January, 1851, but that the said principal sum is still due. The declaration then stated a demand of payment of the 1,000l. and nonpayment by the defendants.

The plea craved oyer of the mortgage-deed, which was in these words:—"Eastern Union Railway Company debenture bond, 1,000l. Mortgage, No. 112. By virtue of an Act passed on the 22nd day of July, 1847, intituled 'The Eastern Union and Harwich Railway and Pier Act,' we, the Eastern Union Railway Company, in consideration of the sum of 1,000l. paid to us by J. G. Hart, of Stowmarket, in the county of Suffolk, esq. and Charles Robert Bree, of Stowmarket, in the county of Suffolk, surgeon, do assign unto the said J. G. Hart and Charles Robert Bree, their executors, administrators, and assigns, the said undertaking, and all the estate, right, title, and interest of the company in the same, to hold unto the said J. G. Hart and Charles Robert Bree, their executors, administrators, and assigns, until the said sum of 1,000l. together with interest for the same, at the rate of 5l. for every 100l. by the year, be satisfied; the principal sum to be paid on the 1st day of Jan. 1851. Given under our common seal," &c. The defendants then pleaded that they borrowed from various other persons divers sums of money, parcels of the 66,666l. and executed to them mortgages of the same tolls and sums of money as are mentioned in the deed-poll and in the form given in schedule C; that the 1,000l. mentioned in the declaration was another parcel of the 66,666l.; that the said sums are still unpaid, and that the sums applicable for the payment thereof are insufficient; that for securing to the said mortgagees their proportions it was necessary for a receiver to be appointed to divide the same rateably, or that some other course, not being an action at law, should be adopted, and that the present action was brought for the purpose of obliging the defendants to pay to the plaintiffs more than their just proportion of the mortgaged tolls and sums of money.(a)

Demurrer to the plea.—The plea was, however, given up, and the real question turned upon the sufficiency of the declaration. The case was argued below (see it reported 21 L.J. N.S. 97, Ex.; and 18 Law T. Rep. 290) in the Court of Ex.;

(a) The 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85, "An Act for making a Railway from Colchester to Ipswich." Sec. 51. "And in order to provide for the recovery of the arrears of interest and costs, or of the principal and interest and costs of any such mortgage or bond, at the respective times at which such interest, or such principal and interest and costs become due, be it enacted, that if such interest or any part thereof shall for thirty days after the same shall have become due, and demand thereof shall have been made in writing, remain unpaid, the mortgagee or bond creditor may either sue for the interest so in arrear by action of debt in any of the Superior Courts, or he may require the appointment of a receiver by an application to be made as hereinafter provided."

Sec. 52. "And with respect to such principal money, interest, and cost, be it enacted, that if such principal money and interest be not paid within six months after the same has become payable, and after demand thereof in writing, the mortgagee or bond creditor may sue for the same in any of the Superior Courts of Law or Equity; or if his debt amount to the sum of 5,000l. he may alone, or if his debt does not amount to the sum of 5,000l. he may in conjunction with other mortgagees, or bond creditors whose debts being so in arrear after demand as aforesaid, shall together with his amount to the sum of 10,000l. require the appointment of a receiver, by an application to be made as hereinafter provided."

The Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 16.—Sec. 42. "The respective mortgagees shall be entitled one with another to their respective proportions of the tolls, sums, and premises, comprised in such mortgages, and of the future calls, payable by the shareholders, if comprised therein, according to the respective sums in such mortgages mentioned, to be advanced by such mortgagees respectively, and to be repaid the sum so advanced, with interest, without any preference one above another, by reason of priority of the date of any such mortgage, or of the meeting at which the same was authorised."

Sec. 50. "The company may, if they think proper, fix a period for the repayment of the principal so borrowed, with the interest thereof; and in such case the company shall cause such period to be inserted in the mortgage deed or bond; and upon the expiration of such period, the principal sum, together with the arrears of interest thereon, shall, on demand, be paid to the party entitled to such mortgage or bond, and if no other place of payment be inserted in such mortgage or bond, such principal and interest shall be payable at the principal office or place of business of the company."

Sec. 53. "Where by the special Act the mortgagees of the company shall be empowered to enforce the payment of the arrears of interest, or the arrears of principal and interest due on such mortgage by the appointment of a receiver, then, if within thirty days after the interest accruing upon any such mortgage has become payable, and after demand thereof in writing, the same be not paid, the mortgagee may, without prejudice to his right to sue if within six months after the principal money owing upon any such mortgage has become payable, and after demand thereof in writing, the same be not paid, the mortgagee, without prejudice to his right to sue for such principal money, together with all arrears of interest, in any of the Superior Courts of Law or Equity, may, if his debt amount to the prescribed sum alone, or if his debt does not amount to the prescribed sum, he may, in conjunction with other mortgagees whose debts being so in arrear, after demand as aforesaid, shall, together with his amount to the prescribed sum, require the appointment of a receiver, by an application to be made as thereinafter provided."

The 11 & 12 Vict. c. 174. "An Act to Amalgamate the Eastern Union and Ipswich and Bury St. Edmunds Railway Companies" (9th July, 1847), sec. 43, "And in order to provide for the recovery of the arrears of interest and costs, or of the principal and interest and costs of any such mortgage or bond as may have been or may be granted by either of the dissolved companies, or by the new company, at the respective times at which such interest or such principal and interest and costs become due, be it enacted, that if such interest or part thereof shall, for thirty days after the same shall have become due, and demand thereof shall have been made in writing, remain unpaid, the mortgagee or bond creditor may either sue for the interest in arrear by action of debt in any of the Superior Courts, or he may require the appointment of a receiver, according to the provisions in that behalf contained in the said Companies Clauses Consolidation Act."

The 10 & 11 Vict. c. 225, "An Act to empower the Eastern Union Railway Company to make a Railway from the Eastern Union Railway at Manningtree to Harwich, with Branches thereout, and for other Purposes." Sec. 8 enacts, "That the several provisions of the said recited Acts, with regard to the borrowing of the moneys thereby authorised to be borrowed, and the conversion thereof into capital, and as to the creation of shares or stock in lieu of borrowing the same, and as to consolidating the old with the new shares of the company, shall equally apply to the moneys by this Act authorised to be borrowed, and the shares by this Act authorised to be created."

and that Court decided that the general ordinary right of the mortgagee to sue on such an instrument was not affected or taken away by the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, or the special Acts referred to in the statute under which the mortgage was given, and therefore the plaintiff was entitled to maintain this action against the company. The company thereupon brought a writ of error.

Bramwell and Willes appeared for the company, the plaintiffs in error.—It will be recollected that these companies are statutory corporations only, with certain defined powers, beyond which they cannot go, nor can this company bind itself by any such covenant as this, unless enabled to do so by specific statutory provision, so as to give a right of action in the way the plaintiff seeks to enforce it. These Acts of Parliament are to authorise or command the company to make highways: they are permitted also to be carriers; but that is permissive only, and not compulsory. It certainly was never intended that one mortgagee should have advantage over another, and the Legislature never intended that any one creditor should have a preference over or against the other creditors of a railway company, and so by bringing an action, prevent the company from themselves carrying on their trade. If it had been designed that a mortgagee should have a right of action for the principal, the Legislature would have said so in express terms. A form of bond is given in the schedule, but the words of that instrument do not give a right of action. All the rights and remedies that a mortgagee of a railway company possesses are given by the Acts of Parliament, and there is no authority given by any of these Acts to sue as the plaintiffs here have; and not only are there no such enabling clauses in the statutes relating to this company, but these statutes point out distinctly what specific remedies are to and shall be adopted for the recovery of moneys advanced, and those alone, therefore, can be had recourse to. It is unreasonable that a mortgagee should, as against a public company, under the circumstances, have this right of action. The 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85 (secs. 51 and 52), gives power to get a receiver appointed upon default; and it is contended by the other side that this is additional to the right to sue, but the company insist this is not so, and that the Court below have given a very strained construction to those two sections. The true remedy is to go to a Court of Equity, where all can properly share alike. No action can be brought, therefore, as the remedy is by the appointment of a receiver by a Court of Equity under the clauses of the Act of Parliament. It may be that the right of action is taken away altogether for recovery of the principal. The Court below say that there is a right of action existing, unless it be expressly taken away; but the company contend there is no right of action subsisting, unless given. The instrument itself gives no right of action, and no right of action is given under any circumstances. (The following cases upon the subject were referred to as upon points somewhat similar:—Pontet v. The Basingstoke Canal Company, 3 Bing. N.C. 433; Pardoe v. Price, 13 M. & W. 267; and 16 M. & W. 451; Doe dem. Wyatt v. The St. Helen's and Runcorn Gap Railway Company, 2 Q. B. 364.) The language and enactments of the local Acts shew that the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover the principal money. The 7 & 8 Vict. c. 75 (1844), by secs. 51 and 52, gives a mortgagee and bondholder the right of recovering both interest and principal. The 8th section of the 10 & 11 Vict. c. 225 (July 22, 1847), incorporates the provisions of certain recited Acts, namely, the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85, and two other Acts. But then at that time the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85, had been repealed by the 10 & 11 Vict. c. 174 (9th of July, 1847). Now, the 53rd section of 10 & 11 Vict. c. 174, gives a power of recovering interest only, but not principal. It must, therefore, be considered that the power of suing for the principal money having been deliberately taken away, and a right of suing for the interest only having been substituted, the Legislature did not intend that any power of suing for the principal should belong to the mortgagees. Again, if the Court should be of opinion, that the plaintiffs have a right to recover the principal money, under the 53rd section of the Companies Clauses Act, the declaration is bad in not stating that the six months mentioned in that section have elapsed, and that there has been a demand in writing.

Mellish, for the defendants in error.—With respect to the objection that the declaration does not state that six months have elapsed, or that any demand in writing has been made, it is enough to say, that this objection being taken on general demurrer, the declaration is in that respect sufficient. It says, there was a demand, but not in writing; but how could a demand like this be made on a corporation except in writing? The plaintiffs have a right of action against the company for the recovery of the principal money lent. It will be necessary in the first instance, to look particularly to the form of the instrument upon which this action is brought, and it will be seen thereby that the 1st of January, 1851, is the day expressly fixed for the repayment of the money. It may be conceded that the company could only borrow under and in pursuance of the various Acts giving them the power to do so; yet at the same time, the deed when so made by them must have its natural and ordinary operation, otherwise the covenant contained therein under the seal of the company would act rather as a trap than otherwise upon a creditor; the dates of the several Acts of Parliament in reference to this company are material. [He then stated the dates of the several Acts of Parliament passed, as already given.] The company was dissolved after the mortgage by the Act, and another formed, and the amalgamating Act is cap. 174. The point in the present case will, in some degree, turn upon the construction to be placed upon the sections in the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, from sec. 38 to sec. 55 inclusive. Of these sections the 42nd, 50th, and 53rd are the most material; the 49th and 52nd sections of the main (local) Act are the sections which the defendants in error mostly rely on, they correspond with the 48th, 50th, and 53rd sections of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act; the 53rd is the same in effect as the 52nd of the other local Act, it gives the right to recover without prejudice to any action to be brought. The 50th section empowers companies to fix a time for repayment of the money borrowed, at the expiration of which time the principal and interest are to be repaid on demand. The 53rd section empowers the mortgagees to enforce payment of the principal and interest due, by requiring the appointment of a receiver, without prejudice, however, to their right of suing at law for the interest. If a receiver is appointed under this Act, he would be bound to take the profits and tolls of the railway company. The 42nd and 44th sections of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act do not give the mortgagees and bond creditors of a railway company a specific lien upon the goods and chattels of the company. (Russell v. The East Anglian Railway Company, 3 Mac. & G. 104; and 20 L. J. Ch. 257.) And it may be doubtful whether the Court of Chancery has jurisdiction to appoint a receiver and manager of a railway; it would certainly be a very dangerous proceeding, so far at least as the public are concerned, that different managers should be allowed to come in from time to time, and at a day's notice take the entire management of such undertakings into their own hands, to work the railway and trust these newly constituted managers with the lives of passengers. The form of bond given in the schedule of the local Act is the same as in the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, and is nothing more than a common money bond, the promise being to pay on a particular day; surely they have a right of action then, if it be not expressly taken away; there is no other remedy except the appointment of a receiver, unless by action. Pontet v. The Basingstoke Canal Company is a different case altogether to this, because here in the instrument itself is an express day appointed for payment of the money; a railway company and a canal company are also different,—with the latter a receiver and manager may be conveniently appointed, but not so with a railway company. That case shews that lenders of money to canal companies have great difficulty in recovering the interest. Since, therefore, a mortgage passes no interest in the real or personal property of the company, and gives scarcely any interest in the profits of the concern, as there exists great difficulty in getting the tolls of a railway paid, the mortgagees ought to possess the power of bringing actions for the interest and principal. The 42nd section merely enacts, that the mortgagees are to be entitled, one with another, to their proportions of the tolls, &c. without any preference by reason of priority of the date of the mortgage; then, the 50th section enacts, that on the expiration of the time fixed for payment, the principal and interest shall on demand be paid to the mortgagee. The right of action given is not taken away in express terms, and these Acts of Parliament should be construed against the company.

Tuesday, June 1.—COLERIDGE, J. delivered judgment.—This case was argued during the last vacation. The question, in substance, is, whether on the declaration with the instrument declared on, imported into it on oyer, the action is maintainable against the Eastern Union Railway Company. We are of opinion in the affirmative, and consequently the judgment of the Court below must be affirmed. It was not denied by the counsel for the plaintiff in error that the instrument itself on its face, apart from all considerations of its validity, importing a covenant by the company for repayment of the money advanced upon a day therein named for the purpose, for that, apart from such consideration, the action would be maintainable. But it was contended, in the first place, unless enabled by specific statutory provisions, the company could not bind themselves by any such covenant as this instrument imports, so as to give a right of action; and, secondly, not only were there no such enabling clauses in the statutes relied on by the plaintiffs, but that these statutes give other specific remedies for the recovery of the money advanced, which, alone, can be had recourse to; and, thirdly, it was contended even if an action could be maintained at all, it could only be after demand in writing, of which there was no sufficient allegation in the declaration. Now we are clearly of opinion, where a corporation is created for certain purposes, with power to sue and be sued, and to borrow money for the completion of those purposes, and to secure the repayment of such money by an instrument which on its face imports a covenant for repayment, if money be so borrowed and so secured, an action upon promises may be maintained against the corporation on a breach of the covenant. This appears to us a necessary inference from the premises just stated; and as all these premises concur in the present case, without a more specific examination of the sections of the various statutes, this is enough to dispose of the first point made by the plaintiffs in error, a point undoubtedly not very earnestly insisted on by their counsel. The second point will require a more detailed examination of the several statutes referred to in the argument. By the mortgage it appears that the money in question was borrowed under the powers conferred by the 10 & 11 Vict. c. 255 (local). The money borrowed under that Act is by the seventh section borrowed under the same or the like provisions as are contained in the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 94 (local). This Act, in sec. 6, enables the company there named to borrow on mortgage or bond, and for securing the repayment of the mortgage-money, as authorised by the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85. To this Act, therefore, we must look, and though by the 10 & 11 Vict. c. 174 (local), it is, for general purposes, repealed, yet, for the purposes of our present inquiry, it is in full force. The 37th section of this Act gives power to borrow and secure repayment by mortgage of the railway and future calls; the 49th section enables the company to fix the period for the repayment of the principal and interest, and in such case they are to cause a period to be inserted in the mortgage-deed, as they have done here, on the expiration of which period it is enacted that the principal and the arrears of interest shall be paid to the party entitled, to the mortgagees, it being undisputed that the money in question was borrowed under such circumstances in all respects as satisfied the conditions imposed by the Legislature, and that the instrument of security is in the form prescribed. It is clear if the statute had stopped here an action might have been maintainable, and this is very important in determining the constructions of the sections to which we are now coming, and on which has arisen whatever difficulty has been felt by any member of this court in the decision of this case. The plaintiffs in error contend that these, and these alone, give any right of action as upon a condition not complied with. The defendants in error maintain that they give no right of action,—they only recognise the pre-existing right, and add thereto another specific remedy at the option of the borrower. These sections, 51 and 52, which may be read as one, commence with this preamble,—"In order to provide for the recovery of the arrears of interest and costs, or of the principal, interest, and costs of any such mortgage or bond at the respective times at which such principal, interest, and costs, become due." And the 52nd section, as to principal and interest and costs, enacts, "that if the same be not paid within six months after the same have become payable, and after demand thereof in writing, the mortgage or bond creditor may sue for the same, or if his debt amount to 5,000*l.* and, if not, in conjunction with other creditors, to the amount of 10,000*l.* may require the appointment of a receiver. The 51st section had previously provided that if the interest shall remain unpaid for thirty days after it shall have become due, and demand thereof shall be made in writing, the mortgage or bond creditor may either sue in an action of debt or may require the appointment of a receiver. Now, as to both principal and interest, the 49th section, as we have just seen, provided it shall be paid at the expiration of the period on a day named in the instrument of security. If, therefore, we hold the expiration of six months in one case, and thirty days in the other, after such period, are conditions precedent to any right to recover by action, either we make the sections inconsistent, or we must suppose a mere right has been declared by the former section, that is a right to repayment on a day named for the purpose by the debtor, but no remedy to enforce it given until the thirty days or six months later, with a superadded condition of a demand in writing. This in itself would be unreasonable, and the more so because these terms certainly do not apply to the company, which is left at liberty to pay at a day named, at all events, a liberty which, considering how often such loans are made by way of investment, and how the value of money fluctuates in short periods of time, will, in many supposable cases, operate very inconveniently to the lender.

Moreover, if we give this construction to the 49th section, we must do the same to the 56th, which provides for cases where no time has been fixed in the mortgage-deed or bond for the repayment of the money, and enacts that the lender may, at the expiration of, or at any time after the expiration of twelve months' date, if the mortgage or bond demand payment of the principal, with all arrears of interest, on giving six months' previous notice for that purpose. It would be strange to hold that, where by six months' notice the money under this section had become payable at the end of twelve months, still that no action could be maintained till after six months' further default, and demand in writing. Yet this must be the consequence if we hold the right of action is given by the 51st and 52nd sections only. But this construction, which involves such difficulty, is not a necessary one; all the enacting words of both would receive a full and satisfactory meaning if we suppose them to provide only specifically for the case of default for thirty days or six months respectively after demand made in writing, and in either of these specified cases to enact that the company would be subject not only to an action, but at the option of the lender to have a receiver put upon them,—an arrangement which, whether advantageous or not to the lender, could not but be highly inconvenient to them. We agree with the Court below in thinking that this is the true construction of these sections; and it has the advantage of making them agree with the corresponding sections of the Companies Clauses Act, the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, ss. 50, 51, 52, and 53 of which provide for the repayment of the money borrowed at interest where a time has been fixed; and where no time has been fixed in the instrument, and the last of which expressly give a right to require the appointment of a receiver after thirty days' or six months' default, as the case may be, and after demand in writing, without prejudice to the right to sue. The conclusion to which we have been thus brought on this point makes it unnecessary to consider whether the demand in writing is sufficiently alleged, and we are therefore of opinion the decision of the Court of Ex. ought to be affirmed. Judgment affirmed.

Tuesday, June 1.

McGREGOR v. THE OFFICIAL MANAGER OF THE DOVOR AND DEAL RAILWAY COMPANY.

Railway company—Purposes of incorporation—Limited authority to contract—Illegal contract.

A railway company, incorporated by Act of Parliament, cannot apply the corporate property to any purposes not authorised by the Act; and a contract made by such a company to pay the costs of an application to Parliament for an Act to authorise the making of another railway projected by other parties, if that application should fail, and to take a lease of the line, if it should succeed, is illegal and void, unless the power to do so should be expressly conferred by the Act; and the contract is equally void, although in form it be a contract by the chairman that the company shall pay.

This was a writ of error brought by the defendant below upon a judgment of the Court of Q. B. and came before the Court upon a bill of exceptions; but the case was decided upon an objection taken in arrest of judgment to the sufficiency of the declaration; and the points raised by the bill of exceptions therefore became immaterial.

The declaration alleged that a certain company had been formed for the purpose of making a railway from Dovor to Deal, which required an Act of Parliament; that doubts were entertained by the managing committee whether it was expedient to apply to Parliament, and that certain negotiations were pending between the managing committee and the South-Eastern Railway Company, of which the defendant was chairman, as to certain propositions made by the one company to the other; and that in consideration that the managing committee would not abandon their object, but would proceed therewith, and apply to Parliament for an Act to authorise the making of the Deal and Dover Railway, and would hand over the scheme to the South-Eastern Railway Company in the event of an Act being obtained, the defendant promised the plaintiffs that in the event of an application to Parliament failing, the South-Eastern Railway Company would insure the company, of which the plaintiffs were the provisional managing committee, against any loss which might be caused to the said company by such rejection and failure, and would defray and pay all expenses that should be incurred by them in endeavouring to obtain the Act of Parliament. The declaration contained averments stating the application to Parliament, the rejection and failure of that application, the amount of the expenses incurred; and that the South-Eastern Railway Company had failed to make good the loss; which the plaintiffs therefore claimed of the defendant.

The case was argued on Monday, May 10, before Alderson, B., Maule, Cresswell, JJ., Platt, B., V Williams, and Talfourd, JJ.

Sir F. Kelly, Solicitor-General (Watson with him), for the plaintiff in error, the defendant below, contended that the South-Eastern Railway Company, having been incorporated for certain purposes expressed in their Act of Parliament, had no authority to apply the funds of the company to any other purposes; and that the contract declared upon was a contract that the company should do an illegal act, and was itself illegal and void. He relied upon The East Anglian Railway Company v. The Eastern Counties Railway Company, 21 L. J., C. P. 23, and cases there cited.

Channell, Serjt. contrà.—The case cited is distinguishable. There the plaintiffs were an incorporated company, having no existence except under the Act of Parliament; here the plaintiffs are a provisional committee of a projected company, and not tied down by the provisions of an Act of Parliament, and how can the Court know that the South-Eastern Railway Company, mentioned in the declaration, is the same company as is incorporated under that name by Act of Parliament. [MAULE, J.—The Court knows only of one company by that name; and we must intend that that is the company mentioned in the declaration.] Assuming that to be so, there is still this important distinction between the present case and the one cited; that this is not a contract by the company, but a contract by an individual that the company will do a certain act. Why may not a stranger undertake to pay certain costs in consideration of a particular course being taken, provided a certain company does not pay them? If it would be illegal for the company to pay them, it is not illegal for a stranger to do so. [MAULE J.—How could he plead performance of this agreement unless the company paid?] He might plead that he himself had paid. [MAULE, J.—No; that would not be performance of the contract; he must allege that the company has paid. CRESSWELL, J.—Can A. contract that B. shall sell a void term in an advowson? PLATT, B. — That B. should commit simony? V. WILLIAMS, J.—That would be malum in se.] This is a personal undertaking by Mr. M'Gregor, and therefore no violation of the law. If he makes the payment out of his own funds upon the default of the company, he might be said to make it on their behalf. [MAULE, J.—Wherever the company get the funds, it is contrary to public policy that persons incorporated for a specific purpose should exceed the authority conferred for that purpose only. PLATT, B.—If this is a contract by the defendant to pay, it is not illegal, but otherwise it is.] The contract may fairly be taken to mean that the defendant contracts on behalf of the individuals constituting the company, and not on behalf of the corporate body.

The COURT intimated that probably it would not be necessary to hear the Solicitor-General in reply. Cur. adv. vult.

JUDGMENT.

ALDERSON, B. now delivered the judgment of the Court.—We do not think it necessary to hear the Solicitor-General in reply to the arguments of my brother Channell in this case, nor to consider the question involved in the bill of exceptions at all. We are of opinion that the declaration does not state any sufficient cause of action, and that the judgment ought to be arrested for this defect, and this involves the reversal of the present judgment of the Court of Q. B. [His lordship then stated the substance of the declaration.] The Solicitor-General argued that this promise of the defendants was in truth a promise that the South-Eastern Railway Company should do an illegal thing, and that the promise was therefore void, and we are of that opinion. This is not like the promise of a party that an act impossible to be done shall be done by the defendant or by some third person, but it is a promise that an act shall be done contrary to the public law of the country, of which both parties are bound to take notice; the act is therefore illegal, and the promise that it should be done is a void promise. The question, we think, is determined by the decision of the Court of C. P. in The East Anglian Railway Company v. The Eastern Counties Railway Company. It is there laid down that a railway company, incorporated by Act of Parliament, is bound to employ all the funds of the company for the purposes directed and provided for by the Act, and for no other purpose whatever; and there the defendants having, inter alia, covenanted to pay the costs of soliciting Bills then pending in Parliament, it was held that the Act incorporating the defendants being a public Act, must be presumed to be known to the plaintiffs, and that they could not recover, inasmuch as the covenant entered into by the defendants was beyond the scope of their authority as a corporation, and was therefore illegal and void. The Court there say such a contract is illegal, because it is contrary to the Act of Parliament, which was passed to give them certain powers as a corporation for public purposes of advantage to the country at large, as well as for the private gain of the individual members of the corporation; and they add, that the actual assent of the whole body of shareholders would make no real difference in the matter. If this be so, both the plaintiffs and the defendant here must be taken, with full knowledge of the powers conferred on the South-Eastern Railway Company, to have made a contract by which the defendant is to bind the company to do an illegal act; not merely an act which they have not power to do, but an act contrary to public policy and the provisions of a public Act. This, we think, is a void contract, and one which, therefore, could not form the proper ground for a suit in a court of law. The declaration is therefore, we think, bad, and the judgment ought to have been arrested, and ought now to be arrested in this Court. We think therefore the judgment of the Q. B. must, for these reasons, be reversed, and the judgment must be arrested.

Judgment reversed.

Before JERVIS, C.J.; PARKE, B.; ALDERSON, B.; CRESSWELL, J.; PLATT, B.; TALFOURD, J.; and MARTIN, B.)

SIDEBOTTOM v. BOSTOCK.

Deed—Construction—Power when determined.

Demise, with liberty to cut a goit out of a river, through, &c. at a convenient distance above, &c. in the most convenient direction through, &c. with liberty from time to time to view, repair, and amend the goit. Covenant, to arch over the goit, and then cover it with soil so as to make the same into arable or mowing land.

goit was accordingly completed and covered over, and continued so for a long time, but being then found too small, was re-opened and widened.

Held (affirming the decision of the Court of Q.B.), that the power being only to make a goit, and then from time to time to view and repair that goit, was determined by once making and completing a goit, and hence that the re-opening and widening of it constituted a trespass.

Trespass for breaking and entering plaintiff's close, cutting down the sides, and widening of a sluice, goit or watercourse there.

Plea.—The defendant set out an indenture of demise for 999 years inter alia of certain lands being intended for a milldam or reservoir for water, and also part of the watercourse or bed of the river Mersey, and also liberty inter alia to make a weir or dam in, through, or across the said river, and also to cut a goit or sluice out of the said river through the close in the declaration mentioned, at a proper and convenient distance above the said weir, in the most convenient line or direction through the said close: and also to make a fender of shuttle at the mouth of, and a by-wash or wastegate at or by the side of such goit or sluice, and to cut a drain from such by-wash or waste gate into the said river, with liberty from time to view, examine, carry, and lay down materials, and repair and amend the said weir or dam, and also the said goit or sluice, fender or shuttle, by-wash or waste-gate and drains, as often as occasion should require, making satisfaction for damage. The indenture contained a covenant to erect certain buildings on part of the land demised, and to arch or over over the said goit or sluice, with good stone or brick, and afterwards cover the same again with soil, so as to make the same into good arable or mowing land or ground and keep and continue the same so covered with soil. The plea then traced the title of the defendant to the said demised premises, with the appurtenances, and to the said liberties, privileges, and powers so therewith granted, for the residue of the said term.

Averment, that the defendant being so possessed of the said demised tenements, with the appurtenances and liberties, and a certain weir or dam having before then, during the said term, under and by virtue of the said indenture, and in due exercise of the said liberties, privileges, and powers been made, and at the said time, when, &c. continuing so made in, through, and across the said river, and a certain goit of sluice (being the same sluice, goit, or watercourse, in the declaration mentioned), having also before, then, and during the said term, under and by virtue of the said indenture, and in due exercise of the said liberties, privileges, and powers, been cut and made, but the said sluice, goit, or watercourse, not being at the said time, and when, &c. cut or made to a sufficient width, and the same being then completed, and cut and made to a small width, to wit, &c. and such width being a wholly insufficient width, so that without widening the said sluice, goit, or watercourse, the said defendant could not have or enjoy the use and benefit of the said demised tenements in so free and ample a manner as he otherwise might and could, and was entitled to have and enjoy, by virtue of the said indenture, he, the said defendant, for the purpose of so widening and amending the said goit, as aforesaid, committed the trespasses in the declaration mentioned, doing no unnecessary damage.

Replication.—That before the expiration of two years from the commencement of the rent in the indenture reserved, and during the term and before the said time when, &c. the said lessees cut, made, and completed a certain goit out of the said river Mersey, the said goit being the same goit, sluice, or watercourse in the declaration and in the said plea mentioned, and then arched and covered over the said goit, and the same remained and continued so arched and covered over, and in that state and condition was used and enjoyed until the defendant, under colour of the said indenture, in pretended further exercise of the said liberties, broke and entered the said close, &c. in manner and form as in the declaration alleged.

Demurrer to the replication.

Friday, April 30.—The demurrer was argued in the Court of Q.B. by Maynard (Collier with him) for the defendant, and J. A. Russell for the plaintiff.

Cases cited.—Thicknesse v. Lancaster Canal Company, 4 M. & W. 472; Dand v. Kingscote, 6 M. & W. 174; Bishop v. North, 11 M. & W. 418; Hodgson v. Field, 7 East. 613; Mildmay v. Standish, Cro. Eliz. 34.

Lord CAMPBELL.—I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to our judgment. The replication seems to me to be a sufficient answer to the plea. I think that the license here given is to make a goit, and it is to be made at once; and that when it has once been made and completed, there is no power to make any other goit. It is not like a case where there is a power to do things toties quoties, to make various roads; but it is to make a goit. Then the replication shews that that power had once been exercised, and once exercised it was exhausted. The plaintiff having complained, declaring in trespass quare clausum fregit, the defendant relies on the power to make the goit. Then the replication shews that that power had been exercised, and having been exercised, I am of opinion that it is gone. There was a power to repair and a power to amend, but not a power to make another goit. Now I think this must be taken to be another goit, and not the goit originally made, as set out. The replication expressly avers, "that they cut, made, and completed a certain goit out of the river Mersey, in the said indenture, in the said plea mentioned, and at such distance from and above the said weir, in the said indenture and in the said plea mentioned, and in such direction as in the said indenture mentioned, and required and through the said close," shewing a complete exercise of that power. Then if this power was not to be exercised toties quoties it is gone, and affords no justification. If Mr. Maynard could have made out that which he was almost bold enough to contend for (and I think very properly, for that seems to me to be the only chance he had of succeeding), if he could have made out that this power might have been exercised from time to time in any direction, so as to suit the purposes of the lessees and their assigns during the whole 999 years, then it might be just as well with regard to the width as to the direction; but the power is "to cut a sluice or goit out of the said river at a proper and convenient distance from and above the said weir, in the most convenient line or direction through the close called the Em Meadow." If he could shew that, a goit having been cut and enjoyed for a number of years, it was found to be inconvenient, and that another goit might be cut in a direction more convenient, then he would have succeeded. It seems to me this is not the license and liberty which is reserved, but if it is to make a goit, and when that goit is once made and completed, the power is exercised, and cannot be exercised in making another goit, either of a greater width or in a different direction, of course the plea is completely answered. As to the cases referred to, I do not think they are in point. The first he referred to of the canal was quite clear. The canal had never been made, and had not been completed; it was only a part of the canal that was made; and in the other case there was a power of making roads toties quoties, and it was not one power, but it was a power which might be exercised from time to time during the whole occupancy. For these reasons I am of opinion that the replication is good, and that we are bound to give judgment for the plaintiff.

WIGHTMAN, J.—Considering the power which is given by the indenture in this case and the mode in which that power has been exercised by the defendant, it appears to me the plaintiff is entitled to our judgment. Now what is the power? The power is to cut a goit or sluice out of the river at a proper and convenient distance in the most convenient line or direction through a close called the "Em Meadow." That is a power to cut the goit in a most convenient line, and then there is full and free liberty and privilege and power from time to time and at all times during the term, to view, examine, and carry and lay down materials, and repair and amend the said weir or dam, and also the said goit and sluice when so made as aforesaid, and any of them, when and as often as need or occasion should be and require, making satisfaction for any damage occasioned thereby. Now, taking these terms as I have read them, it appears to me clearly to contemplate the making of one goit, and making [illegible] once for all, and not merely experimentally making a goit which might possibly be considered not completed, but making a goit which, when completed, may be repaired and amended, making compensation, but with no power to make such an alteration as that which is contended for by Mr. Maynard. Now, what has been done in the present case? Taking the plea as it stands, it appears there was a goit completed, and taking the terms of the replication, it was a goit which was completed within two years from the commencement of the rent, which, by the indenture, was to commence in 1801; and the goit which is said to have been made by the replication within two years, is said in express terms to be the same goit, sluice, and watercourse in the declaration and in the plea in that behalf mentioned, and expressly averred to be the same. Now, according to the terms of the plea, that goit was cut, made, and completed, therefore the power given seems to have been completely exercised and fulfilled, unless there are other terms in the deed which make up alteration in that. It seems to me, that the power is exhausted if once the goit is completed, with the exception only of the power to repair and amend, and therefore the plaintiff is entitled to our judgment, the facts appearing in the replication containing a sufficient answer to the case set up.

ERLE, J.—I think the power of making the goit in the plaintiff's land was to be exercised once for all, that the power to repair and amend from time to time was that which might be repeated as necessity might require, and amending would not at all extend to constructing a new goit of different dimensions. It appears to me that the provision that the power granted should be exercised for two years, without compensation, and, after that time, on making compensation from time to time, indicated the intention that might have been within the mind of the grantor; that the grantee, at the expense of making the works anew, should be allowed to make them without paying him compensation; but after once made and completed, if damage is done to his land by their coming in to repair and amend, that such damage should be from time to time compensated for.

CROMPTON, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

Upon this judgment the defendant below brought a writ of error, which now came on for argument.

Monday, June 11.—Collier (Maynard with him) for the plaintiff in error.—It is admitted, upon the pleadings, that the goit, as originally cut, was insufficient for the full enjoyment of the premises, and the only question whether, having been once made, it can be altered. The question would have been the same if the defendant had narrowed the goit instead of widening it. [PARKE, B.—It is a very different thing to give a power once to make and liberty to enter at different times and repair, from giving a power to make from time to time.] It could not have been intended that the lessees were to be bound during the 999 years by once having made a goit at the beginning of the term. [PLATT, B.—You must make a new bargain with the reversioner.] There is no limitation in the grant as to the size or width of the goit, and the grantees were, therefore, entitled to make a goit of a reasonably sufficient width, and that not having been done in the first instance, they were entitled to do so at any time during the term. The following cases were cited in addition to those cited in the Court below—Senhouse v. Christian, 1 T. R. 560; Luttrell's case, 2 Co. Rep.; Hall v. Swift, 4 Bing. N. C. 381.

J. A. Russell, for the defendant in error (the plaintiff below), was stopped by the Court.

JERVIS, C. J.—It seems to me that the judgment of the Court of Q.B. must be affirmed. The power granted was only to make a goit, and that having been once exercised is gone.

PARKE, B.—I am of the same opinion. It is a more onerous servitude to grant a liberty to enter and make a goit toties quoties than to make a goit, and then enter to amend and repair it, from time to time.

The rest of the Court concurring,

Judgment affirmed.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Reported by W. H. BENNET, Esq. of Lincoln's-inn, Barrister-at-Law.

June 22, 24, 26, and 29.

Present: The LORD CHANCELLOR (St. Leonard's;) Lords TRURO, BROUGHAM, CAMPBELL, CRANWORTH, and other Peers. The Judges present were—Barons PARKE, ALDERSON, PLATT, and MARTIN. Justices—MAULE, COLERIDGE, ERLE, CRESSWELL, WILLIAMS, TALFOURD, and CROMPTON.

DIMES v. THE COMPANY OF PROPRIETORS OF THE GRAND JUNCTION CANAL and OTHERS.

Jurisdiction—Interest of Judge in the subject matter of suit—Signature of Lord Chancellor to authorise enrolment.

In the above cause the Lord Chancellor was interested in the Grand Junction Canal Company as a shareholder, to the amount of several thousand pounds, which was unknown to the defendant below; the Lord Chancellor had granted an injunction, and on the hearing of the cause, had decreed for the relief prayed by the Grand Junction Canal Company as plaintiffs in the cause:

Held, that the order for the injunction and decree so pronounced by the Lord Chancellor was voidable, on the ground of the interest which he had in the subject matter of the suit;

And the order and decree on appeal reversed.

The Vice-Chancellor of England appointed under the 53 Geo. 3, c. 24, is not the mere deputy of the Lord Chancellor; and all orders and decrees pronounced by him, are obligatory, and are in no way affected by the disqualification of the Lord Chancellor, and therefore:

Held, that such orders of the Vice-Chancellor were neither void nor voidable.

The signature of the Lord Chancellor to authorise a decree or order to be enrolled is discretionary and ministerial only, and any disqualification in the Lord Chancellor as judge in the cause on the ground of interest, cannot prevail, and therefore;

Held, that such signature for such enrolment is neither void nor voidable.

This was an appeal from several decrees pronounced and orders made by the Master of the Rolls (Langdale), the late Vice-Chancellor of England, and Lord Chancellor Cottenham; commencing with an order made on the 18th June, 1838, and terminating with another of the 6th Feb. 1850; and the appellant complained that he was aggrieved by all the proceedings in the cause, and particularly by certain orders and decrees more particularly specified.

The questions propounded for the opinion of the judges were in general terms, it is therefore unnecessary further to state the dates and effects of the several orders and decrees.

In the year 1793, the Grand Junction Canal Company was created a corporation by the 33 Geo. 3, c. 80, and in 1796 their engineer and surveyor laid out and eventually cut through the corners of four fields containing in the whole two acres, three roods, and two perches. The angles and corners that were cut off by the canal amounted in the whole to one acre and fifteen perches. The company purchased this and other land of one Skidmore, the copyholder, for 308*l.* 10*s.* which sum they paid over to him, whereupon he executed a deed, dated March 13, 1797. The canal was completed and opened for public traffic early in the year 1797, and from that time until the commencement of the present appellant's proceedings the company and their assigns remained in uninterrupted possession of the lands in question. In May, 1835, Skidmore, the copyholder, died intestate as to lands vested in him as a trustee, leaving the respondent, Thomas Emmott, then a minor, his customary heir. Proclamations were then made in the manor court for the person entitled to admittance to come in and be admitted; and the appellant, as lord of the manor of Rickmansworth, issued a warrant to the bailiff to seize the land, and brought an action of ejectment against the company; but on the trial before the late Lord Chief Baron Abinger, at the summer assizes in 1836 for Herefordshire, the appellant was nonsuited, on the ground that the statutory assurance of the 13th of March, 1797, operated to vest the freehold and inheritance in fee of the three acres, three roods, seventeen perches in the company. Liberty was, however, given to the appellant to move the Court of King's Bench to set aside the nonsuit and enter a verdict in the ejectment for the appellant. He accordingly obtained a rule nisi for this purpose in November, 1836, and, on argument, this rule was made absolute on the 7th of June, 1838, on the ground that the company had acquired an equitable estate only in the land as copyhold. The appellant having obtained possession under a writ of possession, placed a bar across the canal, and threw a large quantity of bricks into the canal, to prevent the passage of the barges; and on the 14th of June, 1838, he threatened to stop the navigation unless the company at once paid him the sum of 5,000*l.* which demand on the 18th of the same month he advanced to 5,500*l.* Upon this last-mentioned day the company, however, filed their original bill in this suit against the appellant, and the respondent Skidmore, seeking admission to this part of their canal and towing-path as copyhold, and praying an injunction against the appellant's interference with the navigation. A series of litigation thereupon ensued, in the course of which the decrees and orders now complained of resulted. The appellant now appealed, praying that they might be reversed and discharged for these reasons—first, that by reason of the pecuniary interest in the subject matter of the suit which the said Earl of Cottenham possessed at the time of filing the original bill, and the continuance of such interest, and by reason that the fact of such interest was known to the company, but was not known to the appellant until after the order dated the 25th day of January, 1848, was pronounced, the original bill in this cause (being addressed to the said Earl as Lord High Chancellor, and omitting to state the fact of such interest) was improperly filed; and all the proceedings in this cause on the part of the said company were irregular; and, therefore, that the applications to have the said original bill taken off the file with costs to be paid by the said company, or that all proceedings in the said cause might be stayed, which were made by the appellant on the 30th day of May, 1849, and on the 6th day of February, 1850, ought to have been granted; secondly, that the decree, and all the orders made in this cause, and in particular the several orders dated the 15th of December, 1838, and the 27th of January, 1848, are void, by reason of the pecuniary interest which the said Earl of Cottenham had in the subject-matter of this suit at the time of filing the original bill and pronouncing the said orders, and by reason, also, that the fact of such interest was known to the said company, but was not known to the appellant; thirdly, that if the objections arising from the pecuniary interest of the said Earl of Cottenham, and the non-disclosure thereof to the appellant, as mentioned in the preceding reasons, did not exist, the case as exhibited by the pleadings and evidence does not shew proper or sufficient grounds for the exercise of the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery for the purpose of any of the relief sought by the said bill, and that the bill ought to be dismissed with costs; fourthly, that if, notwithstanding the foregoing reasons, the company should be held entitled to any relief, it should be granted only upon the terms of purchasing the appellant's estate and interest as lord under the provisions of the company's Acts, and without prejudice to or interfering with his legal rights in the mean time; fifthly, that the orders dated respectively the 18th day of June, the 26th day of July, and the 15th day of December, 1838, are not warranted by the proceedings and evidence, and ought not to have been made; sixthly, that the decree dated the 16th of November, 1846, was not warranted by the proceedings and evidence, and (without reference to the other objection taken) the bill ought to have been dismissed with costs, seventhly, that the said decree was erroneous in directing the amount of the fine payable upon the admission of a copyhold tenant to be ascertained and settled by the Master, and that the amount of such fine ought to be settled by a jury; eighthly, that the decree was erroneous in directing that the costs of the respondents, Boham and Martin, ordered to be paid by the company, should be repaid to them by the appellant; ninthly, that the several other orders made in this cause, and particularly the orders dated the 2nd of June and the 10th of December, 1849, were not warranted by the proceedings and evidence, and ought not to have been made; and, lastly, that the orders dated the 4th and 6th of February were not warranted by the proceedings and evidence in the cause, and ought not to have been made, and that orders ought to have been made in conformity with the respective notices of motion, or of some of them, upon which the said orders respectively were founded."

The Solicitor-General (Kelly), Smythies (of the Common Law Bar), and Selwyn appeared for the appellant.

The Solicitor-General, after stating at considerable length the facts of the case, and the various proceedings which had been had in the courts below, contended, first, that the whole proceedings in Chancery were incompetent and void ad initio, by reason that the Lord Chancellor to whom the original bill had been addressed, had a pecuniary interest in the company, and therefore submitted that the whole proceedings should be reversed; secondly, on the merits, that the decree of the Vice-Chancellor of England (which had declared that the company being a corporation, were not entitled to be admitted to the tenements, but that they were entitled to have the customary heir of the deceased tenant admitted, and that on his admittance he would be a trustee for the company) ought to be reversed. (a)

The LORD CHANCELLOR requested the Solicitor General to apply himself to the first point, upon which the House had sought the assistance of the judges.

The Solicitor-General, as to that point.—He said, the appellant disclaimed all idea that improper motives had swayed the mind of the late Lord Chancellor, but only that he erred in judgment in entertaining the cause at all—having the pecuniary interest he had in the matter in litigation before him. That in any suit or action a party had a right to call upon the judge to abstain from deciding a suit or action where he had an interest. That it was to be regretted that he had not done what, in this same case, when before the Court of Q.B. and Ex. Mr. Justice Wightman and Mr. Baron Alderson had done, viz. retired from the court during its discussion, they being shareholders in this same company. That the Lord Chancellor, as one of the shareholders, was, in fact, one of the plaintiffs; that it was not only the law of England, but it was recognised by the civil law, and all other enlightened tribunals that no man should be a judge in his own cause; that the same principle applied to all courts not only before the Lord Chancellor in the Court of Chancery, but also before every County Court judge and all other courts in the kingdom. That this was, in fact, the universal principle.

Smythies, on the same side, contended that the application for the Chancellor's signature to perfect the enrolment of the decree and order to enable the appellant to appeal was no admission by the appellant of the Lord Chancellor's jurisdiction, and that the Lord Chancellor, having such a class of interest as would have disqualified him from being a witness in a cause before Lord Denman's Act (6 & 7 Vict. c. 85) was incompetent to entertain the cause. It would have equally disqualified him from being a juror in a cause. They concluded a very elaborate argument, in the course of which the following authorities and cases were cited:—Mitford's Pleadings in Chancery, 7; 4 Vin. Ab. L.; Rolle's Abr. tit. "Judges," A. pl. 11; Disc. of the Author. of the Master of the Rolls, 178, et seq.; Leg. Jud. in Chy. stated, 113; Lord Derby's case, 12 Rep. 114; Great Charte v. Kennington, 2 Str. 1173; City of London v. Wood, 12 Mod. 687; Day v. Savadge, Hob. 87; 1 Kent' Comm. on American Law, 120; Brookes v. Earl Rivers, Hardres, 503; Chancellor of Oxford's case, 3 Bla. Comm. 299, n.; S. C. Year Book, 8 Hen. 6, 20; Anon. 1 Salk. 396; Reg. v. The Commissioners of Cheltenham, 1 Q. B. Rep. 467; Reg. v. The Justices of Hertfordshire, 6 Q. B. Rep. 753; Reg. v. The Justices of Suffolk, 19 Law T. Rep. 107; Esdaile v. Lund, 12 Mees. & W. 731; Reg. v. The Justices of St. Leonard's, 10 Q. B. Rep. 827; Mostyn v. Spencer, 6 Beav. 135; Code Nap. C. Civile, 21, art. 373; Code of the State of New York, Jan. 1850; Rex v. The Inhabitants of Yarpole, 4 Term R. 71.

Stuart, Q.C. Bethell, Q.C. and Busk, for the respondents, as to the first point, urged that the original bill was properly addressed to the Lord Chancellor; that it could not have been addressed in any other way. That on the face of the record no interest in the Lord Chancellor appeared. That if Lord Cottenham had ceased to hold the Great Seal before the hearing, the cause would have been heard by his successor, Lord Lyndhurst; and it could not be pretended that if the order and decree had been pronounced by him, they would have been either void or voidable. They did not controvert the general rule of natural justice and the law of the land, that no judge ought to hear or determine a cause to which he was a party, or directly interested; but that was not this case, where it was even unknown to any party at the time of filing the bill, or at the hearing, that the Lord Chancellor was a shareholder of the company. That, at all events, all the proceedings in the cause up to the time of its being brought by appeal before the Lord Chancellor were unimpeachable, and that all the orders and decrees pronounced by the Vice-Chancellor of England were good, and were not made by him as the deputy of the Chancellor, but as arising from the powers and authorities granted to him by the 53rd Geo. 3, c. 24. That what had been done by the Lord Chancellor was at most an irregularity, and as such might be, and was, waived by the acts of the appellant. They cited Ex parte Baddeley, 5 Rail. Cases, 512; Anon. (Mayor of London) v. Markwick, 11 Mod. Rep. 164; Rex v Justices of Essex, 5 Mau. & Sel. 513; Stone v. Byrne, 2 Bro. P. C. 409; and other cases.

The Solicitor-General, in reply.

QUESTIONS TO JUDGES.

A public company established for constructing a canal was incorporated, and they bought some land for the purpose of making the canal; a person claiming adversely an interest in such land, recovered the property by ejectment.

The corporation then filed a bill against the claimant, and so have their title confirmed. The Lord Chancellor had an interest as a shareholder in the company to the amount of several thousand pounds, which was unknown to the defendant, and he (the Lord Chancellor) granted the injunction and the relief sought.

Was this a case in which the order and decree of the Lord Chancellor were void, on account of his interest and of his having decided in his own cause?

A public company established for constructing a canal was incorporated, and they bought some land for the purpose of making a canal; a person claiming adversely an interest in such land, recovered the property by ejectment.

The corporation then filed a bill against the claimant, and to have their title confirmed.

The Vice-Chancellor, whose authority is derived under the 53 Geo. 3, c. 24, granted an injunction and the relief prayed; and the Lord Chancellor, who had an interest as a shareholder in the company to the amount of several thousand pounds, which was unknown to the defendant, upon an appeal by the defendant, affirmed the orders made by the Vice-Chancellor.

The orders were then enrolled; some upon the application of the defendant, and others upon the application of the plaintiff, by the order of the Lord Chancellor.

1. Were the orders of the Vice-Chancellor void on account of the interest of the Lord Chancellor?
2. Were the orders of the Lord Chancellor void on account of his interest, and of his having decided in his own cause?

The judges took some days to consider the questions, and on the 26th of June delivered the following opinion:—

PARKE, B.—In answer to the first question proposed by your lordships, I have to state the unanimous opinion of the judges, that in the case suggested the order and decree of the Lord Chancellor was not absolutely void on account of his interest, but voidable only. If this had been a proceeding in an inferior court, or one to which a prohibition might go from a court in Westminster Hall, such a prohibition would be granted pending the proceedings upon an allegation that the presiding judge of the Court was interested in the suit. Whether a prohibition could go to the Court of Chancery it is unnecessary to consider. If no prohibition should be applied for, and in cases where it could not be granted, the proper mode of taking the objection to the interest of the judge would be, in the Courts of Common Law, by bringing a writ of error for error in fact, and assigning that interest as cause of error. The former course was stated to be proper in the case of Brooks v. Earl of Rivers, Hardres, 503, it being suggested that the Earl of Derby, who was Chamberlain of Chester, had an interest in the suit; and the Court held that where the judge has an interest, neither he nor his deputy can determine a cause or sit in Court, and if he does a prohibition lies. The latter course was adopted in the case of The Company of Mercers and Ironmongers in Chester v. Bowker, Strange, 639, where it was assigned for error in fact on the record of a judgment for the companies in the Mayor's Court at Chester; that after verdict and before judgment one of the Company of Mercers and Ironmongers became mayor, and for that reason the judgment was reversed in the Court of Quarter Sessions, and that judgment of reversal affirmed in the King's Bench. In neither of those cases was the judgment held to be absolutely void. Till protection had been granted in one case or the judgment reversed in the other, we think that the proceedings were valid, and the persons actually under the authority of the Court would not be liable to be treated as trespassers. Many cases in which the Court of King's Bench has interfered (and they have gone to a great length), where interested parties have acted as magistrates, and quashed the orders made by the Court of which they formed part, afforded an analogy. None of those orders are absolutely void, it would create great confusion and inconvenience if they were. The objection might be one of which the parties acting under them might be totally ignorant till the moment of the trial of an action of trespass for the act done; but the orders may be quashed after being removed by certiorari, and the Court did complete justice in that respect. We think that the order of the Chancellor is not void; but we are of opinion, that as he had such an interest which would have disqualified a witness under the old law, he was disqualified as a judge; that it was a voidable order, and may be questioned and set aside by appeal, or some application to the Court of Chancery, if a prohibition would not lie. As to the second question, we are of opinion that the Vice-Chancellor (53 Geo. 3, c. 24) is not the mere deputy of the Chancellor, and that the interest of the principal affects the deputy on the principle adopted in Ward v. The Corporation of London, and Brooks v. The Earl of Rivers, but has independent jurisdiction, subject to the power of the Chancellor, to be reversed, discharged, altered, and allowed by the Chancellor. We think this is to be deduced from the language of the Act. By the 2nd section the Vice-C[illegible] has full power to hear and determine all [illegible]atters, causes, and things depending in the Court of Chancery, and all decrees, orders, and acts [illegible] Vice-Chancellor so made or done, shall be deemed to be orders and acts of the Court of Chancery, and shall have force and validity, and be executed; subject, nevertheless, in every case to be reversed, discharged, altered, or allowed, and no decree shall be enrolled, until signed by the Lord Chancellor. If the decrees or orders are not reversed by the Chancellor, they, in our opinion, are obligatory, and are in no way affected by the disqualification of the Lord Chancellor. But in order to appeal against them to the House of Lords, they must be enrolled; and enrolment cannot be made without the Lord Chancellor's signature. In giving that signature, the Chancellor has a discretion which he may exercise. But he may be applied to for that purpose, and if he gives his signature, his interest affords no objection to its validity. For this is a case of necessity, and where that occurs the objection of interest cannot prevail. Of this the case in the Year Book, 8 Hen. 6, 19, 2nd Roll's Abridgment, 93, is an instance where it was held, that it was no objection to the jurisdiction of the C. P. that an action was brought against all the judges of the C.P. in a case, no doubt, which could only be brought in that court. We therefore answer the first question by saying that the orders of the Vice-Chancellor are neither void nor voidable on account of the interest of the interest of the Lord Chancellor. That the orders of the Lord Chancellor are not void, but voidable, and his signature to the order for the purpose of the enrolment is neither void nor voidable.

On the 29th of June, the House of Lords was moved in the following terms:—

JUDGMENT.

The Lord Chancellor.—My lords, it is not necessary in this case to hear the respondent's case on the merits. The case does not present any real difficulties, as the facts are now understood. In reference to the question upon which her Majesty's judges gave their opinion at the desire of this House, the effect of that opinion—in which I for one concur—is, that as regards the interest which the late Lord Chancellor had in the Grand Junction Canal, his decisions must be considered voidable, and it appears clearly that an appeal to this House would be considered as in proceedings in a court of equity, the proper step to be taken to avoid such decrees. I apprehend, my lords, it would be proper, adopting the opinion of the learned judges in that respect, to declare that the orders and decrees appealed against, so far as they were made by the late Lord Chancellor, shall be reversed. Upon that we are all, my noble and learned friends and myself, entirely agreed. Upon the other question, upon which I never myself entertained any doubt, namely, whether the decrees and orders or the decrees of the Vice-Chancellor could be affected by the circumstance that the Lord Chancellor who affirmed those orders and decrees had an interest in the subject of the suit. The learned judges have given the House a very clear opinion, and in that opinion of course I entirely concur, as it is the opinion I always entertained. It is impossible to represent, upon the statutable authority given to the Vice-Chancellor, that he is in the situation of a mere deputy, to fall within the cases referred to, and therefore any order or decree made by him would be void, or voidable, in case the Lord Chancellor himself had an interest in the matter. There is no warrant for it in the words of the statute; and I cannot conceive anything more mischievous or absurd than to suppose that an order or decree made by one of the Vice-Chancellors, in the Court of Chancery, should be void in a case where the Lord Chancellor did not interfere at all judicially, merely because the Lord Chancellor himself had an interest in the subject of the suit. Lord Cottenham thought so differently upon that point, that he called in one of the judges of the Court, no doubt that judge depending upon original jurisdiction in some measure; but still an inferior judge,—he called him in to his assistance to advise him upon the very point now being decided by your lordships. I apprehend, my lord, that clearly these decrees are good so far as they can be maintained consistently with the rules of equity, and if your lordships should be of opinion that the case is not made out on the part of the appellant as to the equity he maintains, that is, to say, that no relief ought to have been granted to the company as against him, I apprehend your lordships will feel no difficulty in affirming the orders and decrees of the Vice-Chancellor, and of declaring that they shall be made good and unaffected by anything that took place as to the affirmance of them, or the dealing with them by the Lord Chancellor. After that point was disposed of, the case stood over to be argued this morning upon the merits, namely, upon the injury done, and the case assumes a very singular character. The case itself is a very simple one—the case of a copyhold tenant of a small piece of land—some two acres of land which were wanted for the purposes of the Grand Junction Canal. It turned out to be copyhold, and Mr. Dimes, the present appellant, at a subsequent period bought that manor, and thereby became the lord of that particular copyhold tenement. The company bought the land of Mr. Skidmore, the copyhold tenant, under powers in the Act, and they were perfectly at liberty to do so. It admits of no doubt, that the Act enabled them to make that purchase; nor is it disputed by the appellant at your lordships' bar, that it could be purchased. The different sections of the Act, the 30th and the 101st, shew clearly and entirely the description of the property, and that the copyhold interest was one which might be purchased under the Act. The property having been purchased, the then lord of the manor neither attempted to take advantage for a forfeiture—and it will be a very different question whether a subsequent lord could take advantage of that after the waiver—but he neither did that nor did he attempt to disturb the company at all in their possession of the land. They had a right to cut through the land and to form it into their canal by the terms of the Act of Parliament, and whatever rights the lord may have must depend upon the Act of Parliament; as regards that act so done, for it was done under the Act. But, unfortunately, the Act of Parliament being an early one upon the subject, did not, I admit, my lords, provide properly for the interest of the lord, as distinguished from the interest of the tenant, upon which all the difficulty has turned. We must, therefore, deal with the case as we find it upon the Act of Parliament. Now, my lords, in consequence of the purchase, a conveyance was executed by the tenant in the form prescribed by the Act of Parliament; that form, of course, was not adapted to a copyhold; for instead of being a surrender in the common ordinary and proper way, it was a conveyance in a few short words of "all estate, right, title, and interest of the person conveying." Now the great question has turned on the effect of that conveyance. But to proceed for a moment with the facts of the case. After that conveyance, no steps being taken by the then lord of the manor (Mr. Skidmore lived some years), Mr. Dimes became lord of the manor; and upon the death of Mr. Skidmore, after some attempts at negociation, which I need not trouble your lordships with (looking only to the legal acts of the parties), —after some time Mr. Dimes, the lord of the manor, called upon some person to come in at the death of Mr. Skidmore, to be admitted, stating expressly in the proclamation he issued, and which he had a right to make, stating in so many words that they were to come in and claim the estate "of which Joseph Skidmore, one of the customary tenants of the said manor, lately died seised." My lords, that is an assertion that this Joseph Skidmore had died seised of that estate, and that could only be on the construction that the legal estate in the copyholds had not passed by the conveyance in question, and that the copyhold inheritance still remained in Skidmore, and descended to his customary heir. In the result, for I have stated what I considered to be the operation of that conveyance, Mr. Dimes seised quousque, he seised quousque because of the want of a tenant, upon the death, as he alleged, of Skidmore; Skidmore having died seised, and no heir having come in to be admitted, he then proceeded to recover the estate at law. After a considerable discussion, the Courts differing, it was held that he was entitled to do—what?—to seise quosque. How could he seise quousque in the manor? He did seise upon his own allegation, as one ground of title that he did so seise, because Skidmore had died seised of the copyhold property, else his title would have been a totally different one. He should have put it on a different ground. In the result the then mesne profits were recovered. A bill was filed, and upon that bill the Vice-Chancellor of England made orders granting interim injunctions, and ultimately made decrees making the injunction perpetual, his opinion being that the copyhold estate did not pass at law by the conveyance in question, declaring that Skidmore was a trustee for the company, and that the heir of Skidmore was entitled to be admitted, decreeing Dimes to admit that heir, and that the heir should be deemed a trustee for the company. What mischief did that do to Mr. Dimes? He remains the lord of the manor, riding over this piece of ground through which the canal had been cut, just as he remained the lord of the manor before entitled to the fruit, entitled to all the quit rents, entitled to all the fines, and entitled to have a tenant always on the roll. In short, his rights were in no manner cut down as regarded that declaration. Those orders and decrees were affirmed by the Lord Chancellor. But unfortunately it turned out that the Lord Chancellor was the holder of some shares in the Grand Junction Company, and by the strict rule of law, his orders and decrees are to be deemed voidable, and now are declared to be void. Now, my lords, what was the real operation of this conveyance? It is quite clear that the Act of Parliament did not contemplate the exact case, and it is very difficult to say that the conveyance could pass a copyhold estate without a surrender and without an admittance, so that nobody would appear upon the face of the roll in the way in which it seems to have been contended that it did, but there is no objection which operated in the way in which the Vice-Chancellor decreed it to operate. The Act intended and did give to the copyhold tenant the power to sell his fee, and it gave the company power to buy it, and to appropriate it for their works. Then, so far, how did that stand? Suppose that conveyance to be incompetent to pass the copyhold estate as a copyhold estate—that is, to operate as a surrender, and perhaps as an admittance, which would be a very strong operation to give to it—then, by the clearest and plainest rule of equity, which has been never departed from, Skidmore having sold to the company, and having, by an imperfect conveyance, conveyed to them his copyhold estate, he becomes in equity trustee for them, and the Court would compel him to deal with his legal estate, if it did remain in him simply as trustee for that company; and upon that ground the Vice-Chancellor acted. Now, my lords, the case has assumed a very singular shape, for Mr. Dimes's only title to recover at law being founded upon the seisure quousque, in consequence of Skidmore having died seised of this copyhold—his own assertion—his old title—and having recovered upon that title, he now turns round, as sometimes it has been said, upon himself, and actually maintains that that conveyance, and a conveyance under that form, conveyed the whole copyhold interest to the company, and that they took that copyhold interest without an admittance. If they did, they became copyhold tenants. Then, what became of the title of the lord? He could not insist, having seised quousque upon coming in under a new title, and Mr. Dimes, upon that new title, if it be one—and certainly that is a new mode of looking at it—never could have insisted upon that title as against the company,—I mean, if the effect of the conveyance was to vest the copyhold estate, as a copyhold estate, absolutely in the corporation without admittance. They were not bound, I agree, to admit the corporation. Then in all time there would be no admittance: then, in that case, what becomes of the supposed legal title of the lord—where is his legal title? He has got his freehold, he is lord of the manor, but he has got a copyhold tenant according to the very arguments at the bar—who being a corporation will never die, and will remain for all time—a copyhold tenant without requiring any admittance. That, my lords, is indeed a new view of the case, and that is a view which I must advise your lordships cannot be taken by the appellant at your lordships' bar. You cannot allow a party to turn round and assert a title in direct opposition to the title upon which he has recovered the property upon which everything has been depending throughout this long and painful litigation. It is impossible that you can allow a party to turn round and to say, that the title upon which he recovered was naught—that he discards that title, and insists upon a totally different title, depending upon an entirely different construction of the Act of Parliament, and upon which the whole thing turns. Now, my lords, it is said independently of that—not denying on the part of the appellant that the company could buy, and that the tenant could sell—it is said that he must do something else; the company must (they say) buy the freehold, and add that to the copyhold interest. And then it is said, where is the direction in the Act of Parliament? The direction of the Act no doubt is, that a man shall hold it, and hold it for ever. Here he will hold it for ever, but qua copyhold; therefore the words of the Act of Parliament perfectly satisfy the interest of the lord. He has an inheritance totally distinct from the interest of the tenant, a distinct inheritance in itself. The heir has a right, and the heir may sell the right, and it would have been well if the Act had provided more carefully for these different interests, but it is utterly impossible to contend that the purchase of a copyhold, being of itself independently a perfect purchase, can be affected by the company subsequently not purchasing the freehold interest. I attended, with some curiosity, to hear what the time was in which this purchase must be made; and during the suspense what the interest was of the different parties; but the learned counsel,—not for want of ability or ingenuity, but the case rendered it impossible that he should do so,—never was able, and did not offer to your lordships any explanation. When was the time to end in which the purchase was to be made? Is the time closed now? May it not take place to-morrow? When is the time? The Act points out no time. The first purchase is perfectly good: during what period are you to wait? As regards the interest in the mean time, is the interest divested? Where is it? It cannot be in the lord. The learned counsel for the appellant is in this difficulty,—whilst he contends that the two interests must unite in order to bring the case within the Act of Parliament, he totally loses sight of this,—what is his interest? Where does he get any under this Act, beyond that which he had before as lord? Where can he find in the Act any clause giving him an interest greater than he had before? Then, as regards the lord, if he is entitled to damages or compensation for an act done on the copyhold property, that is a distinct question, and he must try his right upon that question. I do not advise him to do so; it is a distinct question, and if he asserts that right, it must be in a different way. The question then comes, I apprehend there is no foundation for the argument which has been maintained at your lordships' bar, that the corporation did take that copyhold; but if they did take it, I think that tells more against the appellant than against the respondent: but I apprehend they did not take the copyhold. I think, considering the ambiguity of the Act, from its not providing, as it ought to have done, for the interest of the lord, that the Court below has hit upon the true construction to be given to this conveyance, its perfect operation as an equitable conveyance, conveying all the equitable right, and leaving the legal tenement in the lord and in the tenant unaffected. It meets the justice of the case. It leaves the rights of the parties utterly unaffected. Then, my lords, the equity admits of no doubt, Skidmore being, as I have stated to your lordships, by the clear rule of equity, a mere trustee for the company; he held, during his life as trustee for the company, and they never were disturbed. Your lordships will observe, that it was not till the death of Skidmore that any body asserted a right on the part of the lord of the manor over this property. When his heir, who was under disability became entitled, that heir immediately became trustee for the company, and when the company filed a bill against the lord who had recovered the property upon a seisure quousque, which everybody knows, and which it is not denied does not operate beyond the time that the person entitled comes in to be admitted, Mr. Dimes, still insisting upon his legal right, the Court declared that he should be bound, as he ought to be, to admit Mr. Skidmore's representative as a trustee for the company, and thus to clothe in that respect the company, not with a legal title, for they would not be legal tenants, but with all the equitable rights which they really purchased, and for which they paid. This inflicts no hardship whatever, my lords, upon Mr. Dimes; he has all the interest he ever had—no more and no less. My lords, some difficulty has been raised in this case by the original contention of the company. They had, I dare say, supposed that the purchase of the tenant would be a purchase of the lord, and that the interest and (I suppose) the purchase money would be apportioned between them. I know not how that was, but the original contention of the company was indeed very different from that at which we have now arrived, for they insisted that the conveyance by the tenant was a conveyance of the whole freehold, and that it divested the lord of the manor of his freehold. The learned judges in the Q. B. in the Ex. Ch. the learned Vice-Chancellor, and the Lord Chancellor, in fact, every judge in every court before whom this case has come, have all decided that that was not the true operation, but that the operation was to leave the lord with all his rights unaffected, but to give to the company the interest which the copyhold tenure possessed. My lords, some question has been raised as to the costs. I can see no sufficient ground to advise your lordships to touch that question of costs. With regard to the decrees of the Vice-Chancellor, the only remaining question is, that it is referred to the Master to compute or settle the amount of fine to be paid on admission. It is said that that ought to go to a jury. I think as the Court was dealing with the case, it was quite within its competency to deal with that question; also as part of the general relief sought. But if, in any future stage of the case, it should appear that there really was a difficulty which ought to go to a jury, the Court would have no difficulty in that subsequent stage in sending it to a jury, if necessary, to ascertain the amount that the fine ought to be. I do not consider, therefore, that the parties are precluded, if the Court should authorise it; from still having recourse to a jury, if they want it, in order to ascertain the amount of fine to be paid upon the admission of a trustee. I therefore advise your lordships that the orders and decrees of the Lord Chancellor shall, without prejudice to the orders and decrees of the Vice-Chancellor, be reversed, and that the orders and decrees of the Vice-Chancellor shall remain unaffected by the orders and decrees of the Lord Chancellor, and shall be affirmed.

Lord BROUGHAM.—My lords, there are two branches of this case to which my noble and learned friend has just referred,—the one that which arose upon the first argument of the plaintiff, upon which your lordships took the opinion of the learned judges; and it is immaterial as to the result of this case, in which way we dispose of the first question put to the learned judges, namely, whether or not the Lord Chancellor, in respect of his interest, was, as it were, disqualified from acting as a judge in the cause, and, therefore, his decree is voidable or void. That it was not void we entertained a very strong opinion, both my noble and learned friend and I, during the course of the argument, as well as my noble and learned friend, Lord Cranworth, who is not now here. I do not think that the noble and learned Lord Chief-Justice was here during that argument, but we entertained a very strong opinion—a great inclination of opinion against its being void—and against the proceedings, in consequence of its being void, being, as it were, assumed to be null in the Court of Chancery. The learned judges, however, have come to a clear opinion upon that subject, that they are not void, that his judgment was not void, but only voidable; nevertheless that it is to be avoided when brought under review, and the objection is taken. But with respect to the second point submitted to them, whether or not the Vice-Chancellor's judgment is void in respect of the Lord Chancellor's authority being null; from the beginning of the whole proceedings in the Court of Chancery, including the Vice-Chancellor's decree, being therefore founded upon a nullity, and void upon that, I must say that I never, from the beginning, had the least doubt, and was, therefore, very little surprised to find the learned judges declare that the Vice-Chancellor has an entirely independent jurisdiction, and is not, in any respect, dependant upon the Lord Chancellor, from whom he only receives directions as to what cases he shall entertain, and what cases he shall therefore dispose of. That, by the Act, is the only connection which subsists between the two branches of the Court of Chancery, with the exception of the final enrolment, which requires the previous signature of the Lord Chancellor; but, as plainly as an enactment can speak, the Vice-Chancellor has an independent jurisdiction, and the very words of the statute (53 Geo. 3, establishing the Vice-Chancellors, and which passed in the year 1813, I think), are as plain as words can be, that there is a substantive and an independent jurisdiction conferred upon the Vice-Chancellor, and it is expressly stated in this enactment that his decrees shall be the decrees of the Court of Chancery, and shall have execution as such; and then follows the only connection established between his proceedings and those of the Lord Chancellor, that there shall be no enrolment of a decree with the view to further proceedings without the previous signature of the Lord Chancellor. Therefore, my lords, we have now in the first place to declare, agreeing in opinion with the learned judges, that the interest of the Lord Chancellor rendered his decree voidable, and to declare that that decree is reversed. Your lordships' have, then, to deal with the decree of the Vice-Chancellor which remains, and which is now subject to the discussion which has been the subject-matter of the arguments which we have heard to day at your lordships' bar. I concur in the opinion of my noble and learned friend, and in the opinion of the Court below—that is, of the Vice-Chancellor. I am quite aware that there is a difficulty in it. I am quite aware that there is a defect in the Act, and that that defect must have given rise, and no doubt did give rise, to some contention, and was a subject of some difficulty and doubt even in the court below. But I do not find any sufficient reason for differing from the Court below in the manner in which the Vice-Chancellor has extricated the question from that difficulty, and has disposed of the cause. I do not find sufficient reason, as to that difficulty, to differ from the Court below, and it is not merely the Vice-Chancellor, but there is also the other learned judge of that court—there is the Master of the Rolls, who assisted the Lord Chancellor upon the argument, upon an appeal from the Vice-Chancellor - he agreed entirely with the Vice-Chancellor, and was against any declaration or alteration of that judgment.

Lord CAMPBELL.—My lords, I take exactly the same view of this case as my noble and learned friends, and I have very little to add to their observations. With respect to the point upon which the learned judges were consulted, I must say that I entirely concur in the advice which they have given to your lordships. No human being can suppose for an instant that my Lord Cottenham could be in the remotest degree influenced by the infinitesimally small interest that he had in this concern, nor if his interest had been ever so great; but, my lords, it is of the last importance that that maxim should be held sacred, that no man is to be a judge in his own cause; and that is not to be confined to a cause in which he is a party, but a cause in which he has an interest. Since I have had the honour to be Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench, we have again and again set aside proceedings in inferior tribunals, because an individual who had an interest in a cause took a part in the decision. And it will have a most salutary influence when it is known that this high Court of last resort, in a case in which the Lord Chancellor of England had an interest, considered that his decree was not according to law, and must be set aside. This will be a lesson to all those in the inferior tribunals to take care that in their decrees they may not be influenced by their personal interest, and to avoid the appearance of doing what is wrong. It is quite clear, likewise, I believe, that the orders of the Vice-Chancellor cannot be in the slightest degree affected by what the Lord Chancellor has done, nor can it be supposed that the Vice-Chancellor was acting as the Lord Chancellor when these orders and decrees were pronounced. Then, my lords, when we come to the merits of the decree itself, I have not been able to form any doubts respecting its propriety. This decree deals only with the copyhold tenement, and it lies upon the present appellant, Mr. Dimes, to shew that he is prejudiced by it. Now, in no point of view can it be shewn that he is prejudiced by it. If (as it has been argued) the whole of the interest in the copyhold tenement passed absolutely to the company, this decree would not in the slightest degree prejudice the lord, because it would give him a fine, and it would give him advantages which he would not otherwise be entitled to. But that, I apprehend, is clearly not a just view of it. And when your lordships look at the Act, and what was done under it, you cannot consider that the legal interest in the copyhold tenement did pass from the copyhold tenant to the company, because it never could be the intention of the Act of Parliament that a grantor should have the power to part with a greater interest than he possessed himself, and the copyhold tenant would do nothing which, in the slightest degree could prejudice the rights of the lord. Therefore, the view which was taken by Mr. Dimes, when he became lord of the manor, was a just view, that he had a right to the tenement, and he seises quousque, and he brings his ejectment, and he recovers the mesne profits. Well, but then, if that be so, can he in the subsequent stages of the proceedings, when he drives the company to proceed against him for an injunction, and to have an admittance of the heir of the copyhold tenant, can he be allowed to say that the whole interest passed from Joseph Skidmore, the tenant, and you are now forcing upon me, a mere stranger (for Skidmore is a mere stranger, he has nothing in him), and you are compelling me to put a mere stranger upon my copyhold roll? This cannot, my lords, be allowed; for, by the manner in which Mr. Dimes proceeded he made a proclamation for the heir of Joseph Skidmore,—in fact, he called by his proclamation upon Emmott Skidmore to come in and be admitted. After that, how can he be allowed to say that Emmott Skidmore is a mere stranger? Emmott Skidmore is the heir of Joseph Skidmore, in whom, I think the legal estate, so far as the lord is concerned, was considered as having remained; and therefore Joseph Skidmore must be considered as having died seised, and that Emmott is his heir, and he ought to be admitted. This litigation has, at last, I hope, reached its termination. I know not what further step can be taken. I think there is no other step; and now that the company will be allowed upon the terms mentioned in the decree quietly to remain in possession of that which they ought to enjoy.

Lord BROUGHAM.—It would be one of the most absurd things, if afterwards he was to object to the assessment of the fine by the Master in the Court of Chancery, and he was then to proceed at law, it would be one of the most ill-advised steps that a man could possibly take.

That the orders and decrees of the Lord Chancellor be reversed without prejudice to the orders and decrees of the Vice-Chancellor.

That the orders and decrees of the Vice-Chancellor, appealed against, be affirmed, and declared to be unaffected by the orders and decrees of the Lord Chancellor, and that the appeal be dismissed.

July 17, 19, and 20.

MONYPENNY v. DERING.

Will — Construction — Cy-près — Remoteness — Void devise — Life estate — Estate tail — Issue — Shifting clause — Recovery by tenant for life.

The words, "in default of issue of the body, or in case of his not leaving any at his decease," considered

J. M. devised "the Maytham Hall Estate" to trustees upon trust (inter alia) for P. M. for life, then in trust for the first son of the body of P. M. for life, "and from and immediately after his decease upon trust for the first son of the body of such first son, and the heirs male of his body, and in default of such issue upon trust for all and every other the son and sons of the body of P. M. severally and successively, according to their seniority of age, for the like interests and limitations as before directed respecting the first son and his issue, and in default of issue of the body of P. M. or in case of his not leaving any at his decease, upon trust for T. M. for life; and after his decease upon trust for T. G. M. the eldest son of T. M. for life, and after his decease upon trust for the first son of the body of T. G. M. and the heirs male of his body, and in default of issue of the body of T. G. M. upon trust for all and every other the son and sons of the body of T. M. for like estates," &c.; "and in failure of all such issue of the body of T. M. upon trust for him, his heirs and assigns, for ever," provided that if P. M. or T. M. "or either of them, their, or either of their issue, shall become entitled to," &c. (the Joddrell estate), then the trustees "shall stand seised of my devised estates upon trust for the next person entitled thereto, under this my will, in the same manner as they would have done if the person so succeeding to 'the Joddrell estate' were actually dead." T. M. died after the date of the will, and the testator, by a codicil, declared that his trustees should stand seised of the devised estates upon trust for his wife for her life, and after her decease upon the trusts declared by his will subject to the declaration therein contained with reference to the Joddrell estate:

Held, that P. M. took an estate for life, subject to the life estate of the testator's widow:

That the limitation "to the first son of the body of such first son" of P. M. "and the heirs male of his body" was void for remoteness:

That T. G. M. "in default of issue of the body of P. M." took an estate for life, determinable on his becoming entitled to the Joddrell estate, and also a remainder in tail general after the estate tail of his eldest son:

That the eldest son of T. G. M. took a contingent remainder in tail male after the life estate of his father:

And that P. M. acquired no estate or interest under a recovery which, after the testator's death, he suffered of the devised property to the use of himself in fee.

J. devised "the Joddrell estate," to P. M. (subject to certain life estates) for life, with remainder to his sons and daughters in tail, with remainder to T. M. with like remainders to his sons and daughters in tail, with divers remainders over, provided "that if P. M. and T. M. or either of them, their, or either of their issue male or female, or any other son or sons of T. M." (who were provided for by the will), "hereafter to be born, or his, their, or any of issue male or female shall, at any time or times, be or become entitled to any estate of freehold, or inheritance in possession of or in the messuage," &c. (the Maytham Hall estate), "or the greatest part of the same, messuages," &c. "so as to be in the possession or in the actual receipt of the rents and profits thereof," then and in that case the estates devised by the will should shift, &c. On the death of P. M. without issue these estates became vested in T. G. M. (the eldest son of T. M.); at the date of J's will, R. M. was entitled to "the Maytham Hall estate," he devised it to J. M. who disentailed it, and under the limitations in his will (vide supra), it became vested in T. G. M.:

Held, that on his succeeding to the estate the shifting clause took effect.

A gift to A. for life, then to his issue, and, in default of issue generally of A. over, raises an estate tail general, having the operation, first, of raising an estate tail, and, secondly, of creating a remainder over on that estate tail, the intention of the testator being that the estate should not go over until there was a general failure of A.'s issue.

Where an estate is given to an unborn person for life, with remainder to the children of that unborn person in tail, the Court, to effectuate the intention of a testator, will create an estate tail, contrary to the words, in the first donee.

The Court cannot, by implication, or by the doctrine of cypres, give an estate to a class, or a portion of a class, for whom a testator has not intend to provide; but where he has shewn such an intention, although they could not be provided for in the manner pointed out by the testator, the Court may provide for them differently.

The Court will not hold a gift over in words comprising only one event, although it may reasonably consist of two branches, unless the testator has done so.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Vice-Chancellor Wigram. The material questions arising under the will of Mr. James Monypenny are incidentally alluded to by the Lord Chancellor in his judgment, and the facts are fully reported in 7 Hare, 568.

The will of Mrs. Toddrell is set out in the report of this case (18 Law T. Rep. 15), on the question arising as to the operation of the shifting clause.

Wigram, Rolt, and C. Hall, appeared for the plaintiff.

Bethell, Malins, Willcock, Rogers, Faber, F. T. White, Browell, Borton, and Bagshaw, jun. for the several parties interested.

The following were some of the cases cited during the argument:—Pitt v. Jackson, 2 Bro. C. Monday, July 19.—The LORD CHANCELLOR.—As I entertain no doubt upon the principal question in this case, I will at once dispose of that: with regard to the question arising upon the shifting clauses obtained in these wills, I will postpone disposing of that until to-morrow. Both questions are of great importance. Mr. James Monypenny seems to have had a great desire to provide only for the first son of the person to whom he gave one of the properties. It is given to the use of his nephew for life, and then for the first son of the body of that nephew and the heirs male of the body of such first son; there he leaves off, and except that the reversion would fall into the general devise of a portion of the residue, an event that I cannot give him credit for being aware of, there would be no further disposition of that estate; it would not go to any person except the first son and the heirs male of his body; no other person is in any manner provided for; but that is different from the question which arises under the general gift. The testator gives the legal fee to trustees who are to raise the debts, and then limits the estates in trust for his brother Phillips for life without impeachment of waste, then in trust for the first son of the body of Phillips for his life, and "immediately after his decease to the first son of the body of such first son and the heirs male of his body; and in default of such issue in trust for all and every the son and sons of the body of my said brother Phillips Monypenny, severally and successively according to seniority of age for the like interests and limitations as I have before directed respecting the first son and his issue, and in default of issue of the body of my said brother Phillips Monypenny, or in case of his not having any at his decease, upon trust for my said brother Thomas Monypenny for and during the term of his natural life without impeachment of waste, and from and immediately after his decease upon trust," and so on. Now stopping there, and without including the gift over, if the issue had been born in the lifetime of the testator, those would have been valid devises; but Phillips Monypenny never had any issue, and the rule of law forbids you to raise successive estates by purchase to unborn children; that is, to an unborn child of an unborn child. There is, therefore, taking the limitations as they stand, a good life estate to Phillips and to his first unborn son, if he had one, and the remainder to the other sons and their issue, would be absolutely void as being upon too remote a contingency. Now did the testator intend to provide for the other sons of the first son, beyond a first son? The gift is "upon trust for the first son of the body of such first son, and the heirs male of his body, and in default of such issue," not in trust for the second son, and every other the son and sons of the body of such first son, but on trust "for all and every other the son and sons of the body of Phillips, severally and successively." So that, had he intended to provide for other sons of a person for whose first son he had provided, he knew perfectly well how to do so, for he has done it in clear and express words. As it stands, the whole would be void after the first life estate to the first unborn son; and can I, by construction or otherwise, raise estates to the other sons of that first son? It was argued that I might, on these grounds, first, by the doctrine of cypres; secondly, by a particular construction of the will itself; and thirdly, upon the rule which gives to a general intent a preference over a particular intent. Now, the doctrine of cypres, as I understand it, is nothing more than the giving effect to a general at the expense of a particular intent. It is this: where there is a valid particular intent and a valid general intent, and the former, in the opinion of the Court, not effectuating all the intention of the testator, the Court looks to his general intent, and will effect that general intent, at the sacrifice of the particular intent. But here you sacrifice nothing. In the case of a limitation, where there is a good gift under a power to the objects of a limited estate, and an ulterior gift to children who are not objects; the Court, if it can, will effectuate the further intention of the testator by giving to the parent himself an estate of inheritance, through whom it will descend to his children. There you effectuate the general intent, but at no expense of the particular, because there was no particular intent to which you could give validity. And in the present case there is a limitation to an unborn son for life, with remainder to his unborn children for life; now you cannot give effect to that intent, because you cannot give successive estates to an unborn person and to the issue of that unborn person; but were that limitation to be effected, it would be as a general intent, and not at the sacrifice of any particular intent. Now, the words of the will are,—"And in default of issue of the body of Phillips, or in case of his not leaving any at his decease," then a gift over. That gift over would by construction in an ordinary case give an estate tail to Phillips himself. Some of Phillips's issue being provided for, and Phillips himself having a life estate, and then the estate being given over in default generally of issue of Phillips, the true construction would, I think, be that the testator intended to provide that that estate should not go over until there was a general default of the issue of Phillips, and if so, then there would be an estate tail general raised by those words, which would have a double operation; first of all, to raise an estate tail, and secondly, to create a remainder over on that estate tail. That construction would, according to the Attorney General v. Sutton, leave the express limitations of the will to operate as they were directed; in that way, although in remainder, all the issue of Phillips could be provided for. The will then goes on, "in trust for his brother Thomas for life, and immediately after his decease in trust for Thomas Gybbon, the eldest son of Thomas for life, and immediately after his death upon trust again for the first son of the body of the said Thomas Gybbon and the heirs male of his body" (there he creates an estate tail), "and in default of issue of the body of the said Thomas Gybbon upon trust for all and every other the son and sons of Thomas for the like estates," and so on, "and on failure of all such issue of the body of Thomas upon trust for him in fee." It is quite clear then that the limitation over in default of the issue of Thomas Gybbon would give Thomas an estate tail in remainder expectant on the estate tail to Thomas Gybbon, and in that way all the intention of the testator would be effected as regarded the issue of Thomas. Looking at the whole frame of this will there is ground to suppose that the testator did fancy that he had provided for all the issue. But can that intention be effected by the rule of law. Now some doubt was thrown out during the argument on the case of Pitt v. Jackson. I have always held it to be law. I followed it in Stackpool v Stackpool, and so did Lord Alvanley in Routledge v. Dorril. The clear doctrine is that where an estate is given to an unborn person for life, with remainder to the children of that unborn person in tail, you may, to effectuate the intention, create an estate tail, contrary to the words in the first part. If the cypres doctrine be not applicable to this case, it must be inapplicable upon the ground that the testator's intention was illegal; and it must be said that although it may be applied to the destruction of the intention of a testator, or rather not to carry it into effect, you cannot effectuate the intention in this particular case, because it is illegal, and therefore it can never be effectuated; but that it may be carried into effect, as far as it can, if the class of persons to whom the testator's intention would apply could be found; I apprehend the rule is this, that you cannot by any implication or by any doctrine of cypres carry an estate to a class or a portion of a class for whom the testator never intended to provide; you cannot provide for persons whom the testator did not intend; you may provide for them differently, as in the case of Pitt v. Jackson. I do not apprehend that the Court of Ex. thought that Nicholl v. Nicholl meant to, or that it did introduce by cypres any person or class of persons for whom the testator did not intend to provide. Applying that doctrine to this case, I feel that I am not at liberty to disregard the clear words of this testator; words which I am perfectly satisfied he meant to use according to their import; he meant both to give it to his brother for life, and to the first son of his brother for life, and to the first son of that first son and the heirs male of his body; and he meant nothing to interfere with that disposition. I cannot, therefore, by the doctrine of cypres, include any limitations which would provide for the second and other sons of the first grandson, contrary to the words of the will in the express limitation. I am therefore of opinion that the doctrine of cypres does not enable me to give effect to the supposed intention of the testator beyond the clear limited expression in his will. I may dispose, also, of the third ground; because I consider them as both depending upon the same doctrine, although having very different circumstances in some respects. Can I give effect to this under the doctrine of providing for the general at the sacrifice of the particular intention? There is no case that was ever decided that would enable me to cut down this clear estate in tail male to the first son. Suppose the son had been born in the testator's lifetime, what right have I, as a judge, to say that the testator may not give that estate to his brother for life, then to his brother's first son for life, and to the first son of that son, and the heirs male of his body? I have no right so to say. they are perfectly valid and strict words of limitation; there is no ambiguity; and no construction is wanted. I cannot, therefore, on that general intention effect them. Then can I in any other way effectuate what is supposed to be the general intent? The testator immediately proceeds to give the estate "for all and every other the son and sons of the body of my said brother Phillips Monypenny, severally and successively, according to seniority of age, for the like interests and limitations, as I have before directed, respecting the first son and his issue." How can I cut out the second and other sons of Phillips, to whom he has expressly given it, on failure of the heirs male of the body of the first grandson? The words are just as express, and just as plain; and they shew that where he meant the estate to go to the second and other sons, he knew how to provide for it. I had occasion to review the cases in Montgomery v. Montgomery, and I took great care to see what the real rule was. There I found myself bound to give effect to the particular intent, which did not embrace every thing, but which gave a proper legal operation to the will according to the expressed intention of the testator; and by that rule I am ready to abide, or not say I will not apply the general intent, or even sacrifice a particular intent if I find it necessary, but I will not without an actual necessity. It was argued, that if an estate, which might be construed into an estate tail, were in any part of a will given to a parent, the Court would vest that estate in him, notwithstanding the limitations to the issue attempted to create estates, which would be void for perpetuity; it was said that you might reject those limitations, except for the purpose of collecting the intention of the testator. I know no such rule. I do not mean to say that, if I could see a general clear intention to provide for the issue generally in a way which could be effectuated, though there might be a superadded intention to provide for that issue illegally, by confining it to successive life estates, I might not reject that which was illegal, to give effect to that which was legal. Cases may exist in which you may properly reject the illegal limitation, and give effect to the legal intention, by giving an estate tail to the parent; but here I can do no such thing. I cannot give it to the father, because that would not effect the intention. If I give it him in remainder, it is exposed to the same objection; it is a remainder then (by implication) expectant upon the remote estates, and it is void with those which precede it. If I were to attempt to carry it back by any construction, and to make him tenant in tail in possession, I should destroy the whole intention of the testator. Then comes the other ground, namely, that of construction simply. It was said, that if I could give the first son, the grandson of the body of the first son of Phillips, an estate tail, that then the other estates would naturally follow under the actual gifts of the will. That construction would certainly do less violence than any other, if I could adopt it I would; but I cannot do so consistently with this will, for, in the first place, I must not only introduce lines of issue for whom the testator has not provided, but I must exclude those for whom he expressly has. I must not only introduce second and other sons of the first son, but I must exclude until those so introduced are dead without issue the second and other sons of Phillips. I am bound to give this with a legal construction to the extent to which it may be legally executed. I cannot give any other than the general legal construction to these limitations. The consequence is, that as they stand, Phillips took a good estate for life, at his death his first unborn son, had he been born, would have taken a good estate for life, and all the remainders over are void and inoperative, and cannot be considered as standing in the way of any body who is entitled otherwise in the property. That brings me to that important clause, namely, the gift over; and a very important question it raises. After having provided for these unborn children and their issue, he says, "and in default of issue of the body of my said brother, Phillips Monypenny, or in case of his not leaving any at his decease, upon trust for my said brother Thomas Monypenny, for and during the term of his natural life," and so on. Now, if this was a regular remainder, depending upon all the previous limitations, it would be just as objectionable as the rest. The law in this case stands in a peculiar position; Longhead v. Phelps, shews, that in a case where there are two clauses you may embrace the first clause upon which you have to decide—which I must take to have been a limited clause,—a gift over in the event of the party dying without leaving issue male, and disregard the second which would be too remote and void; and if there be a good gift over in the particular event, that may be taken advantage of. That, I apprehend, does not arise on a gift over following a disposition illegal on account of perpetuity. In Beard v. Westcott, like Somerville v. Lethbridge, there were successive life estates for terms of years to unborn issue, which were clearly void beyond the first takers: and then there was a disposition to a grandson, and "in case he should leave no issue male at the time of his death, or in case there should be any, and they should all die before twenty-one without issue male," then the estate was given over. That case was sent to the Court of C. P. and the judges were of opinion that the gifts were all void after the gift to the unborn son, but that if the event arose within the legal limits of perpetuity, the gift over would take effect. To that I never could subscribe. Lord Eldon subsequently sent it to the Court of King's Bench, which held that the gift over was void, not because it was not within the time of perpetuity, but expressly on the ground on which I had so considered it—that the limitation over was never intended by the testator to take effect unless the persons whom he intended to take under the previous limitations would, if they had been alive, been capable of enjoying the estate, and that he did not intend that the estate should wait for persons to take in a given event where the person to take was actually in existence, but could not take at all. Lord Eldon affirmed that decision, and the estate was enjoyed accordingly. So that you cannot, upon gifts over, which are void for perpetuity, take an independent clause and say upon any gift which is within the line of perpetuity you will give something over, but you must see whether that will dovetail in and accord with the previous valid limitations, and that will apply to this case. If I can read this as a gift in the alternative, "in case there is no issue living" at the death of the brother, then I do not interfere with any intention of the testator, because nobody is excluded, and I may, therefore, give effect to that alternative if I find it consistently with Beard v. Westcott, and every other authority; but I do not give the estate over to a person under the limitation at the expense of any person who is intended to take under that limitation. Now, in the case of Proctor v. The Bishop of Bath and Wells, there was a disposition to the first son who should come into being and take holy orders; and there was no son. Every body knows he could not take holy orders until the age of twenty-four, and, therefore, taking it as it stands, it was too remote. It was argued that that limitation over embraced two events, namely, that of a son being born, and that, if born, his taking holy orders. There was no son, and the Court there expressly held that they could not divide the limitation. The Courts, have, therefore, gone to this extent,—they will not hold a gift over in words comprising only one event, although, in point of fact, it may consist very reasonably of two branches, unless the testator has done so. Now, what is contended here is, that I am to consider these words, which, at all events, point to different events, as pointing only to one event. There is no doubt about this, that in the sense in which the Court uses the words, "and in default of issue of the body of a man," that that means a failure of issue at any time, it does embrace beyond all question a failure of issue, at the death of a testator, for example, or at any time; but when I find the testator using that which would embrace all other events, and also using words which embrace an event within those general words, I am bound to consider he did not use the general words in the sense in which the Court would use them, because he tells me he did not use them in that sense. If you are to say that he used them in the sense in which the Court uses the words, then the other clause would be insensible, it would be surplusage,—it would be inoperative. I have not added to the words; I have refused to do so. I refuse on the same ground as I refused to strike out his words. I feel myself bound to give effect to every word in the will, as far as the law will enable me to do so. If I consider the words "in default of issue of the body" to have a more limited sense than the words "in case of his not leaving any," then those words may be operative. Lord Hardwicke lays it down, that it is utterly immaterial what words come first or what words come last in a will: there is no magic in words. I am clearly of opinion, therefore, that if there be ambiguity here, I am at perfect liberty to clear it up, and to read this clause, as "and in case." If a person, looking at an event which may soon be ascertained, says, "if upon my death," or "in case of my not leaving issue at my decease," or "if at my death I shall leave no issue behind me," or "if I do, and at any period, however remote, that issue shall fail," I give the estate in such and such a way, there is nothing insensible in that; it may be expressing unnecessarily that which would be included in the latter branch; but it shews that the testator has, as he might have done in that case, of Proctor v. The Bishop of Bath and Wells, done under one form of expression what he might have done under two. If, in that case it had been said, "and if having no son born," or "having a son born he shall be in holy orders," then so and so,—one is as good as the other. Here the Court of Ex. read it as if it were one clause; I can hardly suppose that any two clauses providing for one event which must happen, but at different periods, may not be read in the same way. Leake v. Robinson might so be read, and so might be said of almost every case. Nothing is so dangerous with regard to a man's will as to strike out words which admit of a reasonable interpretation. I am clearly of opinion that effect must be given to this clause as an independent clause, and that the gifts over are perfectly valid. As far as the decision of the Court below depends on this point, I affirm it; and I cannot say that I entertain any doubt upon it. As regards the other question, I must look into the materials before me, and I will dispose of it to-morrow morning.

Tuesday, July 20.—The LORD CHANCELLOR.—Mrs. Joddrell, by her will, gave the Joddrell estate to Mary Jefferson for life, then to her sons and daughters in tail, then to Silvestra Monypenny for life, and her sons and daughters in tail; then to Phillips Monypenny for life, and his sons and daughters in like manner; and then to Thomas for life, and his sons and daughters in like manner, and so on. And then there was the shifting clause, "that if Phillips Monypenny, and Thomas Monypenny, or either of them, their or either of their issue, male or female, or any other son or sons of said James Monypenny (who were provided for by her will), hereafter to be born, or his, their, or either of their issue, male, or female, shall at any time or times be or become entitled to any estate of freehold or inheritance in possession of or in the messuages, lands, tenements, and hereditaments, in the said county of Kent" (the Maytham Hall estate), "now of, or belonging to my cousin Robert Monypenny, of Rolvenden, aforesaid, esq. elder brother of the aforesaid James Monypenny, or the greatest part of the same, messuages, lands, tenements, and hereditaments, so as to be in the possession, or in the actual receipt of the rents and profits thereof," then the use was to shift over; it was to shift in case either of those parties became entitled to the Maytham Hall estate. Now, I do not think, looking at the limitations of that estate at the time the will was made, and the subsequent acts, namely, the two recoveries and the particular charge, that that estate ever did become vested in the devisees of Mrs. Joddrell, within her shifting clause. That is not very material, because we are not dealing with the Joddrell estate, but with the Maytham Hall estate. If Phillips lost his estate in the Joddrell estate, he could not have done so till 1836, because in 1826, when he came into possession of the Maytham Hall estate, he had only an estate in remainder, which never could have come within the shifting clause of the Maytham Hall estate, as it never could have been intended that the mere accession to a life estate in remainder should take away an estate in possession. But if Phillips ever did take a life estate in the Joddrell estate, he conveyed it to Thos. Gybbon Monypenny. Now, the Maytham Hall estate was settled (after the death of the widow) to Phillips, for life, then to his first unborn son, which was valid, then to that unborn son's son, which was void for perpetuity, and then the estate was limited over, which has been held to be good. Now, when Phillips became tenant for life in possession, which he did not till 1826, when the former tenant for life died, then, no doubt, the clause relating to the Joddrell estate, supposing it to have been within it, would have operated. Now, as regards the Maytham Hall estate, suppose the event which has happened not to have happened, Thomas would take a contingent life estate; for the shifting clause is, "if the brothers, or either of them, should become entitled to the Joddrell estate, then the next person entitled under the will shall take as if the party succeeding were dead." If Phillips took the Joddrell estate, which, in point of fact, he would do when Silvestra died, then the Maytham Hall estate would go over. To whom was it to go? It was to go over as if the party taking that estate were dead; but that would not carry it to Thomas, because, at the death of Phillips, if he had a son he would have taken it, and Thomas Gybbon never could take unless Phillips had died without issue living at his death, under the clause which has never been sustained by the Court. The consequence, therefore, is, that Thomas Gybbon had not, upon the estate going over, an estate for life. I apprehend that the estates created in the Maytham Hall estate would all go over to the trustees, but for whom I need not inquire. Well, in 1837 Thomas Gybbon and Phillips execute mutual cross conveyances; and I am clearly opinion that they are binding, and effectually convey whatever estates they had in the property. Thomas Gybbon suffered a recovery in respect of the Joddrell estates: he claimed to be seised in fee of them. Silvestra Monypenny joined in making tenant to the præcipe, and Phillips himself joined in the deed, and conveyed a life estate. Phillips suffered a recovery of the Maytham Hall estate, which had no operation; he claimed the fee, and the deed of conveyance by Thomas Gybbon to him, after reciting that, conveys to Phillips in fee. Whatever estate Thomas Gybbon had, passed by that conveyance; of that I have no doubt. Now, he had not any estate in consequence of the shifting clause, but he had a contingent estate for life in the event which happened, and which he was capable (being an equitable estate) of transferring; and that estate, in my opinion, he has transferred to Phillips in fee, and to that estate the parties who claim under the will of Phillips would be entitled. When Phillips died without issue, Thomas Gybbon became entitled, as the Court has already held, to a life estate in the Maytham Hall estate, and he became entitled also to a life estate in the Joddrel estate; and then the question arises, will the shifting clause in the Maytham Hall estate operate or not? I am of opinion that the conveyance by Thomas Gybbon, which passed the life estate in contingency to Phillips, could not prevent its operation. I am also of opinion that the dealings by Thomas Gybbon with the Joddrell estate did not prevent the shifting clause in Jas. Monypenny's will from operating on those estates, because, in point of fact Thomas Gybbon took an estate tail under the original donation; that estate tail he enlarged into a fee by a common recovery. Now, the shifting clause is "But I do hereby declare that if it shall happen at any time hereafter that my said brothers, or either of them, their or either of their issue, shall become entitled to the real or copyhold estate, or any part thereof, late of Elizabeth Joddrell, widow, daughter of the late Phillips Gybbon," situate in the parishes of so and so, "then and in that case and immediately upon such an event taking place, my said trustees and the survivor of them and his heirs shall stand seised of my said estates hereinbefore devised for the benefit of my said brothers and their issue, upon trust for the next person entitled thereto under and by virtue of this my will, in the same manner as they would have done if the person so succeeding to the said estates late of the said Elizabeth Joddrell were actually dead." Now, no doubt this is ambiguous, and it might only mean that there shall be only one shifting; he talks of "then and in that case," "immediately on such event taking place," and "then and in that case," and certainly it has a bearing towards the clause operating only once; but on the other hand, the express declaration is, "that if the said brothers, or either of them, shall become entitled to the said estates,"—I must suppose him to have known what the limitations were of the Joddrell estates: he knew that they were settled on these persons in succession, and therefore, he says, "If either of my said brothers or their issue shall become entitled;" he provides expressly for both events, namely, both brothers becoming entitled or either of them becoming entitled; and then, when he afterwards seems to confine this clause to the one event, it may be a little ambiguous, but there is nothing insensible in it; you provide for two persons taking in succession or only one of them, and then you say, "in that event," that is, when the event happens, then such and such a proceeding shall take place. I think, therefore, the true construction is, that this clause is to operate toties quoties as regards the particular person named; then, if that is so, how does it stand as regards Thomas Gybbon? He had conveyed the life estate to which he might become entitled, in the Maytham Hall estate; but that would not prevent his estate going over in the event provided for, and, therefore, when Phillips died without issue, Thomas Gybbon became entitled for his life, and was also entitled at that time to the Joddrell estate, and in a way that I think was within the shifting clause—when the event happened the estate went over; and the consequence is that his son then became entitled; the clause then properly applies. If Thomas Gybbon were then dead his son would take. I am of opinion that the decision which has been come to in the Court below is the right one, and that the clause has operated a second time, and that it did operate on the Joddrell estate, and through that estate on the Maytham Hall estate.

The Lord Chancellor gave the costs out of the fund, it being understood that the litigation was not to be carried further. The next of kin to bear their own costs.

ROLLS COURT.

Reported by J. MACAULAY, Esq. of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law.

Thursday, April 29.

Ex parte LAKE, re THE NORTHERN COAL MINING COMPANY.

Winding-up Act—Calls—Judgment debts under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110—Balance order, form of—Administration suit—Proof of debts—Charging administrator personally—Interest.

An order was made for winding up the affairs of a company, and a call of 10l. per share was made on all the shareholders. A claim for the amount due on the call was carried in and proved in a suit for the administration of the estate of a deceased shareholder, and subsequently a balance order was issued charging L. as administrator of the estate simply with the amount of the calls and interest thereon. This order was discharged, on the ground that it was made personally against L. as administrator, and because interest was charged thereon. On motion to vary or discharge the order discharging the Master's order:

Held, that the Master's order must remain discharged, but the order discharging it must be varied so as to allow the official manager to prove for the calls in the suit for administration against the assets without prejudice to any claim for interest to be made in that suit.

Quære, whether calls made by the Master under the provisions of the Winding-up Act are to be considered judgment debts under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110.

Daniel (with him James) in this case moved to discharge or vary an order of the Master of the Rolls discharging an order of the Master, whereby the Master ordered the sum of 13,365l. to be paid by Mr. Lake as administrator of the estate of the late Sir Augustus Brydges Henniker, being the amount of a call and interest thereon in respect of 1,160 shares in the Northern Coal Mining Company, of which Sir A. B. Henniker had been the holder. It appeared that Sir A. B. Henniker died in the year 1849, being then a shareholder to the extent already stated, and the suit of Roberts v. Henniker was instituted for the administration of his estate, and in this suit Mr. Lake, as administrator of the estate, was made a defendant. In January 1850 an order was made under the provisions of the Winding-up Act for winding up the affairs of the Northern Coal Mining Company, and a call of 10l. a share was made upon all shareholders or contributories, including the estate of Sir A. B. Henniker. No balance order had then been issued as against the estate of Sir A. B. Henniker, but shortly after the call was made a claim was taken in in the suit of Roberts v. Henniker, and a proof was made for 11,620l. and afterwards another claim for interest on that sum was taken in, and an objection was taken that there was no balance order made. A balance order, however, was subsequently made on the 27th of May, 1850, by the Master, whereby, on the ground that the order for a call was a judgment under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, he ordered interest to be paid on the call, and he charged Mr. Lake, as administrator of Sir A. B. Henniker, with the amount of the call in respect of the 1,162 shares, and with interest thereon. This order was discharged by the Master of the Rolls on the 15th of April last, in the absence of the official manager, who, however, had been served, on the ground that it was made against Mr. Lake personally, instead of directing him to pay out of the assets of Sir A. B. Henniker, and also on the ground that the Master had allowed interest on calls. It was now asked to discharge or vary this order of the Master of the Rolls, and it was argued that the calls made by the Master were a judgment debt under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, and it was insisted that the order if discharged on the point of form, regarding the charge against the administrator personally, at least ought to be supported on the question of interest.

R. Palmer and Selwyn for the administrator.

The MASTER of the ROLLS would not determine the question whether calls made by the Master were or not judgment debts under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, because the application was not made to him in the suit of Roberts v. Henniker, and his decision, if he made one here, would not be final, and the parties might notwithstanding open the question again in the administration suit. Then, again, it might turn out not to be necessary to decide the question at all, for it might happen that the estate would be solvent, and then the question would not arise. As to the other point, that of the form of the order, it was clear that the Master's order was wrong. On the 15th of April, an order was obtained by Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Selwyn, to discharge the order of the Master, and a motion is now made to discharge that order, or vary it; but I cannot discharge the order without setting up the order of the Master. But the Master's order cannot stand, for it is an order directing Mr. Lake to pay within seven days the sum of 13,365l. due by him on balance of account as administrator of Sir A. B. Henniker's estate. That charges him as administrator simply, and in so doing, assumes that he has assets in his hands; but he has not admitted assets, and therefore the order cannot stand. How, then, can I vary the order? I am disposed to think that, unless by arrangement counsel can agree upon some other plan, I must adopt the same course on this as on all other like occasions; that is, to let the matter stand over, to give an opportunity for proposing an exact form of order. But subject to that, the order may be, that Mr. Lake, as administrator, pay out of the assets of the estate the sum to be proved, and the official manager be directed or allowed to go in in the suit of Roberts v. Henniker, and prove the amount of the calls before the death of Sir A. B. Henniker, and since, without interest. Let the balance order be made up between the parties, and let the official manager go in in Roberts v. Henniker, and prove that, and claim, if he thinks fit and necessary, interest on the calls. Discharge the order of the Master, and let the order discharging it be varied without prejudice to the official manager going in in Roberts v. Henniker, and proving calls and raising the question of interest.

LAKE v. THE EASTERN COUNTIES RAILWAY COMPANY.

Railway company—Purchase-money—Investment—Costs "incidental to conveyance."

A. B. H. contracted to sell a piece of ground to a railway company. The contract contained a stipulation that the company should pay all costs and expenses "of and incidental to the conveyance." The title was accepted, but before completion of the purchase A. B. H. died, leaving an infant heir on whom the estate descended. To obtain a conveyance a suit was necessary:

Held, that the costs of it were to be paid by the company as being included under the words "of and incidental to the conveyance."

Sir Augustus Brydges Henniker contracted, on the 5th June, 1847, to sell some land to the Eastern Counties Railway Company. The contract for sale contained a stipulation that the company should pay "all costs and expenses of and incidental to the conveyance." The abstract of title was delivered on the 8th of March, 1848, and it appeared that some of the deeds were not forthcoming; but ultimately, subject to a statutory declaration verifying those deeds, the title was accepted, after being duly investigated. Before the conveyance, however, could be executed, and in January, 1849, Sir A. B. Henniker died, leaving an infant heir, on whom the estate descended.

On the 1st of February, 1849, some days after the death of Sir A. B. Henniker, the solicitors of the company sent a draft conveyance to the solicitors of Sir A. B. Henniker, who replied that it could not then be executed. Mr. Lake, as the administrator of Sir A. B. Henniker, then filed a bill against the company to have the contract carried into effect, and a proper conveyance executed by the order of the Court. The only question now was as to the costs of the suit, which the death of Sir A. B. Henniker had rendered necessary, whether they were to be paid by the company under the stipulation already mentioned.

R. Palmer and Erskine, for the plaintiff, insisted that the costs were payable by the company. They cited Hanson v. Lake, 2 Y. & Coll. C. C. 328; Re Taylor, 1 Macn. & G. 210.

Shee, for the company.

The MASTER of the ROLLS was of opinion that the costs in question were included in the terms of the contract. Nobody was to blame. Sir Augustus died before the conveyance was executed, and a suit therefore became necessary. The provision as to costs contained in the contract includes all costs of and incidental to the conveyance, and the suit was no doubt incidental.

VICE-CHANCELLOR PARKER'S COURT.

Reported by GEO. S. ALLNUTT, Esq. of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law.

Tuesday, July 6.

MIDDLETON v. MIDDLETON.

Spoliation of will—Costs of issue devisavit vel non. Where the heir-at-law shortly after the death of a testator tore the will in pieces, but the paper writing was afterwards restored and proved, and in a suit the heir required an issue devisavit vel non, the Court, upon the validity of the will being established, ordered that the costs of the issue should be paid by the heir in consequence of his misconduct in tearing the will.

John Middleton, the testator in this cause, by his will directed that his estates should be sold and the proceeds divided among the persons therein named. In consequence, however, of the will not containing any devise of the estates they descended upon George

Middleton, the eldest son and heir-at-law of the testator. A claim was filed by one of the persons interested in the proceeds of the sale against George Middleton for the purpose of having the estates sold under the direction of the Court, and that the heir-at-law might be directed to execute the necessary conveyances. The heir-at-law disputed the validity of the will, and at the hearing of the claim required an issue devisavit vel non. That issue having been decided in favour of the validity of the will, the case now came on upon further directions. The only question now raised was as to the costs of the issue. The affidavit of James Crosby stated the following circumstances relative to the heir-at-law's conduct:—The testator died on the 25th day of May, 1846, and the deponent was present at his funeral, which took place on the 28th day of the same month. The defendant, George Middleton, the eldest son of the said testator, and other members of the testator's family, were also present at and after the funeral. Mrs. Middleton produced and handed to the deponent a paper-writing purporting to be the testator's will and to be signed at the foot thereof by the testator and subscribed by William Banting and Richard Spooner as witnesses. The will was then read over, and Mrs. Middleton afterwards requested that the deponent would take care of the will, as John Middleton, her son, one of the plaintiffs who was appointed executor of the said will, was absent, and it was then arranged by the said George Middleton and the deponent, that they should meet at Appleby on the following morning, at the house of Samuel Crosby, to consult as to the affairs of the testator. George Middleton and the deponent met on the following day at the house of Samuel Crosby, at Appleby, and when there, deponent proposed that they should go into the summer-house at the back of the house, and again peruse the will. George Middleton, Samuel Crosby, and the deponent, went into the summer-house, and deponent there gave the said will to Samuel Crosby to read over, and whilst he was doing so, George Middleton, who was sitting next to him, suddenly rose from his seat, and snatched the will out of his hands, and tore it into several pieces, saying, whilst he was doing so, "I will remove that barrier," and he then threw the pieces of paper on the ground. George Middleton then went away, and deponent did not see him again on that day. The paper writing so torn in pieces by George Middleton was the paper writing received by the deponent from Mrs. Middleton, the widow of the testator, and purporting to be his last will and testament. Samuel Crosby, by his affidavit, confirmed these statements, and said, that, whilst he was reading the will, George Middleton, who sat next to him, suddenly got up and snatched it out of his hands, and commenced, in a very violent manner, to tear it to pieces. He remonstrated with him against doing so, and endeavoured to stop him, but he did not succeed. G. Middleton said, it was useless deponent remonstrating with him, for "he had done it," meaning that he had destroyed the will, and "did not care if he was hanged for it; that the will was John's will," meaning the plaintiff, John Middleton; "that it was his making, and was all a forgery." Some time after James Crosby and George Middleton had gone away on the same day it occurred to the deponent, Samuel Crosby, that the pieces of paper which had composed the said will might be put together again, and he went to the place where the said pieces of paper were lying, and gathered them all up, and assisted by Richard Winter, put them on another sheet of paper with gum, the writing being all on one side of the paper writing, and made the paper writing as distinct and readable as before it was torn. He afterwards gave the paper writing to John Middleton, the plaintiff, who was the executor thereof, and by whom, as he had been informed and believed, the same was proved in the Consistory Court of Carlisle.

Bagshawe, Jun. (with whom was Russell), contended that in consequence of the heir-at-law's misconduct in tearing up the will, he should be compelled to pay the costs of the issue. (Berney v. Eyre, 3 Atk. 387.)

Robson, for some of the defendants.

Faber (with whom was Stuart), for George Middleton, the heir-at-law, said that the act of spoliation had nothing to do with the question of the issue. The heir had not destroyed the will, so as to compel the parties to set it up by means of secondary evidence.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that he considered the misconduct of the heir-at-law to be so very great, that he must pay the costs of the issue, although they had not been increased by what the heir had done in attempting to destroy the will.

GOUGH v. OFFLEY.

Mortgagor and Mortgagee—Production of documents.

In a suit for the administration of the estate of a deceased mortgagee, the executors may be compelled to produce the mortgage deeds admitted by their answer to be in their possession, although the mortgagors are not parties to the suit, and although such production might be attended with loss to the testator's estate.

This was a motion on behalf of the plaintiff for the production by the defendants, James Offley and Charles Higgs, of the several deeds and papers admitted by their answer to be in their or one of their custody, possession, or power.

The answer of the defendant, James Offley, who was executor and trustee, and Charles Higgs, who was another trustee of the testator in the cause, to the bill, which was for the administration of the testator's estate, admitted, among other things, that the testator's estate consisted of upwards of 30,000*l.* the principal part of which was composed of moneys due on mortgage; that the whole of the personal estate of the testator was vested in the defendant, James Offley, as the sole legal personal representative of said testator; and that he had in his possession the several deeds and documents, a list of which was set forth in the first part of the seventh schedule thereto, and that the defendants had in their possession, on behalf of themselves and their co-trustees, the deeds and documents, a list of which was set forth in the second part of the said seventh schedule thereto; that as to the deeds mentioned and referred to in the third and sixth schedule, the same were the title-deeds of the various persons who were entitled to the equity of redemption of the properties comprised therein, and that such parties were not parties to the suit; that the defendants had set forth in the said third and sixth schedules thereto a statement of the annual rental and estimated value of each of the said mortgaged properties; and that the said mortgaged properties were an ample security for the moneys invested thereon; and the defendants submitted that it would be a great injury to the parties entitled to the equity of redemption in the said mortgaged properties if their mortgages were made known, by means of this suit, to Ralph Dickinson Gough, the husband of the plaintiff, who was an attorney and solicitor, carrying on business in the immediate neighbourhood of the said mortgaged properties; and they submitted that in the absence of such parties the defendant, James Offley, could not disclose any further particulars relating to the said mortgage and title-deeds, without violating the confidence reposed in him as the mortgagee or executor of the mortgagee, and, therefore, that he ought not to be called on so to do, and that the production of said deeds mentioned or referred to in said third and sixth schedules ought not to be ordered in this suit, but that the same ought to be protected from production.

In opposition to the motion an affidavit was filed, stating that most of the mortgagors would pay off their mortgages rather than allow the deeds to be produced by the mortgagees, and that such payment, by reason of the present low interest of money, would occasion considerable loss to the estate.

Martindale (with whom was Malins) appeared in support of the motion.

J. Baily and Batten, for the defendants, referred Lambert v. Rawlins, 2 Mer. 489, and Reid v. Langlois, 1 Mac. & Gord. 627.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that he did not think there was any thing in the circumstances of this case to take it out of the ordinary rule. The plaintiffs had a right to see all the securities. As to the interest of the mortgagors, they subjected themselves to all the inconveniences consequent upon it when they mortgaged their property. This case did not appear to come within any of the exceptions to the rule.

FOOTNER v. STURGIS.

Judgment-creditor—Foreclosure.

The Court will not make a decree of foreclosure upon the claim of a judgment-creditor.

This was a claim by a judgment-creditor to enforce his charge against certain real estate belonging to the defendant.

Hallett, for the plaintiff, proposed to take a foreclosure decree, and referred to Ford v. Wastell, 2 Ph. 591, as an authority for a judgment creditor's having a decree of foreclosure.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said, that upon a charge like that of the plaintiff's, it was not the course to decree a foreclosure. He could not, therefore, make the decree proposed.

Trustee Act, 1850—Removal of trustee.

The sections 22 and 32 of the Trustee Act, 1850, do not give the Court power to remove a trustee merely because he is out of the jurisdiction, and to appoint another.

This was a petition presented on behalf of certain infants, which, amongst other things, stated that one of the trustees in whose names a sum of 1,035*l.* 3 per cent. Consols was standing, had been and then was residing at Jamaica, out of the jurisdiction of the Court, and praying that another trustee might be appointed in the place of the one so residing out of the jurisdiction; that the two new trustees might be appointed guardians of the infants; and that a sum of 263*l.* part of the corpus of the fund, might be sold out and applied towards the past and future maintenance of the infants.

E. W. Collins, in support of the petition, relied upon the 22nd and 32nd sections (a) of the Trustee Act, 1850 (13 & 14 Vict. c. 60), as giving the Court power to remove a trustee residing out of the jurisdiction, and cited Re Hobson's Settlement, 15 Jurist, 552.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR, having taken time to consider the question, said that he had done so to enable him to confer with one of the other Vice-Chancellors on the subject. That he had done so, and that he (the Vice-Chancellor) now thought that he ought not to remove this trustee and appoint another on the mere ground of the trustee residing out of the jurisdiction of the Court. The words of the sections to which reference had been made were very general, but he did not think that the Legislature could have intended that a trustee should be summarily removed merely because he was out of the jurisdiction, which probably might be the case only for a short time.

COUNTY COURT APPEAL.

Feb. 21, May 12, and June 19.

SHEPHERD v. THE GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Railway Carriers—Responsibility for merchandise disguised as luggage.

A railway company is not responsible for the loss of merchandise which is put into receptacles such as ordinarily contain luggage, even though such loss be occasioned by negligence on their part during the carriage, unless notice be given to them and the nature of the articles declared.

The rule permitting every passenger by a third-class Parliamentary train to carry with him 56lbs. of luggage, empowers a husband and wife travelling together to take double that quantity between them.

Appeal from the County Court of Yorkshire holden at Sheffield.

CASE.

"This was an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendants to recover damages amounting to the sum of 10*l.* 3*s.* 2*d.* comprising the following items:—124 dozen of ivory handles, cost price, 33*l.* 19*s.* 8*d.*; carpet bag, 7*s.*; boots, 15*s.*; two handkerchiefs, 1*s.* 6*d.*; loss of sale of ivory handles and expenses, 5*l.*; total, 40*l.* 3*s.* 2*d.*; and was tried on the 5th November last; and on the hearing the following facts were proved or admitted.

"On the 2nd August last the plaintiff, who is a cutler at Sheffield, took a third-class ticket of the defendants at the Great Northern Railway station at Sheffield, to go (by one of the excursion trains which left Sheffield on that day) to London, and to return to Sheffield, and for which he paid the sum of 5*s.* During the plaintiff's stay in London he purchased a large quantity of ivory handles for table-knives, for the whole of which he paid a sum exceeding 33*l.* 19*s.* 8*d.* On the 6th August the plain-

(a) Sec. 22.—And be it enacted, that where any person or persons shall be jointly entitled with any person out of the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, or who cannot be found, or concerning whom it shall be uncertain whether he be living or dead, to any stock or chose in action upon any trust, it shall be lawful for the said Court to make an order vesting the right to transfer such stock, or to receive the dividends or income thereof, or to sue for or recover such chose in action, or any interest in respect thereof, either in such person or persons so jointly entitled as aforesaid, or in such last-mentioned person or persons, together with any person or persons the said Court may appoint; and when any sole trustee of any stock or chose in action shall be out of the jurisdiction of the said Court, or cannot be found, or it shall be uncertain whether he be living or dead, it shall be lawful for the said Court to make an order vesting the right to transfer such stock, or to receive the dividends or income thereof, or to sue for and recover such chose in action, or any interest in respect thereof, in any person or persons the said Court may appoint.

Sec. 32.—And be it enacted, that whenever it shall be expedient to appoint a new trustee or new trustees, and it shall be found inexpedient, difficult, or impracticable so to do without the assistance of the Court of Chancery, it shall be lawful for the said Court of Chancery to make an order appointing a new trustee or new trustees either in substitution for or in addition to any existing trustee or trustees.

tiff left London by the return excursion-train of the defendants, accompanied by his wife, his father-in-law, and another person, his sister-in-law, each of whom had also a third-class ticket for the defendants' excursion-train back to Sheffield.

"The luggage of the plaintiff consisted of a carpet bag, a deal box, about two feet long, and two brown paper parcels wrapped in blue checked handkerchiefs. The carpet-bag (besides some boots and other trifling articles of the value of 1*l.* 3*s.* 6*d.*) contained ivory handles, as did also the box and parcels, and the total quantity of ivory handles was 283 dozen. Each package had upon it the plaintiff's name and address, both at Sheffield and in London. The luggage allowed to a third-class passenger by the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85, s. 6, was 56 lbs. and the same weight was also allowed to third-class passengers by the defendants' excursion trains.

"The plaintiff admitted, on oath, that he took no other luggage with him from Sheffield, and that the ivory handles were articles bought by him to use in his business; that he, the plaintiff, with his wife, his father-in-law, and his wife's sister, each took a parcel of the luggage and put it in the carriage in which they rode, under the seats, and that the porters of the company did not interfere in any way, and that the box was placed in the luggage-van by the plaintiff; that the weight was about 100 lbs. altogether. The wife's personal luggage was very trifling, and did not exceed 3 lbs. in weight; that the plaintiff, on his arrival at a place called Retford, between London and Sheffield, where the line of the railway divides, and where the passengers for Sheffield were obliged to change their carriages, took the parcels out of the carriages, and placed them with the box on the platform, where they remained for nearly an hour, until the fresh carriage was ready for them to proceed to Sheffield. The plaintiff then put the box in the luggage-van, and he placed the other parcels in the carriage where they took their seats to continue the journey to Sheffield, and did not call the porter to assist him; that subsequent to their departure in the train from Retford, and previous to their arrival at Sheffield, the train was obliged to stop on account of some obstruction; there was no guard in attendance upon it to warn any coming train, and the next train ran into the train in which the plaintiff and his wife were. They were both much hurt (for which the defendants have made them compensation by arrangement), and upon the plaintiff and his wife being assisted into another train, which was then provided for them by the company, to be forwarded to Sheffield, he spoke to one of the railway porters (as he was getting into the train) about his luggage, who told him "not to make himself uneasy—it would be all right." A messenger, sent by the plaintiff to the defendants' station to inquire for the luggage on the following day, was told that the defendants would inquire about it. The box was afterwards forwarded to the plaintiff by the defendants, but the other articles were never restored to him.

"The first point raised on the part of the defendant was, that the goods lost were not luggage, but merchandise, and being also above the weight allowed to third class passengers, even if luggage, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover. The judge decided against that objection on the following grounds, namely, that as the plaintiff and his wife were travelling together they would be entitled under the Act regulating railways to carry half an hundred weight each, and therefore the two would be entitled to carry one cwt. between them, which was more than the whole of the parcels weighed, but that even assuming that the company were not bound to carry the goods in question without extra charge, and that they might have refused to do so, either on the ground of their being above the weight allowed for one passenger, or on the ground of their being merchandise and not articles of personal luggage, yet as they had not refused, he held that they were just as much subject to the ordinary liabilities of carriers as if the goods had been under the allowed weight, and had been personal luggage of the passengers, the object of the clause in the Act of Parliament, in his opinion, being merely to compel railway companies to carry a certain quantity of luggage for each passenger without extra charge, and not to affect their liabilities for loss of such goods as they do consent to carry. The second point raised by the defendants was, that the goods were never in the custody of the defendants; but the judge found that the goods were in the custody of the defendants, and gave a judgment for the plaintiff for 35*l.* 3*s.* 2*d.*

"The questions for the opinion of her Majesty's judges of the Court of Ex. of Pleas to decide are,—

"1st, Whether, under the circumstances proved at the trial of the above cause, the company were liable for the loss of the above articles of merchandise.

"2nd, Whether, under the circumstances proved at the trial, the plaintiff and his wife were justly entitled to carry between them 112 lbs. weight of luggage.

"3rd, Whether the company had accepted the custody of the goods, under the circumstances proved at the trial, so as to render them liable to the plaintiff; or whether the goods were in the sole personal custody of the plaintiff."

The above case came on for argument before Parke and Platt, BB. on the 21st February, 1852, when Phipson, for the appellants, the defendants below, contended that the company were not liable for the loss of the ivory handles, which were merchandise and not personal luggage, even admitting that they were responsible for the loss of such articles as would come under the denomination of personal luggage.

Mellor, for the respondent, the plaintiff below.—The defendants are liable as common carriers, unless protected by a special contract, or by Act of Parliament. Here there was no special contract, and this excursion-train was not subject to the restrictions contained in the 6th section of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85. The defendants are subject, therefore, to the ordinary liabilities; and these ivory handles being brought by the plaintiff, not for sale, but to be used by him in his business, cannot be considered as merchandise.

PARKE, B.—If these goods had been so packed that the servants of the company could have seen that they were merchandise, and the company, with such knowledge, had taken them without making any contract for the carriage, I am of opinion that they would have been responsible for the loss. But the contents of these bundles were disguised; some of these ivory handles being in paper parcels tied up in blue handkerchiefs. The company, therefore, being ignorant of the contents of these bundles, had no opportunity of making a charge. As to the second question submitted to the Court, I am of opinion that the rule permitting every passenger by a third-class Parliamentary train to carry with him 56lbs. of luggage, empowers a husband and wife travelling together to take double that quantity,—namely, 112lbs. between them. The case, however, must be referred back to the judge that he may restate a part of it, and say whether this excursion-train was considered as an ordinary third-class Parliamentary train, or what were the terms upon which the company carried passengers by it.

The following rule was accordingly made:—

"In the Exchequer of Pleas, Hilary Term, in the fifteenth year of the reign of Queen Victoria. On appeal from the Sheffield County Court of Yorkshire, in a plaint between Thomas Shepherd, plaintiff, and the Great Northern Railway Company, defendants.

"Saturday, 21st day of February, 1852.

"Upon reading the special case stated betwee parties for the opinion of this Court, and upon hearing Mr. Phipson of counsel for the defendants, the appellants, and Mr. Mellor, of counsel for the respondent, it is ordered that the special case be referred back to the judge of the said County Court to state the terms upon which the defendants carried passengers by the excursion-train in question, and whether they carried them upon the terms contained in the 6th section of the statute 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85.

'BY THE COURT."

The following supplemental case was accordingly prepared, and was now (May 12) submitted to the Court.(a)

AMENDED CASE.

"The Court of Exchequer having, on the hearing of the appeal, ordered that the special case be referred back to the judge of the County Court to state the terms upon which the defendants carried passengers by the excursion-train in question, and whether they carried them upon the terms contained in the 6th section of the statute of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85, I have to state that no evidence was given or tendered as to the terms upon which the defendants carried passengers by the excursion-train in question, unless the admitted fact, that the charge for each third-class passenger by the said train was much less than a 1d. for each mile travelled, be, of itself, in the opinion of the Court of Appeal, sufficient proof, in point of law, that they carried them upon the terms contained in the said 6th section, and (subject to such opinion of the said Court) I find that the defendants did not carry passengers by the said excursion-train upon the terms contained in the 6th section of the statute 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85, and that there was no special contract as to the terms between the plaintiff and the defendants, but that they carried him and other passengers and their luggage by the said train upon the same terms as those upon which the defendants and other railway companies carry passengers, whether of the first, second, or third class, and their luggage by their ordinary passenger trains, and which terms (as I conceive) are the same as those on which stage-coach proprietors and other common carriers of passengers for hire do, by the laws of England, carry passengers and their luggage.

"I ought to add, that had I been specially called upon at the trial to find the terms upon which passengers were carried by the said train, I should have found them as above set forth; but I considered and stated that it was unnecessary for me to do so, because, even on the assumption that the defendants were right in contending that they carried the plaintiff on the terms contained in the said sixth section of the statute, I thought they were liable for the loss of his goods, and that consequently, à fortiori, they were so if they did not carry him on such terms.

"I would take the liberty of respectfully adding, further, that the County Court judge does not state the case on appeals; he merely signs the statement prepared by the parties, if they agree, and determines which of two statements is to be adopted when they differ, unless he happen to notice some manifest error or omission.

(Signed) "WM. WALKER.

"Sheffield, 1st April, 1852."

Phipson for the appellants, the defendants below.—The principle of a carrier's liability is the hire for which he undertakes to convey. The 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85, s. 6, establishes Parliamentary trains, and provides the hours for starting, the rate of speed, stoppages, carriages, and fares; and that "each passenger by such train shall be allowed to take with him half a hundred weight of luggage, not being merchandise, or other articles carried for hire or profit, without extra charge; and any excess of luggage shall be charged by weight, at a rate not exceeding the lowest rate of charge for passengers' luggage by other trains." At the trial it seemed to be supposed that this was a Parliamentary train, and the judge seemed to think that even if the train was within this section of the Act, the company was liable for the loss. The learned judge who first heard the appeal appeared to be of opinion that if this excursion-train was to be taken to be a Parliamentary train, the company was not liable. [ALDERSON, B.—This was clearly not a Parliamentary train within that section.] Here there was no special contract, and the question then is, whether railway carriers are to be held liable beyond other carriers? Is a carrier to be held responsible for merchandise wrapped up and disguised as luggage? The company never undertook to carry these ivory handles, and were utterly ignorant that they were carrying them. The principle is laid down by Lord Mansfield in the case of Gibbon v. Paynton, 4 Burr. 2298. There a man sent 100*l.* in money from Birmingham to London, and hid it in hay in an old nail bag. The bag and hay arrived safe, but the money was gone. Lord Mansfield said, "His (the carrier's) warranty and insurance is in respect of the reward he is to receive; and the reward ought to be proportionable to the risk. If he makes a greater warranty and insurance, he will take greater care, use more caution, and be at the expense of more guards or other methods of security; and therefore he ought in reason and justice to have a greater reward; consequently, if the owner of the goods had been guilty of a fraud upon the carrier, such fraud ought to excuse the carrier." As regards the personal luggage, the company cannot dispute their liability, and must pay those items amounting to 1*l.* 3*s.* 6*d.*

Saturday, June 19.(a)—Field was now called upon for the respondent (the plaintiff below). It is found by the judge of the County Court that there was no special contract, and no notice was displayed by the company limiting their liability, so as to make a special contract between the parties. These are not articles mentioned in the Carriers' Act, and the case is easily distinguishable from Batson v. Donovan, 4 B & A. 21, and that class of cases, because there notice was given by the carrier; here there was none. [PARKE, B.—If the company had been informed that these parcels contained merchandise, and not personal luggage, they would have required an additional payment.] It was the duty of the company to inquire. In Riley v. Horne, 5 Bing. 217, Best, C.J. in his judgment, said,—"A carrier has a right to know the value and quality of what he is required to carry. If the owner of the goods will not tell him what his goods are, and what they are worth, the carrier may refuse to take charge of them; but if he does take charge of them, he waives his right to know their contents and value." That is precisely what has been done by the defendants in this case. [PARKE, B.—Here the company say "We will take you and your luggage;" but there is no special contract; they do not undertake to carry merchandise, unless properly declared and paid for. If you do not give them notice, they cannot know the nature of the contents of the packages, and the risk they incur in carrying them. In this case there was false colour, by disguising the nature of the goods, whether intentionally or not does not signify, since it had the effect of preventing inquiry, and did not give the defendants full opportunity of knowing the contents.] In Batson v. Donovan, and Gibbon v. Paynton, fraud was expressly found. [PLATT, B.—You say that the company took these packages as luggage, and, therefore, cannot now complain; but why did they take them as luggage? Why, because their contents were disguised. PARKE, B.—If these articles had been declared, and the company had known what they were carrying, they would probably have compelled the respondent to send these packages by the luggage train, and pay for them.] Suppose, according to the regulations, I am allowed 112 lbs. of luggage, and I take 113 lbs. and my luggage is lost, does the fact of my having one pound more than the amount allowed release the company from liability? [PARKE, B.—No; it would be the duty of the company in that case to weigh the luggage.] It is equally their duty to inquire the nature of the luggage. This is a peculiar case; the facts show that the respondent was injured by an accident in the railway, and was, in consequence, prevented looking after his luggage, and there was an implied contract by the company to take care of it. [PARKE, B.—There was no new contract by the company after it in consequence of the accident; it was only a continuance of the old contract.]

(a) Before Parke and Platt, BB.

PARKE, B.—In this case there being no special contract, the defendants were only bound to carry the plaintiff and his luggage, and under that term may be comprised his clothing and everything required for his personal convenience; and perhaps even a small present, had he had such with him, or a book to read on the journey might also be included in that term, but they were certainly not bound to carry merchandise and materials intended for trade, and to be sold at a profit. [The learned judge here recapitulated the facts of the case.] If this plaintiff had exposed these goods and the defendants had known and had full notice of what they were carrying, they would have been responsible, but they were not bound to carry merchandize, articles wholly disconnected with personal luggage. It is not necessary, therefore, to inquire whether there was fraud practised or not; the plaintiff conducted himself as if his intention had been fraudulent, and his sole desire to get his journey at as cheap a rate as possible. The argument that there was a new and special contract entered into between the parties founded on the case of Coggs v. Barnard is not valid. There the defendants agreed to carry, and here likewise the defendants would have been responsible if they had agreed to carry these articles, but they only agreed to carry the plaintiff as a passenger, and after the accident occurred there was no new contract; they only intended to carry out the original contract, and the subsequent carrying became a part of it. The company, therefore, is not liable for the loss. The judgment of the Court below will, therefore, be reversed, but, considering all the facts of the case, I think the usual rule as to costs should not be insisted upon.

Phipson intimated that the company would do whatever his lordship thought right.

Judgment reversed without costs, the defendants undertaking to pay 1l. 3s. 6d. the value of the plaintiff's personal luggage, if not already paid.

ERROR FROM THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH

Monday, May 10.

THE GRANTHAM CANAL COMPANY v. THE AMBERGATE, &c. RAILWAY COMPANY.

Railway Act—Construction—"Opening of the railway between A. and G."

By a railway Act, authorising the construction of a line from A. through N. and G. to B. and the purchasing of the N. and G. canals, it was enacted that "from and immediately after the opening of the railway between A. and G. for public use," the railway company should purchase the shares in both canals. The railway was opened for public use between G. and N. but not between N. and A. The part opened competed with the G. canal, that not opened would compete with the N. canal. In an action by the G. Canal Company against the railway company for the price of their shares:

Held (reversing the judgment of the Court of Q B.) that the railway had been opened for public use between A. and G. within the meaning of the Act of Parliament. (Williams, J. dissentiente.)

This was a writ of error upon a judgment of the Court of Q.B. pronounced in favour of the defendants upon a special verdict. The question turned entirely upon the construction of a few words in a local Act of Parliament, and is sufficiently stated in the judgment of the Court.

The case was argued on the 2nd of Feb. before Parke, B. Alderson, B. Maule, J. Cresswell, J. Platt, B., V. Williams, J. Talfourd, J. and Martin, B. by Bramwell, for the plaintiffs in error; and by Sir F. Kelly for the defendants. Cur. adv. vult.

JUDGMENT.

ALDERSON, B.—The question in this case arises upon a special verdict in an action brought by the plaintiffs against the defendants upon a private Act of Parliament (9 & 10 Vict. c. 155). From the statement in the special verdict, it will be seen that the sole question is as to the meaning of some words in the 73rd section of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 155, and that section is as follows:—"And whereas the capital of the Nottingham Canal Company consists of the sum of 75,000l, divided into 500 shares of the original value of 150l. each. And whereas the capital stock of the company of proprietors of the Grantham Canal Navigation, otherwise called in this Act the Grantham Canal Company, originally consisted of 75,000l. divided into 750 shares, of the value of 100l. each, which capital was, under the powers of the said Act of the 37th year of the reign of King George the Third, increased to the sum of 112,500l. by the conversion of the said shares into shares of 150l. each. And whereas all calls have been paid upon the shares in the said canal company, with the exception of one share in the said Grantham Canal Company, which was forfeited for non-payment of calls, and each of the said shares in the Nottingham Canal Company is now of the value of 225l. and each of the said shares in the Grantham Canal Company is now of the value of 160l. be it enacted that, from and immediately after the opening of the railway between Ambergate and Grantham, for public use, the company hereby incorporated shall be liable to pay to the committee of management for the time being of the Nottingham Canal Company, for the use of the persons who, at the time of the opening of the railway between Ambergate and Grantham, shall be proprietors of the Nottingham Canal, the sum of 225l. for and in lieu of each share in the Nottingham Canal, and shall also be liable to pay to the committee of management for the time being of the Grantham Canal Company for the use of the persons who, at the time of the opening of the railway between Ambergate and Grantham, shall be proprietors of the Grantham Canal, the sum of 160l. for, and in lieu of, each share (including the said forfeited share); and they are hereby required to pay the same several sums to the said committee of management for the time being respectively within six calendar months from the opening of the railway between Ambergate and Grantham, but without interest in the meantime." And then it provides that it shall be treated as a debt and may be recovered in an action of debt. The opening of the railroad mentioned in this section is, no doubt, the opening of the railway authorised by the Act, namely, the railway from Ambergate to Nottingham, and between Spalding and Boston called the Ambergate, Nottingham, Boston, and Eastern Junction Railway, which was to begin at Ambergate and pass through Nottingham and Grantham and end at Spalding. The sole question is, whether that opening was to be through the whole or part of the intermediate space intended to be occupied by the present railway between Ambergate and Grantham, in the sense in which one end is Ambergate and the other is Grantham? Now the railway is opened between them if it is opened in that space, and in any and every part of the intermediate space between the two places. If the intention of the Legislature had been different, the correct expression would have been that it should be opened from one place to the other, or for the whole space between them. The words used, however, would be very likely to be used in that sense in common parlance, and so to be understood by an ordinary reader, although, in their strict grammatical sense, they do not so import. The words, therefore, being in a certain degree ambiguous, we must refer to the context to determine in what sense they were used, and what is their meaning. If we look at the context, [illegible] think the meaning of the words [illegible] that which they bear in their strict grammatical sense. The recital of the Act shews that it was intended that the present railway, and also the Nottingham and Grantham Canal Company, should be worked in connection, and that the companies should be consolidated and incorporated with the railway company, and for the purpose of effecting that object, the 73rd section enacts that the railway company shall purchase both the canals at a price given, and both at the same time. When is that time? According to the plaintiff's construction and the common grammatical sense of the words used, it is when the railway from Ambergate to Spalding is opened in any part between Ambergate and Grantham. According to the defendants, and according to the probable and popular understanding of the words used, it is when the whole space between these two stations is made. Which is the more reasonable construction, looking at the objects of the Act—the purchase of both canals at the same time? We may collect from the special verdict that the Grantham Canal would be injured by the opening of the part of the railway lying between Ambergate and Grantham, for it is expressly found it would be injured by the opening of a part of the railway lying between Nottingham and Grantham, and the opening of the residue of the space between Nottingham and Ambergate would, in like manner, presumably injure the Nottingham. Is it not more reasonable, then, to hold that the time for the purchase of both is, when either of the canals begins to be injured by the opening of any part of the railway, between Ambergate and Grantham, rather than after both had been injured by the opening of the whole space, in which case the degree of injury will vary, according as one or the other end be first opened, and according to the length of time it continues open before the whole is completed? In the former case each canal receives the full stipulated price at the same time, and each before it has sustained any material injury, and thus both are placed on precisely the same footing, or one must have all its profits for a long time, much longer than the other, and compensation for the loss, that is, the sum to be paid to each canal. It is exactly the same, at whatever time it is made, and both would become payable at precisely the same time, according to the clear provisions of the statute. The Grantham Canal is now injured by the opening of the railway from Nottingham to Grantham, and would probably continue so injured for years, until the railway is extended to Ambergate. And the proprietors are to receive only a stipulated price, and without interest. The Nottingham Canal would be injured for a much less time, and yet it would receive the full agreed price. Surely that is very unreasonable. We think, therefore, the plaintiff's construction ought to prevail, it being at the same time the strict grammatical sense of the words, and by far the most reasonable. If the provisions of the statute enacted that the railway company were to receive some public advantage from the construction of the railway from Ambergate to Grantham, it might have been properly construed a statute against them, and to hold that the company was bound to open it for the whole space; the context in that sense would have required us to have put the popular construction on the words of the clause. On the argument before us, inferences were attempted to be drawn by the learned counsel on each side, from other clauses of the Act. We think there is no light thrown on the question by either of them. Sir Fitzroy Kelly argued from the 77th section, which gives an option to take shares in the railway at any time before the expiration of two calendar months, from the opening of the railway between Ambergate and Grantham for the public use, that it must be the opening for the whole distance, which would be notorious. The canal proprietors must reasonably be presumed to know it. Surely the opening of any part of the same space, though not so notorious, is sufficiently notorious to make it well known. On the other hand Mr. Bramwell argued from the 78th section, that it was obvious the Legislature contemplated a payment of dividends from the railway profits, payable to the canal shareholders by virtue of the former clause. But the answer is, that such proposition may be explained on the supposition that the railway was completed, and open for all the space between Ambergate and Grantham, but not complete to Boston or Spalding. Our opinion is formed on the grammatical construction of the 73rd section, its perfect fairness, and the unreasonableness of that contended for by the defendants. The opinion, therefore, of the majority of the Court is that the judgment of the Court of Q. B. must be reversed.

WILLIAMS, J.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Q. B. was right. I think that the word "between" may be applied grammatically, as well in speaking of the whole distance included between two designated extremities, as of any point between them. The application seems to be governed by popular usage, according to the matter spoken of; for example, the word is applied in the one way when we speak of a carrier between London and York, and in the other when we speak of an inn between those two cities, only the sense of the word between is varied, but in the one case there is before the word an ellipsis of "along the whole distance," and in the other of "at some spot in the distance." In speaking of opening the railway for public use between the one and the other, the terms "along the whole distance" are plainly, in my apprehension, meant to be before the word between. It is said the enactment in question, if so held, would work harshly, but I do not think that it is any good reason for giving to the words used by the Legislature a meaning which I cannot believe they were ever meant to have. Judgment reversed.

INSOLVENCY COURT.

Reported by DAVID CATO MACRAE, Esq. of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law.

(Before Mr. Commissioner PHILLIPS.)

Saturday, July 17.

Re F. COKER.

Discharge on Sureties—1 & 2 Vict. c. 110.

Held, that when there is a clear case of remand within the statute, the Court will not discharge an insolvent upon bail before his hearing:

Held, also, that when there is only a primâ facie case for remand, which may be answered by the production of additional evidence at the hearing, the Court will accept bail for an insolvent's appearance at the hearing.

The learned Commissioner some time since, with a view, as he intimated, to put a stop to the acceptance of accommodation bills, intimated that he would admit no insolvent to bail before the day appointed for his hearing, if he found any accommodation bills in his schedule. He carried out this determination by refusing to accept bail in various cases.

To-day, this insolvent applied to be liberated upon tendering sureties for his appearance at the hearing.

Mr. Commissioner PHILLIPS intimated, that as there were accommodation bills in the schedule, he should adhere to the rule which he had laid down for his own guidance in all these cases, and refuse the application.

Sargood argued the matter on behalf of the insolvent, and contended that the bail being simply a matter between the detaining creditor and the insolvent, the Court had no jurisdiction to proceed upon the merits, as the hearing was the proper time for their discussion. He also questioned the probability of the rule meeting the evil it was intended to combat, as although accommodation bills were doubtless generally to be reprobated, the effect of the Court pronouncing a primâ facie judgment upon them would be to induce insolvents to conceal facts, if not to falsify their schedule. He therefore hoped his Honour would reconsider his opinion, and not expose the insolvent to an imprisonment of six weeks or two months without a hearing.

Mr. Commissioner PHILLIPS said he had adopted the rule, after mature deliberation, as the only way of meeting the giant evil of accommodation bills, which every day appeared in this Court, and he had heard nothing to induce him to alter or relax that rule. He should therefore refuse to accept bail in this case. Bail refused.

Two other bail cases, in a similar category, were in the list, but as they were appointed to be heard by the Chief Commissioner, they were adjourned until Tuesday, when they were accepted by that learned judge.

Tuesday, July 20.
In re E. AUGARDE.

In this case the CHIEF COMMISSIONER, having had mentioned to him by counsel the rule laid down by Mr. Commissioner Phillips, thus expressed himself in reference thereto:—

The CHIEF COMMISSIONER.—As to myself, it is no mystery that I look upon accommodation bills, and the whole system connected therewith, as one of the most desolating and mischievous things that can occur in society. I see its desolating character every day, and whatever we can fairly do to check it would be most useful employment of our functions. But I am not prepared, on taking up a schedule in which there happen to be one, two, or three accommodation bills, to say that without any inquiry, without any consideration of how they bore upon the other debts, without their circumstances being inquired into, to make the mere abstract fact of there being accommodation debts a reason for refusing the debtor his discharge upon sureties. Nor have I ever held so. But primâ facie they are debts which a party is to explain and shew if he can that they are debts which have been contracted without detriment to his other bonâ fide creditors, and that they have not been the means of reducing him to the necessity of applying to this Court for relief, thus leaving his honest creditors in the lurch. If I discover in this schedule, or in any other, debts which bear this character, I should refuse the application. If not, I grant it. Very early, when the privilege of bail was first granted, a question came before us as to whether, when there were debts owing visibly falling within the 76th and 77th sections of the Act, as in cases of damages in actions of crim. con., seduction, and others of a personal nature, we should grant bail, and my late learned brother who then sat with me, Mr. Commissioner Bowen, used to say, we cannot let you out on bail, because there is an obvious remand upon your own shewing, and the judgment always running from the vesting order, we cannot suffer the debtor to spend a portion of that period at liberty. By this rule we have always acted, and as this case has been sent to me I shall decide upon it on that principle. Upon inquiry, one of the proposed sureties being unsatisfactory, the bail was refused on that ground.

Mr. Commissioner PHILLIPS upon this reconsidered the propriety of the rule he had laid down, and finding that it was not in accordance with the practice of the two senior Commissioners or of the Court hitherto, he withdrew his rule.

Monday, August 2.—Mr. Commissioner PHILLIPS said,—I think it right to take this opportunity of stating more distinctly than I have hitherto done, the reasons which have influenced me in refusing a discharge on sureties in cases of accommodation paper. In the adopting this rule, I had hoped somewhat to discourage what the learned Chief Commissioner has truly and felicitously called "a desolating system." The insolvent law of England, with the administration of which we are charged, is based on the most indulgent principle possible as regards petitioners. It enables any man, no matter howsoever encumbered with debt (and we have had some bending under the burthen of 30,000*l*. or 40,000*l*.) to approach this court and free himself at once from all responsibility. A large and liberal boon to debtors! not, however, granted unconditionally. Its immediate operation is limited to cases of mere misfortune, or where the insolvency has resulted from the unavoidable vicissitudes of trade. The statute, however, specifies exceptions where this relief cannot be immediate. Even here, however, the law, as contrasted with the code of other civilised countries, is comparatively lenient. The power of remand ranges, according to the nature of the case, from a week up to a period of three years: but three years is the limit. The dwarf delinquent who filches a handkerchief may be transported for life, but at the end of three years, the most accomplished graduate in swindling—the practical professor of every possible insolvent law offence—the proficient in every variety of fraud—who has cheated his creditors, made away with his property, mutilated his books, given dishonest preferences, and victimized every human being with whom he has come in contact, may "shake the dust" off at his prison door, and walk forth a free man—free from the thousands upon thousands he had appropriated and squandered! Surely, this is liberal legislation—towards the debtor at all events. However, it ends not here. It relieves him even from previous imprisonment, if he can procure bail; a privilege but rarely attainable by the humbler and generally the more scatheless petitioners. The discharge upon sureties is, however, in the discretion of the Court, and the question now is, whether that discretion should be exercised in favour of a man who takes upon himself the debts of others, when his schedule shews he cannot pay his own? I think that it should not; and I will state my reasons. I think no such person entitled to any favour. Now, it is admitted that where a clear case of remand, as for damages in an action for seduction, crim. con. &c. &c. appears upon the schedule, bail should be refused. This was decided, after full conference between the learned Chief Commissioner and Mr. Commissioner Bowen, and it establishes two points; first, that bail is not a matter of right (indeed, the power to allow it is not of very distant date), and next that it may be refused before the hearing, even where there is no opposition to the application. Now, it appears to me that when an insolvent's own debts, for which he has had consideration, remain unpaid, the rendering himself liable for the debts of others, for which debts he has had no consideration, is quite as clearly a statutable offence as is the case of damages alluded to, and in my opinion a much worse one, taken abstractedly, because in the one case an individual only is affected; but in the other the whole community. If a man cannot pay his own bonâ fide debts of previous standing, by what right does he subsequently make himself responsible (a cheap responsibility, no doubt,) for the debts of others? Is not this, in the words of the statute, "contracting a debt without a reasonable expectation of being able to pay it;" and will not a reference to the dates in the schedule establish the fact? Why does not the insolvent pay the tradesman who trusted him with his goods? There can be but one of two reasons. Either he is unwilling, and therefore dishonest, and therefore disentitled to indulgence, or he is unable, and so his subsequent voluntarily incurred liabilities on account of another, are clearly contracted without expectation of being able to pay, and so they are offences under the statute. In my judgment, this is rank dishonesty. It has been sometimes urged on me that an accommodation acceptor may rely upon the drawer's having means to meet the bill when at maturity. A very irrational reliance, and one which, in such a case, he has not the least right to entertain. What answer is this to the bonâ fide holder, who took it in open market, and gave full value for it on the faith of names which represented shadows? But the acceptor has no foundation for such reliance. He must know perfectly well that none but a man in difficulties would thus solicit his acceptance, and he must equally well know that if the drawer could not honour it, neither could he, except at the expense of his own just creditors, and seldom even then. But the truth is, when the acceptor of such bills makes his appearance here, the drawer is sure very soon to follow him; such is the force of companionship. My rule has been decried, too, on the score of philanthropy. It is unkind, forsooth, to check the exercise of friendship! Far be it from me to discountenance such a virtue. If a man is able to assist a friend, let him do so to the utmost—it is almost a duty. All I object to is that he should do so at another person's expense. Nothing is so easy as to be generous by proxy. But, the honesty of this cheap munificence may be questionable. None, however, except those who have access to these Courts can have any idea of the extent to which it is carried. We have few schedules which are not defiled by these fraudulent devices, varied by their twin-frauds, surety-ships—surety-ships by paupers, who cannot themselves pay the poor dupes who trusted them. I confess, if it is admitted, and admitted it is, that there are any cases in which bail should be denied, it seems to me that these are the very cases. It is said that these bills have been occasionally met. All I know is, that the records of this Court will shew in what shoals they have been dishonoured, and, I much fear also, what misery they have occasioned. They may perhaps have been occasionally, though I believe rarely met, but in the cases before us, it is clear enough they are outstanding, else why are they in the schedule? But, my position is this, that no insolvent acceptor has any right to indulge in this experimental dishonesty. He has no right whatever to send his fraudulent missives into the world, coolly speculating in his closet whether by some happy chance they may not destroy the man who holds them. We know here from experience, that this nefarious traffic is carried to such an extent, and based on such an organization, that no ordinary caution can cope with it. Men whose appearance would baffle all suspicion—officials presenting the delusive guarantee of salaries long anticipated—regular confederacies, where each member gives and gets a character in his turn — referee conspirators bestowing every virtue under the sun, and vouchees ready at hand to coin the plausible falsehood into a share of the plunder—such is the machinery by which the most prudent shopkeeper is mystified and plundered. There is no necessity now for any honest man, in need though he be, to resort to these perilous expedients. If he be a trader, with debts not amounting to 300*l*.—or, being a non-trader, unlimited in amount — he may approach this Court at any time with his petition — obtain a protection at once, and a final order afterwards, freeing him from all personal responsibility, and this without a moment's imprisonment or any bail whatever. If a boon like this is refused, and the desperate expedient of propping up a tottering credit by this delusive and deceitful paper is preferred, I do not think the discretion of the Court should be indulgently exercised, or that there is any ground for complaint if it is not. The person thus complaining that he is not at large has given a voluntary preference to a prison. But, after all, is such a class of debtors to monopolise our sympathy? Have none else some claim on us? Are the defrauded creditors unworthy of consideration? What say we to the humble tradesman, struggling daily for his daily bread, toiling for a numerous dependent family,—paying rent and rates, and heavy taxes,—and after all his toil, and thrift, and anxiety, driven to the workhouse by this heartless system? Its spread and operation is almost incredible,—it pervades almost every grade of society. Take one class only,—those from the government and public offices, and our shelves abound in them,—young men just entering into life, with salaries sufficient to support them comfortably, lured by this fatal facility into extravagance. One clerk draws upon another, he does the same in turn; and some considerate usurer, at the modest rate of forty, fifty, and sometimes sixty per cent. furnishes them with the purchase-money of their ruin! How many instances of this have we not had. Take a worse case even than this,—that of a subordinate influenced by his superior to lend the name he has not fortitude to refuse. The cost is little; it is only a stamp spoiled. But why should I dwell upon the evil of a system which every one admits? It tempts the young, demoralises the pure, ministers to the unprincipled, and effects the ruin of industrious honesty. Toleration for such a course, or pity for those who follow it, is downright cruelty to those who deserve compassion. Feeling this deeply, I have endeavoured to devise a remedy. In that remedy my excellent colleagues do not concur; I therefore at once bow to their decision. I do so, not merely because they constitute the majority, but also from the sincere respect and regard in which I hold them both. It is all-important that there should be a uniformity of procedure in our Courts. I hope some more unexceptionable means may be devised to mitigate, if not to crush these monstrous and desolating frauds, and I indulge that hope in common with themselves. Thanks to some great and good men, and thanks also to the public press, the spirit of law reform is abroad; it is, at last, in our very neighbourhood, and I hope will not pass us by unvisited.

STARK DOUGAL'S TRUSTEES AND OTHERS v. TAY FERRY TRUSTEES AND OTHERS.

Jury trial—Opening.

In opening to the jury it is sufficient briefly t refer to the import of parole proof, but document to be given in evidence should be fully opened upon.

In this case, recently tried before the Lord Justice-Clerk and a jury, when in the course of the trial the defendant's counsel proceeded to open the case for the defendant, and was referring to certain documents proposed to be given in evidence, the Lord Justice-Clerk took an opportunity of stating that he wished these documents to be fully opened upon. His lordship observed that, in reference to parole proof proposed to be adduced, it was not necessary or proper that there should be any but a brief reference to its import in the opening for the defendant; but that in reference to documents, it was right that the plaintiff should be put in possession of the information necessary to enable him to meet the effect of these documents in his reply, and that this gave a good opportunity for determining the admissibility of documents proposed to be adduced.

The Dean of Faculty observed, that it was desirable that the views of the Court upon that matter should be known. He was the more anxious to suggest this, as an impression had gone abroad that a different rule had been laid down at a recent trial before another judge.

CAMPBELL v. CALEDONIAN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Railway company—Passenger luggage—Liability. Circumstances in which it was Held that a railway company is liable for the value of a passenger's luggage lost on their line, although such luggage was not addressed.

This was an appeal from the sheriff-court of Glasgow. The action was originally brought for the value of luggage lost by the plaintiff, Donald Campbell, when travelling on the Caledonian Railway. Proof was led for both parties, and the sheriff having found for the plaintiff, the railway company appealed.

The facts as detailed in the special findings of the interlocutor of the Court, were these:—The plaintiff arrived at the Caledonian Railway Company's station in Glasgow, on the evening of Sunday the 12th of May, 1850, and had with him a leather portmanteau and carpet bag filled with ordinary wearing apparel. He announced that he was to go to Edinburgh, and obtained his ticket for that place, to go by a train then about to start; and he informed the porter of the company, who took possession of his baggage, that it was to go to Edinburgh, and it was received accordingly in order to be sent there. The baggage, however, was not sent to Edinburgh, nor taken out of the van in which it was placed, when it became necessary, owing to the arrangements of the company, to tranfer the pursuer and his baggage, at the Carstairs junction station, from the train by which he left Glasgow to another, which was expected to arrive, by which he was to be carried to Edinburgh. The luggage was not afterwards recovered.

The LORD ORDINARY (Robertson), upon the motion of the advocators, reported the cause to the Second Division of the Court.

Baillie and The Lord Advocate appeared for the appellants (Caledonian Railway Company), and argued that the company were not responsible for the baggage. It was not directed, and the plaintiff did not look after it himself. Angell on the Law of Carriers, p. 134; Story on Bailments, ed. 1846, p. 537; Tomlins, Law Dict. voce Carrier, 3rd head.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am of opinion that judgment must be given against the appellants. While there is certainly an important principle of law involved in the case, yet I am anxious to state no point of law as to the liabilities of a railway company as to luggage of passengers, which the special facts of this case do not necessarily raise. The company undertook to carry the respondent from Glasgow to Edinburgh, and they further undertook to carry his luggage, which was lodged in a luggage van. And here, at the outset, two observations occur, which appear to me to be of importance. The first is, that whatever the servants of the company do in such circumstances must be taken as the act of the company; and the second is, that a court of law cannot split down the obligation of the company into the various duties and acts of the different servants they employ, such as station-masters, porters, and guards. Each ought to give the other the information necessary to perform the contract undertaken on the part of the company, of carrying the passenger and his luggage. Further, the change of carriage or van at Carstairs is not a fact at all in favour of the company—quite the reverse. It imposed on them greater care, and attention, and vigilance as to the arrangements required to ensure the due execution of their contract in all particulars, and required that their officers at Glasgow attending the train, and at Carstairs, should be attentive to everything necessary to ensure that the passenger and his luggage should be duly transferred at Carstairs from the carriage and van going to Carlisle, and placed on those which were to go to Edinburgh when they arrived from the south. I lay aside as being immaterial in the circumstances, the fact that the luggage of the respondent had no address. They might have insisted on one being put on. But they received the luggage as that of a passenger going to Edinburgh, and so were bound to forward it. It is proved that there is no ticket put on the luggage going to Edinburgh by that train, although the very occasion on which a ticket was most required. As a matter of fact, it is fully proved that the company undertook to carry the passenger's luggage as it was delivered to them, to Edinburgh; and that being the case, their liability in law is clear. All the authorities quoted by the company are quite inapplicable to the facts proved.

Lord MEDWYN.—It was not contended on the part of the railway that the company, on taking into their custody the luggage of a passenger travelling in a railway, and placing it in their luggage van, was not liable for the safe delivery of it at the terminus of the passenger, but it was argued, that if not bound actually to look after it himself, the passenger was bound to inquire for it, and, at all events, should have his name upon his luggage, that it might be identified. In the present case there was no name on his portmanteau and carpet bag, and he did not inquire for them at the Carstairs Junction till after the train for Carlisle was gone, when, if not taken out, it was too late. Had the pursuer inquired for it, the lost would have most probably not occurred; but this is not sufficient to justify the inference, or raise the plea, that the loss arose through his neglecting to remind the officials of the company of their duty, which, I think, as common carriers, lay upon them. When the luggage was brought to them at Glasgow it was taken possession of by their porters, and packed in the van without objection that it had no address. And I cannot find that the law of England shifts the responsibility of a carrier under such circumstances as occur here. Nothing was rested on the Carriers Act of Wm. 4, and therefore, on the whole, I am not for relieving the railway company from this loss of the pursuer's luggage, the value of which is proved in the usual way.

Lord COCKBURN.—I am of the same opinion. The facts of the case are few and simple. The mere taking the luggage, I think, implied a contract to redeliver it. The company take the man and his luggage for a particular ticket; and therefore the money, I should think, is spread over the whole concern. It applies to the luggage as well as the passenger himself. The luggage was not addressed. This was very foolish on the part of the man; but the company take it as it was. If they should advertise that they will not book luggage without being addressed, it would be a great mercy to travellers, and a wise thing for themselves. But no matter how the luggage is lost. It is lost to him; and the company are liable for it unless they shew that it was lost by his own negligence, which they have failed to do.

INSOLVENT DEBTORS COURT DUBLIN.

Reported by J. LEVY, Esq. Barrister-at-Law.

March, 1852.

Re WARD.

Rehearing evidence.

Where an application is made for a rehearing of an insolvent, on the ground that he obtained his discharge on false evidence, the Court will refuse the application if all the facts upon which the creditor who applies for the rehearing were known to him at the time of the insolvent's discharge.

Query, has the Court power to give the insolvent the costs of opposing such an application?

The 85th section of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 107 (English analogous 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 96), enacts "that the order of adjudication of an insolvent's discharge shall be final and conclusive, and shall not be reviewed by the said Court, unless the said Court shall thereafter see good and sufficient cause to believe that such adjudication has been made on false evidence, or otherwise improperly made or fraudulently obtained; in which case it shall be lawful for the said Court, upon the application of such prisoner, or of any creditor of such prisoner, to order such prisoner, upon due notice to be given, &c. to attend or to be brought up, and the said matter to be reheard before the Court or one of the Commissioners thereof." The insolvent in this matter had been heard on the 17th of January previous, and had been remanded under the discretionary clause at the suit of two creditors. On the hearing he was opposed by a third creditor named Agnew, on the ground of suppression of property. The creditor swore that he saw in his possession in the month of May 1849 bank checks and cash amounting to 1,600*l.* of which no account had been given in his schedule or balance-sheet. The insolvent was examined, and most positively swore that this statement was false, that he never had such a sum of money in his possession, and that he never shewed Agnew bank checks or cash to any amount whatever. The Court was of opinion that, considering the circumstances of the insolvent and the improbability of the story, they thought the weight of evidence was in the insolvent's favour, and that they could not act upon the statement of Agnew; and that as far as regarded his opposition, the insolvent was entitled to his discharge, but they remanded him at the suit of two other creditors under the discretionary clause.

Phillips now applied for a rehearing, upon the ground that the insolvent had obtained his discharge upon false evidence. He moved upon an affidavit made by the same Agnew, who deposed that he was taken by surprise as to the insolvent's swearing; that if a rehearing were granted, and a subpœna issued to bring up a party named M'Claverty, he would corroborate Agnew as to insolvent having the money at the time stated.

Levy opposed the application, on the ground that there was no newly-discovered evidence; and that the facts on which the creditor applied could have been proved at the first hearing in case they had existence.

Mr. Commissioner BALDWIN delivered judgment.—He thought the general rule with regard to such applications was, that they should be founded upon newly-discovered evidence, and that the evidence should have relation to property concealed by the insolvent, and subsequently discovered by the creditor. He did not say that cases might not arise where the opposing creditor was so taken by surprise as to the swearing of the insolvent, that he could not possibly be prepared to controvert it at the moment; and if the insolvent got his discharge under such circumstances, the Court ought to grant a rehearing. But the proper course would be for the creditor to ask for a postponement till he could procure his witnesses. No postponement was asked by the opposing creditor in the present case, but a postponement actually did take place, and in the interim the insolvent furnished a special balance-sheet, omitting any mention of the large sum of money sworn to have been in his possession; that was the time for the creditor to have brought up the witness who he now swore would corroborate him. The Court was of opinion that it was too late for him to do so now; it would be in effect granting a new trial, because he omitted to produce his witness in time. Agnew seemed to think that the Court was of opinion that he perjured himself; they expressed no such opinion: they only said that his story was improbable; that there was cause to doubt it, and, upon a well-known principle in the rules of evidence, they gave the benefit of the doubt to the insolvent, who stood in the character of an accused person. With regard to costs, they believed they had not power to give them; and if they had, they did not think the insolvent was entitled to them. They refused the application on the grounds, that it would be unjust in principle to grant it; that there was no evidence whatever offered to be produced that the applicant was not perfectly aware of at the time of the insolvent's discharge; and if the Court were to grant the application it might be a precedent for every disappointed creditor, who failed to make a case of opposition, to ask for a rehearing. Application refused.

March 22 and 25.

LEWIS v. HILLMAN.

Setting aside deed—Misrepresentation—Power of Sale.—Trustee Relief Act, 10 & 11 Vict. c. 96—Jurisdiction of Court of Chancery under.

A trustee acting under a deed in which is contained a power of sale, cannot be the purchaser under such power of sale.

If an attorney or agent can shew, by circumstances, that he was entitled to purchase the property as a stranger would; yet, if instead of openly purchasing, he purchased in the name of a sub-agent, the purchase will be set aside.

So, if an attorney put forward a clerk as a bonâ fide purchaser for the purpose of perfecting the title to the property sold, such a transaction will not be allowed to stand.

The appellants had, in the Court below, petitioned, under the Trustee Relief Act, 1847, to have a trust fund paid out to them; there was no cross petition, but the respondents had consented that the case should be treated as if there had been a cross petition; the Vice-Chancellor had ordered the money to be paid out to the petitioners. On appeal to the Lord Chancellor, this order on the petition was reversed, and the Lord Chancellor ordered the money to be brought back into court, and had made a declaration on the petition that the deed of sale (on which the order of the Vice-Chancellor was founded) was invalid and could not stand:

Held, that the declaration on such a petition was good in point of form.

This was an appeal against a decree of the late Lord Chancellor Cottenham, which had reversed a decree of the Vice-Chancellor of England, made on a petition presented to the Court, under the 10 & 11 Vict. c. 96, "An Act for better securing Trust Funds, and for the Relief of Trustees."

Two questions were raised on this appeal—first, whether on a petition under this statute for the payment of money secured under a deed the Court of Chancery could make a decree declaring the deed invalid; and, secondly, whether the circumstances in the case shewed that the deed was invalid. William Mitchell Bloye being entitled under the will of his uncle, Francis Bloye, to one-fifth share of the residuary estate of the testator, subject to the life interest of Robert Bloye therein, by a deed dated the 6th of April, 1840, in consideration of 600*l.* granted to Elizabeth Pratt, her executors, &c. during the joint lives of Elizabeth Pratt and three other persons therein named, and the lives and life of the survivors and survivor of them an annuity of 42*l.*; and by the same deed assigned to Elizabeth Pratt his one-fifth share under the said will with provisions for the re-purchase of the annuity, and with certain powers to Elizabeth Pratt for sale of the said reversionary interest in case of default in payment of the annuity.

Stuart and Cairns, for the appellants, contended that upon a petition under the statute of Victoria, the Lord Chancellor had no jurisdiction, as he would have had under a bill and cross bill, to declare the deed of assignment invalid. (a) But if he had such jurisdiction he had wrongly exercised it in two respects—first, as to facts; and next, as to the form. As to the facts, they contended that there was nothing to impeach the fairness of the purchase; and as to the form of the order, they insisted that if the deed could be declared invalid on petition, that declaration ought to have been accompanied, as it would have been accompanied in a proceeding by bill, with a direction for the appellants to receive back the money they had paid. No such direction had been given here, and the order therefore was bad in form as well as substance. Had a bill been filed there might have been better means of defending these appellants against the case now set up; but upon petition they could not compel the production of evidence, as they could upon a bill, and therefore they ought not to be bound by this order of the Court below.

Bethell and Rogers, for the respondents, were not called on.

The LORD CHANCELLOR thought, that in this case their lordships need not call upon the counsel on the other side. It was impossible to doubt either upon the merits of the case, or on the question of form. The merits lay in a very small compass. The property in question was one-fifth part of a reversionary interest, which ultimately came to Mrs. Hillman, as administratrix under the will of her first husband. She had married again, and at the time of these transactions was the wife of a poor and illiterate man, who was at the time confined to his bed, while she was left without the assistance of any professional adviser. She was, indeed, assisted by a clerk to an attorney, but she had no regular professional adviser. The person to whom this property had originally belonged had granted an annuity upon it. The annuity was 42*l.* a year, and the purchase-money was 600*l.* In the annuity deed there was a power of sale, and the interest, therefore, which Mrs. Hillman had in the property was in respect of that which should remain after the annuity and the expenses had been satisfied. The annuity fell into arrears, and Mrs. Woodman, the administratrix, determined to sell the property. Messrs. Overton and Hughes acted as her solicitors. They began the matter in a regular way, and as to that he (the Lord Chancellor) had no fault to find with them; but he had much fault to find with them in respect of their subsequent proceedings. Considerable costs were incurred, costs which they were not entitled to charge against Mrs. Hillman, by whom they were not employed to make the sale, but which they could charge against Mrs. Woodman, and which had the effect of lessening the balance that Mrs. Hillman would ultimately be entitled to receive. At the sale of the property, it was bought by a Mr. Barker, for a sum of 900*l.* But for an objection to the title, to make the sale, it would have been worth a much larger sum. Overton and Hughes must at an early period have had a doubt as to the title to sell the property. The sale was advertised as being made by order of Mrs. Woodman, under power of sale in the annuity deed. The annuity was enrolled under an Act which he (the Lord Chancellor) had had the satisfaction to draw, and which was calculated to secure considerable advantage to the public. That Act contained a schedule of forms of a plain and simple kind, and if these forms had been duly observed, this mass of litigation might have been spared to the parties. It was impossible to say who had made the mistake; but a great mistake had been made, for the annuity was not properly enrolled, and consequently the annuity was not as an annuity, and the power of sale it contained was not as a power of sale, and were not worth the ink with which, and the parchment upon which, they were written. Overton and Hughes soon had reason to doubt their power to sell, and they applied to Mrs. Hillman, who was not a party to the sale. They applied to her when she had no professional adviser, and got her to execute a document which was to give them her consent to the sale. (His lordship read the document.) On the face of it this document amounted to a confirmation of that invalid title on which they had put up the property to auction. After the sale they get her to make a declaration to the effect that there had been a sale for 900*l.* and then a resale for 900*l.* and that she was satisfied with what had been done, and that she acknowledged the accounts they presented to her to be correct. It was probable that such a transaction as this had never before been seen in a court of equity. At that very time the property was sold to Barker, and that sale was not rescinded; so that if Mrs. Hillman was the seller upon this resale, the first contract of sale not having been rescinded, she was left exposed to an action by Barker for breach of contract. Could there be more improper conduct? He did not wish to give pain to any one, but he was compelled to make these observations. Could anything be more improper than selling to one man whilst a previous sale to another remained unrescinded, the second sale being made as if the property was unfettered and unbound by the first? What was the meaning of this transaction? Why was this machinery brought into play? He thought he could see the reason. As a lawyer, indeed, he could not shut his eyes to it. Overton and Hughes had found from Mr. Lake, the solicitor for Mr. Barker, that the sale was void, because the deed containing the power of sale could not be enforced, and they therefore hit upon the expedient which had been the cause of all this litigation. They thought that if they could get Mrs. Hillman, an ignorant woman in poor circumstances, and without a regular professional adviser, to bring her title in aid of theirs, they would then, when the property was in their hands, hold out this attraction to Baker, and induce him to become a purchaser. They thought, if they could get the property out of Mrs. Hillman's hands, though the annuity might be void, they could make a good title to the reversionary interest. She was sent for, and asked to execute a deed, which was not read over to her. What was that deed? It was a regular deed of purchase by Lewis, who turned out to be their clerk, and who, though represented to be the purchaser, as much advanced the purchase money as did any of their lordships. They had previously cast on Mrs. Hillman the unnecessary expense of taking out probate to her husband's will, an expense wholly unnecessary, since, if the power of sale in the annuity-deed was valid, it needed no assistance from Mrs. Hillman to enable Mrs. Woodman, the annuitant, to sell. He perfectly agreed with the order which had been made in the Court below. This deed was invalid. It had been said that Mrs. Hillman had full knowledge of what was done. He had looked through these papers most carefully, and he could not find any proof that she had such knowledge as equity required that she should have, considering the situation in which she stood. She was sent for to the office of Overton and Hughes, and asked to sign a deed of which she knew nothing, and as to which she had no proper professional advice. She seems to have suspected that there was some irregularity, for she asked who was the purchaser, but Hughes answered her that "there was a difficulty about the title, though it was as good a title as could generally be got with reversionary interests, and that it was still for sale to any one who chose to give 900*l.* for it." Hughes was bound to tell her the truth; to tell her that he and his partner were the purchasers, and had become so as the mere channel to make a sale to Barker. But when Overton and Hughes had thus got rid of the difficulty as to the title, Lake said he would not look at the title. Why not? It was as good a title as any man could have as a legal title, but it was obtained from Hillman without sufficient knowledge on her part, and therefore Barker himself, had he then purchased it, would not have been safe. Their lordships had been told that Hughes laboured under difficulties in this matter, that he had not the proper means of defence, that a bill ought to have been filed, and that then he could have had proper evidence. Why did he not file a bill? It was he who presented the petition to take the fund out of Court, and he supported that petition by his own affidavit. Was he not competent to state his own case? Perfectly so; but his case would not bear stating. The case was put forward in the affidavits as one of kindness and benevolence in Overton and Hughes agreeing to take the property. With whom did they agree? Not with anybody. Two minds were essential to a contract of sale and purchase; there must not only be a buyer but a seller; here there was a buyer, but there was not a seller. The deed of sale was a scheme to get a good title to the property, so as to give validity to all the invalid acts that had before taken place. He (the Lord Chancellor) should not have thought so ill of this matter, if Overton and Hughes had fairly said to this woman, "We cannot make a good title; the objection is a valid one—take back your property;" but they sought to obtain against her a confirmation of all that had been done. The course pursued was entirely against the rules of equity. If a power of sale existed, the trustee to sell must not buy; he must have somebody to deal with some one, who was not his mere agent, in making the purchase. He should advise their lordships that in equity the clear rule was, that if an attorney or agent could shew he was entitled to purchase, yet if instead of openly purchasing he purchased in the name of an agent, such a purchase could not stand for a single moment. Such transactions to stand must be open and free from all concealment. If an attorney put forward a clerk, not as a clerk, but as a bonâ fide purchaser, the moment that fact was stated the deed became valueless, and the courts would hold all the parties to such a transaction responsible. He then came to the other part of the case,—namely, that which related to the jurisdiction upon petition. On that he felt no doubt whatever. The appellants here had petitioned to have the fund paid out to them—there was no cross petition, but the respondents had consented that the case should be treated as if there was a cross petition; and the Vice-Chancellor, who was made to believe that this was a real transaction of sale, had ordered the money to be paid to the appellants. Lord Chancellor Cottenham had, on appeal, reversed that decision, and had ordered the money to be brought back into court, and had then declared, and properly declared, that the deed of sale was invalid, and could not stand. On that there was no judge in equity who ought to entertain a doubt. Lord Cottenham had then reserved, as to the question of interest, liberty to the parties to make any further application they might think fit. As to the jurisdiction to do this on petition he would only add that, though true it was that the statute reserved to the Court the power to direct a bill to be filed, if necessary, the existence of such power was discretionary in the Court, and without such bill the Court might proceed as it had done

(a) 10 & 11 Vict. c. 96, s. 2. And be it enacted, that such orders as shall seem fit shall be from time to time made by the High Court of Chancery in respect of the trust moneys, stocks, or securities so paid in, transferred, and deposited as aforesaid, and for the investment and payment of any such moneys or of any dividends or interest on any such stocks or securities, and for the transfer and delivery out of any such stocks and securities, and for the administration of any such trusts generally, upon a petition to be presented in a summary way to the Lord Chancellor or the Master of the Rolls, without bill, by such party or parties as to the Court shall appear to be competent and necessary in that behalf, and service of such petition shall be made upon such person or persons as the Court shall see fit and direct; and every order made upon any such petition shall have the same authority and effect, and shall be enforced and subject to re-hearing and appeal in the same manner as if the same had been made in a suit regularly instituted in the court; and if it shall appear that any such trust funds cannot be safely distributed without the institution of one or more suit or suits, the Lord Chancellor or Master of the Rolls may direct any such suit or suits to be instituted.

here. On the whole, he proposed to vary Lord Cottenham's order, by requiring the appellants to pay 4 per cent. interest on the money while it remained in their hands under the Vice-Chancellor's order, and he proposed to affirm the order so far as it declared the deed of sale invalid; but to add that the purchase-money was to be repaid with interest, and that from the charges of Overton and Hughes, settled at the time of this purchase, the sum of 10*l.* should be deducted as an amount of expense unnecessarily incurred.

Subject to the alterations pointed out: the order of the Lord Chancellor affirmed; appeal dismissed with costs.

Equity Courts.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S COURT.

Reported by OWEN DAVIES TUDOR, Esq. of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law.

(Before Lord TRURO.)

Nov. 3 and 19, 1851, and Feb. 12, 1852.

ZULUETA v. VINENT.

Principal and agent—Constructive fraud.

A and Co. induced B. to make advances for the purpose of working some mines abroad, belonging to C. the produce of which was to be remitted to A. and Co. as consignees, who were to account to B. for the proceeds:

Held, that A. and Co. could not set up an antecedent title to the proceeds of the consignment.

Where a man induces another to place himself in a particular position, upon condition that when he has so placed himself in that position he will conduct himself in a given manner towards him, he cannot reject the condition without the concurrence of the other party, or set up any right which is inconsistent with it.

The question in this case was whether the plaintiffs, who were merchants in London, were entitled to an injunction to restrain the defendant, Antonio Vinent, a merchant in the island of Cuba, from prosecuting an action commenced by him against the plaintiffs, so far as such action related to the recovery of the proceeds of the cargoes of two vessels, called the Golconda and the Goldsmidt, consigned by Vinent to the plaintiffs, and consisting of the copper ore raised from a certain mine called the San José Mine, in the same island of Cuba.

The pleadings were very lengthy, and the transactions to which they related were involved in great complexity and obscurity. But on the question of the right to the injunction, the only material facts necessary to be stated in order to understand the details in the Lord Chancellor's judgment, are the following.

In and previously to the year 1846, José de Onate, Julian de Onate, Cipriano Casamadrid, and Miguel Estoreh, were the owners of the San José Mine, but in what proportions, or whether as partners or as tenants in common, or otherwise, without priority, it was unnecessary to be determined. Estoreh afterwards sold his interest to José Bonastra, José de Onate, Julian de Onate, and, subsequently, Cipriano Casamadrid employed Enrique Casamayor, a merchant in Cuba, as their reffaccionista of the mine, whose business, according to a statement inserted in the amended bill, was to advance such sums of money as might from time to time be required for the working of the mine, or, in other words, to raise the ore at his own expense, and then to sell and dispose of it at his discretion, and out of the proceeds to retain a certain commission to himself, and to repay himself the amount with interest thereon, and also such sums of money as he might advance to the owners employing him, and to account for the surplus proceeds to such owner.

The bills of lading of the cargoes of the ore were made out in the name of Casamayor, and he consigned the cargoes to the plaintiffs as factors or agents in this country to dispose of the cargoes, and he drew bills of exchange upon them in respect of the proceeds of the sale of these cargoes.

Upon the account between him, Casamayor and the plaintiffs, as such factors or agents, a large balance became due to the plaintiffs from the mine, or from him as such reffaccionista. Casamayor became bankrupt in March 1848, a large balance being at that time due to the plaintiffs in respect of the bills which they had paid, drawn by him and on account also of supplies sent out to the mine.

Between that time, that is, the date of Casamayor's bankruptcy and the month of August, in the same year, the mine was managed by the owners and a person of the name of De Toledo, into the particulars of which management it is not material to enter. On the 5th of October, in that year, the defendant, Vinent, sent a bill of lading of goods shipped on board the ship Golconda, to the plaintiffs, which ship arrived, and the goods were delivered to the plaintiffs in the following months of November and December.

On the 3rd of January, 1849, the defendant also sent to plaintiffs a bill of lading of ores raised from the mine, and which had been shipped on board the Sir I. L. Goldsmidt, which vessel arrived in England in the following month of April, when the goods were delivered to the plaintiffs, and subsequently sold by them, and they received the proceeds.

The defendant commenced an action against the plaintiffs for the amount of the proceeds of such two cargoes, and also for the balance of an account current between them, and thereupon the plaintiffs instituted the present suit to restrain Vinent from prosecuting such action, so far as related to the proceeds of such two cargoes.

The plaintiffs claimed a right to apply the proceeds of the cargoes, in satisfaction of the balance owing to them from Casamayor, or the owners of the mine, on the following grounds:—In their amended bill they state according to the laws in force in the island of Cuba, the reffaccionista for the time being of any mine or share of a mine was entitled, by virtue of his office, to a lien on the mine, or a share of the mine, and its produce as a security for the money which he might advance for the purpose of working the mine, or otherwise, for the use of the parties to whom he acted as reffaccionista, and he was also entitled and authorised to hypothecate or pledge to a third person the said mine or shares of the mine, and its future produce as a security for any money which such third party might have advanced to him in his character of reffaccionista for the purpose of working the mine; that the mines in Cuba were generally worked by foreign capital, which was most commonly advanced by English houses; that by virtue of the laws of Cuba, and by the custom of trade in the island, where a foreign merchant advanced money to any proprietor or reffaccionista of any mine for the purpose of enabling him to work the mine, such foreign merchant acquired by such advance a lien upon the said mine and its future proceeds to the extent of the money so advanced in the same manner as if the mine and its proceeds were expressly hypothecated or pledged to him by the proprietor or reffaccionista thereof, and that, in fact, such foreign merchant was entitled to stand in the place of the proprietor or reffaccionista, and to hold the mine and its proceeds in pledge until the amount of his advance was repaid to him. That the plaintiffs in all their dealings with Casamayor fully relied on the aforesaid law of Cuba and custom of foreign trade, and the plaintiffs, in accepting and paying his bills, did not at all recognise him as a principal, nor looked to his personal or individual security. And the plaintiffs charged that he advanced as reffaccionista; that his advances as reffaccionista to the owners of the mine were, for the most part, made with the plaintiffs' money, and that the plaintiffs thereby acquired a lien on the mine and its produce to the extent of their advances, and were to that extent entitled to stand in the place of Casamayor as the first creditors and incumbrancers upon the mine, and that long before the cargoes of the Golconda and the Goldsmidt were placed at the disposal of the plaintiffs by Vinent he was aware that there was a large balance due to the plaintiffs from Casamayor as reffaccionista. Various proceedings had taken place in the cause, but it is sufficient to state that after an answer had been put in to the original bill, the late Master of the Rolls refused an injunction on the merits. The plaintiffs then amended their bill, and thereupon, before the defendant answered the amendments, the plaintiffs applied again for an injunction to the present Master of the Rolls, who refused the application, on the ground that he was absolutely bound by the decree of his predecessor, Lord Langdale, except so far as the case was varied by the amendments, and that he did not consider the amendments varied the case made by the original bill sufficiently to entitle the plaintiffs to an injunction, and in consequence of that order the application was made to the Lord Chancellor for the injunction which was so refused by the Court below. Two notices of motion were given by the plaintiffs, one for an injunction to stay proceedings at law until the answer to the amended bill should be put in; the other, that the injunction, if obtained, might be extended to stay trial.

Roupell in reply.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, after stating the preliminary facts which have been before given, delivered judgment as follows:—Numerous questions have been raised in the pleadings and at the bar, which I think it is not necessary for me to determine. I think it is unnecessary for me to determine whether the plaintiffs are or are not precluded from having an injunction in the cause on the case made by the amended bill, on the ground that they ought to have inserted the matter in the original bill. Nor whether Casamayor was a mere agent of the mine owners, or was a principal; nor whether the rights of a reffaccionista and of a foreign merchant are or are not such as the amended bill states; nor whether the plaintiff did not acquire such a lien as the bill charges; nor whether the new company called the San José Mining Company were entitled, as against the plaintiffs, to transfer the cargoes to Vinent; nor whether the mine did or did not continue to be subject to the debts of the former owners; nor whether Vinent, as a shareholder in, and as president of the new company or otherwise, had or had not notice of those debts; nor whether the cargoes in question were procured with the moneys supplied by the plaintiffs, or with the money supplied by Vinent; nor whether the law of Spanish mines is, that persons who furnish the means of working a mine have precedence over prior creditors. It appears to me that the merits of the present application depend upon grounds and considerations altogether independent of the numerous and complicated questions to which I have referred, and the grounds of my determination will be the relation between the plaintiffs and the defendant, in respect of the cargoes in question, as created by the direct correspondence between them, and the contract which results from that correspondence. The transactions between the plaintiffs and the defendant commenced in the beginning of the year 1847, by the defendant consigning to the plaintiffs, a cargo of copper ore for sale on his account. After the connection commenced, other commercial transactions of the same character I have referred to, took place between them of the nature of principal and factor, or principal and agent, the plaintiffs selling the cargoes consigned to them by Mr. Vinent drawing upon the plaintiffs in respect of the proceeds of the cargoes in their hands, and it will appear incidentally that account which was originally opened between the parties connected itself with the San José Mine. The relation between these parties as well in reference to the defendant's other transactions with the plaintiffs, as in connection with the proceeds of the cargoes in question, is to be ascertained from the answer of the defendant, and from the correspondence which is set forth in it. Among the letters is one from the plaintiffs to the defendants of the 1st of February, 1847, which is a letter of introduction by Pezuela of the defendant Vinent. It opened a connection as to commercial transactions between these parties; and by that letter and letters of the 1st of March, 1847, the 1st of May, 1847, and the 31st of May, 1847, it will appear that that connection consisted in consignments of copper and other goods, as before mentioned, by Vinent to the plaintiffs, as factors or agents, and the plaintiffs accounting to him for the proceeds, which proceeds he obtained by drawing bills upon them. There is also a letter of the 16th of March, 1849. I have stated the general contents of these letters, I think, sufficiently for the purposes of this case, inasmuch as these letters, in the early introduction, do not touch the question, and are only necessary to be adverted to in order to explain the origin of the connection between the parties. There is also a letter dated the 1st of March, 1849, which I refer to rather out of order, which is material, although it is a letter not written until after the transaction may be considered as terminated, that is to say, after both the cargoes had arrived of the Golconda and Goldsmidt, and the produce received by the plaintiffs, and probably sold by them. The rights of the parties must at that time have been determined. The letter, however, is material as affording some explanation in relation to what the previous transactions between the parties had been. It must be remembered, that the bill of lading of the Golconda was sent on the 5th of October, 1848, and the bill of lading of the Sir I. L. Goldsmidt was sent on the 6th of January, 1849. The letter is a very long one. It is in answer to a letter from the defendant Vinent to the plaintiffs, in which Vinent informs the plaintiffs that Pezuela had repudiated the debt, and had insisted that the debt was due from Casamayor, and not the mine nor the proprietors of the mine were responsible for the debt, nor the new company. It travels into those former matters, and then in reference to the bills of lading which had been remitted by Vinent, the letter of the plaintiffs themselves says: "You forwarded the bills of lading to us on your own account, and not on account of the mine, and it was evident that we could not treat with any one but yourself, whatever might be the real interest which the shareholders of the mine still preserved therein." That is a statement after all these transactions have occurred of the plaintiffs' views, and the understanding with which the bills of lading which the defendant had remitted to them had been so remitted, and it therefore seems to me to be material to be referred to at this moment. There are also two letters, dated the 14th of April, and the 18th of April, which are also pretty much to the same effect, as likewise the letters of the plaintiffs to Pezuela dated the 30th of November, 1848, where the plaintiffs are reasoning with Pezuela on the injustice of the repudiation of their demand by the new company. That is also material as giving the plaintiffs' views of the [illegible] of the transaction as between the plaintiffs [illegible] the defendant as contra-distinguished in the course of transactions carried on between Casamayor and the plaintiffs. [illegible] says in this letter:—"I cannot believe that it escaped your knowledge and information, so as not to be aware of the great difference there is between the mode in which we have understood matters with Casamayor, and that which we observed pre-forwarded to us by the shippers drawn or endorsed in their favour, so that the ownership was theirs, they drew against the same, and therefore they had a right to the surpluses under the obligation of paying the deficiencies as it unfortunately happened with Mr. Vinent. If the bills of lading that Mr. Vinent forwarded to us after the failure of Casamayor had not been endorsed in his favour, if they had come in the same manner as Casamayor sent his, which is what constitutes all the difference we might and ought to have demanded of them the amount of our credit. However, it never occurred to us to bring into question the principles of justice and of universal mercantile law, because, for our part, interest never induces us to swerve from what we recognise as just." Now, the relation between the parties is to be collected, not simply from the letters written by the plaintiffs to the defendant which I have read, but also from the statement in the original bill, which statement is set forth in the answer so far as it is material, and the way in which the plaintiffs in the original bill state their case is this:—"And your orators being such correspondents of the said last-named defendant as aforesaid, a certain contract, arrangement, and agreement was come to and entered into between your orators and the said last-named defendant in the promises, to the purport and effect following: namely,—it was contracted, stipulated, and agreed between your orators and the said last-named defendant, he, the same defendant, having such right as aforesaid, that he, the said defendant, Antonio Vinent, should and would ship and consign to this country to your orators all the copper ores and produce of the said mines and works for the purpose of, and that the same ores and produce should be sold by, your orators in this country for and on behalf and on the account of him, the said defendant, Antonio Vinent, and that your orators should receive the moneys to arise from the sale of such ores and produce, and apply the same to the credit or on account of him, the said defendant, Antonio Vinent." That is the statement in the original bill of the terms on which, and the understanding on which, the bills of lading were forwarded by Vinent to the plaintiffs. Now, up to the year 1848, the consignments of proceeds from that time have yielded a surplus, after satisfying the plaintiffs' claims in respect of the bills drawn, and by Casamayor's orders such surplus was occasionally transferred to the credit of the defendant in his private account with the plaintiffs. Casamayor failed in 1848. At that time it became uncertain how the operations at the San José Mine would be carried on, from whence funds would be obtained by which to work the mine, or how the proceeds were to be disposed of. It appears at that time the plaintiffs had chartered certain vessels to proceed to Cuba, in the expectation of being there loaded by the produce obtained from the San José Mine. The plaintiffs became alarmed in consequence of Casamayor's stoppage, and the uncertain state in which the mine then was. The owners themselves interfering in the management, and conducting the affairs there with Toledo, whom they had appointed their agent or accountant, it does not appear what was the character to which he was particularly appointed. It appeared uncertain whether the ships which they had sent out would be loaded, and if they were not loaded, they would return in ballast, and the plaintiffs would be obliged to pay dead freight. In consequence of that apprehension, the plaintiffs wrote to Vinent, and a correspondence then arose between the parties, which appears to me to govern the rights of the parties in respect to the transactions involved in this case. In going through the voluminous correspondence, it will be seen that the letters are not always consistent, and there are expressions used so ambiguous as to make it difficult to understand precisely the sense in which they were written, but I still think enough remains to render the real character of the transaction perfectly intelligible. The ambiguity that I have mentioned probably arises from the translation, and the enormous difficulty in rendering precisely and particularly the technical terms used applicable to the particular course of trade from one language to the other. The letter, which it is material to begin with, is dated the 16th of August, 1848. I may briefly state what was the situation of the parties at that time. There was a large debt due to the plaintiffs from the mine. Casamayor had stopped payment. De Onate, Casamadrid, and the other owners, getting on as well as they could, appoint Toledo to perform certain duties in respect of the mine; and upon the 16th day of August, 1848, the plaintiffs wrote thus:—"The precarious state of the San José Mine, which you point out to us yourself by your doubts respecting the future progress thereof, leads us to apprehend that some case may occur to put a stop to the exportation of the ores, which would involve us in serious difficulty with the chartered vessels. If such should be the case, we request you will interpose for the purpose of adopting some measure to facilitate the despatch of vessels, by acting as circumstances may require: as you are on the spot, this great inconvenience may be obviated through your experience and influence; we make the same remark to Messrs. Brooks and Co. in order that they may co-operate with you in meeting our wish, and we doubt not you will both do whatever is possible to that effect. What seems to us the most to be dreaded is, lest the want of funds should stop the works. If this should be the cause of the stoppage, you might obviate it by advancing the necessary amount for the shipment of the ore that might be prepared or in greater forwardness, and you could take the requisite securities, so that the ore should be entirely at your disposal; and then, on your responsibility, we have no objection to your anticipating the drafts upon any cargo or cargoes which may be in a course of despatch." What I understand by that is this, "We have no objection to your anticipating the drafts, to your drawing money on the drafts before their acceptance;" and the passage is material, when it says, "You might obviate it by advancing the necessary amount for the shipment of the ore that might be prepared or in greater forwardness, and you could take the requisite securities; so that the ore should be entirely at your disposal, and then, on your responsibility, we have no objection to your anticipating the drafts upon any cargo or cargoes which may be in a course of despatch." That is, "Your being liable to repay us in case that which you shall send to us shall not produce sufficient for that purpose." "As you are at the seat of operations, you are able to take securities and precautions which we could not devise here." That is to say, "You must act on your own responsibility, because we have not the same means of providing for our security here that you have while on the spot,"—such I understand to be the effect of that letter. The next letter material to be adverted to is the 5th of September, 1848. Now this, I must observe, opens a new series of transactions, and we will just [illegible] how it proceeds on the 30th of September, 1848; there is also an intermediate letter which the plaintiff wrote to the defendant, a letter of the 31st of August, in which he says, "We are apprised of the advances that you have made on the last cargoes, the proceeds of which we have already stated to you, on which you must make your calculation, excepting the Matilda, with which a trial has not yet been made, but she will not cover the [illegible]l. 10*s.* per ton for the shipment. We can have no difficulty in deducting here your commission of 3 per cent. on the gross amounts of the sales, and to pay the same to you whenever you forward us the competent order; but in that case, this 3 per cent. which to you will be equivalent to 5 or 6 per cent. on the net proceeds, must necessarily be considered in the advances so as to diminish the latter, for in the contrary event you will find deficiencies, as there were in the last cargo of Casamayor, and if we have to honour to their full amount the bill which you draw for the advances, the loss would fall upon yourself, as you would be uncovered with the mines, as we ourselves are from the same course." Now, it is not very easy to understand the precise effect of that letter; there is an answer to that, in which the defendant says, "No, do not you deduct my commission, I will deduct my commission here, and add that to what is due to me, and get paid when God pleases." That is something like the expression he uses. Now, what I understand to be the meaning of that is this, that Mr. Vinent being on the spot in connection with the mine making advances, attending to the shipments, consigning to the plaintiffs, and attending to the accounts,—and for all that business he intended to charge a commission of 3 per cent. on the net proceeds, which is said to be equal to 5 per cent. on the gross proceeds. Then, he says, "Do not you deduct that [illegible] you out of the proceeds that come to your hands, [illegible] will manage that myself here in my connection with the mines;" and nothing further is said about that; that is one of the letters as to which there is some ambiguity. Now, there is a letter of the 30th September; the defendant had written a letter to the plaintiff which is not set out, but only referred to in the answer, and it appears by that letter that the defendant had drawn on the plaintiffs in respect of, I think, either the cargo of the Golconda or of some other vessel. He says in this letter, "Toledo has not drawn on you, notwithstanding we have authorised him so to do." In this the defendants say "Toledo has delivered the bill of lading to you, but he has not drawn on you, notwithstanding the authority that we gave him to draw. You observe that Mr. Toledo delivered his bill of lading to you, notwithstanding the authority that we gave him to draw. In this there is a mistake, because we have given no special or particular authority in this matter—we merely stated to him and to Mr. De Onate, as well as to you, the amounts to which it was necessary to limit the advances in proportion to the actual prices. In such a situation, when we are left uncovered for 5,000*l.* in an indefinite manner, it becomes an imperative necessity for us to appoint an attorney in your country to watch our interests. We should have had much satisfaction in requesting this favour of you, but on considering that you are also compromised in the matter as creditor in various ways, your interference is not admissible for us, and we have decided upon forwarding our procuration as we do to Messrs. Brooks and Company." Then they write on the 30th of September, "Knowing that Mr. Pezuela has considerable interest in the mine if the works can be continued, for which perhaps that which is most wanted is a good facultative direction, it appears to us probable that you will continue to receive the ores, making the advances; we shall be glad if it be so, for we think it would be most convenient for all parties." That is, that Vinent should receive the ore and make the advances. Then comes a letter of the 5th of October, and by that letter of 5th of October, it appears that the defendant sent the bill of lading of the cargo of the Golconda to the plaintiffs, "I now enclose you also bill of lading of 491 tons of ore which I have shipped on board the English ship, Golconda, Captain Oliver, consigned to you, namely, 156 tons of rock, and 435 sand ore, total 591 tons, and will be obliged to you on its arrival at Swansea to have the goodness to direct that the said ore be received, and the sale thereof be proceeded to, placing the net proceeds to the credit of my account." Then he goes on upon other matters as to rates and prices and so on, which do not bear immediately upon any question now in this suit. Then with regard to the commission I before mentioned, he says,—"With regard to what I observed to you in mine of the 19th of July about my commission, I beg you will not be surprised that I shall charge it here in my liquidation with the partners in the San José Mine in order to recover it jointly with the deficits when it pleases God." So that here it appears that by the letter which I first read, in September the plaintiffs tell the defendant it will be very agreeable to them if the defendant will make the advances, and get the ore at his disposal and consign it to them, and then accordingly on the 5th of October the defendant sends to the plaintiffs the bill of lading, with directions to sell the goods referred to in that bill of lading and to place the proceeds to his credit, and accordingly the plaintiffs receive the bill of lading, possess themselves of the cargo, and have received the proceeds. The answer to this letter is on the 15th of November. "We are in possession of the bill of lading which you transmitted us of 591 tons of ore shipped per Golconda, which vessel has not yet appeared; enclosed is account, sale of the cargo of the Matilda, for the net proceeds whereof being 2,555*l.* 5s. 9d. we credit your account per 7th of December next. As we told you at the time it does not suffice to cover 5*l.* per ton shipped." That is the acknowledgment of the receipt of the bills of lading, which bill of lading is accompanied by the letter directing the proceeds to be applied to the defendant's account. No repudiation of the transaction, but an apparent acquiescence by receiving the bill of lading, and receiving it in the manner I have stated. Now, in the letter of the 30th of November, "We wrote to you last on the 15th instant. We have the pleasure to acknowledge receipt of your favour of the 10th ultimo. The calculation which you forwarded us of the state of your account is substantially correct, for you were not aware of the differences that exist. We have drawn up the annexed statement, from which on comparing your calculation with our books, there appears at present in your favour, the sum of 3,750*l.* 18s. 11d. supposing, as we have entered the same, for conformity sake, that you are credited for the advances to the ships Sarepta and Golconda, noted in red ink, at the same amount as you have noted them. At the end of the year we shall make up the balance in the usual manner, and forward you extract of the account current. It is to be regretted that the Golconda, which has just arrived, cannot liquidate before the end of January. The drafts of which you advise us will be punctually honoured." So that here, after the receipts of the bills of lading of the Golconda and the advice of certain bills being drawn, the plaintiffs write thus:—"The drafts of which you advise us will be punctually honoured." Such is the correspondence previous to the arrival of the ship Golconda. Now, it will be proper to consider what is the effect of this correspondence, and what is the contract and understanding to be inferred as between these parties from that correspondence; and before I deal with that, I will refer to the correspondence of the same description with regard to the Goldsmidt. On the 1st of January, 1849, the bill of lading is sent of the ore put on board the Goldsmidt. In that bill of lading Vinent is described as the shipper; that is the description in the bill of lading, and it is upon the 3rd of January, 1849, that the bill of lading is sent by Vinent to the plaintiffs. The effect of that letter is the same as the letter with reference to the Golconda, that he desires it to be sold, and the produce to be applied to his account; and further than that he goes on to say,—"I have also drawn three bills for 700*l*., 700*l*. and 700*l*. odd, making together about 2,100*l*." He says, "I have drawn these three bills to be applied to the proceeds of the cargo of the Goldsmidt," and in the same letter he advised as to certain bills drawn in respect of them. Now, in another part of the answer is the acknowledgment of the receipt of the bill of lading. "By the packet which arrived on the 26th, we received your favour of the 19th of December, in which you announced to us the shipment by the Sir I. L. Goldsmidt, and order us to effect the insurance, to execute which we have had to struggle with the difficulty of the period of the year." Then there is a long paragraph about the premium, and the season of the year, and so on. Here, again, it will be observed that there is an acknowledgment of the order to affect the insurance, on account of the plaintiffs, and to debit them with the premium; and in the bill is set forth the letter which acknowledges the receipt of the bill of lading:—"We have received your favour of the 3rd ultimo, together with the bill of lading of the Sir Isaac Lyon Goldsmidt of the 428 tons of ore shipped by the company of the San José Mine to their order, and endorsed to you by Mr. Ruiz Toledo, as mercantile director of said company, from which we infer that that gentleman is the agent of those who, under the title of New Company, take upon themselves to dispose freely of the property, setting aside legitimate creditors. You advise us of having drawn upon us at ninety days' sight, applicable to this cargo, 720*l*. and 732*l*. 10s. 9d. total, 2,182*l*. 10s. 9d. order of Messrs. Antonio Viental and Company, and you also advise us," and then this letter travels into the merits of the question of how far it was competent to the new company to repudiate the debt which the plaintiffs claimed to be owing to them as a debt from the mine during the time of Casamayor, and they argue their own. Towards the latter part of the letter is the acknowledgment of the receipt of the bill of lading. With respect to the cargo of the Sir I. L. Goldsmidt, there is therefore this distinction. As to the Golconda, after the arrival of the ship, with the direction to account, the defendants write an answer, in which they in no respect repudiate any of the terms which were contained in the defendant's letter. With respect to the Sir I. L. Goldsmidt, the announcement of the intention to consign is acknowledged, and the insurance effected according to orders, but the bill of lading and the vessel do not arrive until after the repudiation by the new company of the debt claimed to be owing and to be a charge against the mine. The plaintiffs, in their answer to that letter acknowledging the receipt of the bill of lading of the Sir I. L. Goldsmidt, intimate that they shall claim to retain the proceeds of that cargo for their own benefit in liquidation of their demand, and the question will be, under what circumstances were the bills of lading forwarded to them; because, if the previous correspondence which had induced the defendant to remit that bill of lading had so induced him to remit it upon an understanding created and justly to be inferred from the plaintiffs' correspondence that the plaintiffs would account to him for the proceeds, it would not be competent to them to obtain possession of the cargo upon such an understanding, and when they have done so, then to set up a different right and to repudiate that understanding. Now, the question is, what is the result of the correspondence which I have just read? In the answer the defendant distinctly states the various sums that he had advanced to the company in order to obtain possession of these goods, and he states that, independently of other advances, he had advanced 17,000 dollars at one time and 14,000 dollars at another, and he expressly swears in the passages to which I have referred, that he had made those advances, and that in consequence of those advances he had made, the goods were shipped either by him, the bills of lading being forwarded as a sort of policy, or shipped by Toledo on behalf of the company, and the bills of lading endorsed to him, which would make no difference, as it strikes me, with regard to the defendant's interest. Now, then, what is the just result of this correspondence? It seems to me that the plaintiffs found themselves in this situation: they had a large debt due to them—they had chartered vessels, for the freight of which they would become liable—they were uncertain whether the goods would be loaded or not,—they were uncertain not only whether they would ever recover the debt which was due to them, but also whether they would continue to be the consignees of the produce of the mines, an employment no doubt of importance to them in respect of the ordinary commercial position which they held derived out of that employment. I think it is plain that the plaintiffs were not disposed to advance any further sums of money on the responsibility of what I will call the mine of the owners of the mine, but they were content to advance on the responsibility of Vinent, the defendant, and they therefore suggest to him that if he shall find it to his advantage to enter into an arrangement with those who had the control of the mine by which he should make the necessary advances and secure to himself the control of the proceeds in consequence of making those advances, and would send those proceeds to the plaintiffs, that they would account to him for them, and would accept the bills to be drawn by him upon them, and that they would authorise him to act in what they call anticipation of the drafts, that is, to make advances upon them before they could be actually accepted, in order that he might not be placed in the situation of having made advances to those who had the control of the mine on the faith of bills drawn on the plaintiffs, and then find those bills dishonoured, and therefore be uncovered for those advances. The language of the letters appears to me sufficiently plain, and the question is whether the defendant was induced by the plaintiffs to make advances for the purpose I have mentioned of the mine, in order that he might obtain the possession and control of the ores with the view that they might be consigned to the plaintiffs upon the express terms of the plaintiffs accounting to him for the proceeds. If the defendant did, upon such inducement, make such advances, and consign the ores to the plaintiffs, so obtained upon the faith of the plaintiffs accounting to him, can the plaintiffs now dispute the defendant's title to the proceeds on the ground of rights which might have vested independently of that correspondence and contract arising out of it? Is it not obvious that the defendant would have been greatly misled in having made those advances if the plaintiffs were now at liberty to repudiate the express statements in their letters that they would place the proceeds to his credit and were to resort to antecedent rights which might have been independently of any control or modification of those rights or rejection or repudiation of those rights arising out of the contract? I think it is plain that he would. By what the defendant has done the plaintiffs certainly appear to have escaped the probability of having a large sum to pay by way of dead freight, and they also got the profitable employment from those particular consignments, and which profitable employment appears likely to have continued except for the repudiation on the part of the plaintiffs of their liability to account to the defendant for the two cargoes of ore that have been received. Now I take it to be perfectly clear, that if one man induces another to place himself in a particular position, on the faith that when he has so placed himself in that position he will conduct himself in a given manner towards him; where the party has acted on that contract, he cannot reject the condition without the concurrence of the other party, and set up any right which is inconsistent with that understanding. There are numerous authorities to that effect at law, and I should say the principles of equity are still stronger than at law; but it is sufficient for all legal purposes at law that the individual cannot, as I before said, induce another to place himself in a certain situation and then set up rights antecedent to the understanding upon which the individual was so induced to place himself at the peril of some responsibility in that situation. There is a case of Dixon v. Hamond, 2 Barn. & Ald. 310, of considerable importance with regard to the principles involved in it, which are applicable to this case. In that case one Flowerden mortgaged a ship to an individual of the name of Hart; and Hamond, the defendant in the cause, became ultimately the mortgagee of that ship. The same Flowerden, the owner of the vessel, directed Hamond to effect an insurance on the ship, Hamond being the legal owner of the vessel in respect of his mortgage. The vessel was lost at sea, and Hamond received the insurance from the underwriters, on which the assignees of one Davidson, the partner of Flowerden, and who had survived Flowerden, brought an action to recover the amount of that insurance. Hamond said this was the insurance of the mortgaged vessel; "I am the legal owner of the vessel in respect of the debt which Flowerden, the partner of Davidson, had contracted to me. This insurance was expressly obtained from the underwriters as an indemnity to me for the vessel. I am the owner. I am entitled to recover this money." But the Court said—No; it makes no difference whether you are the owner of the vessel or any body else; if you affected this policy by order Flowerden and Davidson, to cover their interest in the ship, you have received the money from the underwriters on that ground, the money is received to their use, and you can no more control or resist their rights on the foundation of your being the owner of the vessel, than as if somebody else had been the owner of the vessel. The principles in that I take to be applicable to this case in its present view. Now Vinent appears, at the request of the plaintiffs, to have advanced his money for the purpose of his obtaining the control and possession of the ores to load the ships with, sent out by the plaintiffs for the purpose of receiving the ores, and consigning those goods to them, but upon the distinct understanding that no matter to whom the ores belonged, no matter who would ultimately be entitled to the proceeds, on the condition that Vinent so advancing, and consigning to the plaintiffs, that the plaintiffs would account to him. If such be the just result, and the legal result of the correspondence that I have mentioned, then I say it is not competent to the plaintiffs to repudiate that contract by reason of any rights which might have existed previous to this, and which they might have enforced, if they had not affected those rights by the correspondence. I think that the defendant made the advances sworn to in the answer with the concurrence of the plaintiffs, and for the purpose of obtaining possession of the ores, upon an understanding between the plaintiffs and the defendant, or agreement. What I mean by understanding in this case is that the plaintiffs would account to the defendant for the proceeds of such ores as the defendant ought to consign to the plaintiffs. I think that the cargoes in question were consigned and received by the plaintiffs under that agreement, and that it is not open to the plaintiffs to dispute the defendant's title to the proceeds of such cargoes. Under these circumstances, it is unnecessary to consider the numerous other points made on the part of the plaintiffs, because assuming them all to be decided in the plaintiffs' favour, such decision can have no effect to impeach the defendant's right under the express agreement, with reference to which it appears to me the ores have been consigned to the plaintiffs. It seems to me, therefore, that there is no equitable ground whatever which can impede the defendant's right to proceed at law, if he can make out his case there to recover the proceeds of these two cargoes. It is for that only that the present injunction has been applied for, and I think the application must be refused with costs.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

Monday, March 29.

THE SUTTON HARBOUR IMPROVEMENT COMPANY v. HITCHENS.

Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, sec. 68—Plaintiff dismissing bill without costs.

A lessee of a warehouse adjoining some works of an incorporated company carried on under the powers of an Act, wherein the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act were incorporated, claimed compensation under the 68th section of the latter Act for damages to his property, "injuriously affected," as he alleged, by the works of the company, or that the damages should be ascertained by arbitration. A bill being filed to restrain proceedings under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, the Court of Appeal dissolved an injunction granted by the Master of the Rolls on the authority of The London and North-Western Railway Company v. Smith, since overruled. A notice of motion was thereupon given by the defendant before the Master of the Rolls to dismiss the bill with costs, and afterwards notice of a cross-motion was given by the plaintiff to dismiss the bill without costs, and, on the hearing of the motions, no order was made on the former, and the latter was dismissed without costs:

Held, varying the decision of the Court below, the cause being treated, by consent, as if it had come regularly to a hearing, that the defendant ought to have had his costs of his motion to dismiss, and that as the plaintiffs were justified in filing their bill by the authority of The London and North-Western Railway Company v. Smith, their bill ought to be dismissed without costs, but leave was given to the defendant to apply as to costs if he succeeded in obtaining compensation.

In this case the Sutton Harbour Improvement Company, under the provisions of their Act, whereof the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, were made part, in the course of their works, made a coffer dam, which temporarily prevented ships from coming so near to the warehouses adjoining the harbour as they had previously done; whereupon a lessee of one of the warehouses, under the 68th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, none of whose property was required for the purposes of the company, but it being, as he alleged, in the words of the Act, "injuriously affected by the works," claimed compensation to the amount of 65*l*. or to have the damage ascertained by arbitration. The company, denying his rights to compensation, filed the present bill to restrain him from proceeding under the before-named section of the Lands Clauses [illegible] of the Rolls, upon the authority of The London and North-Western Railway Company v. Smith, 1 Mac. & Gord. 216, granted the injunction. This decision was reversed on appeal to the Lords Justices, who dissolved the injunction (18 Law T. Rep. 162), and the case of The London and North-Western Railway Company v. Smith has also been virtually overruled by The South Staffordshire Railway Company v. Hall, 1 Sim. N.S. 373; and The East and West India Docks and Birmingham Junction Railway Company v. Gattke, 3 Mac. & Gord. 155. After the order made by the Lords Justices, the defendant gave notice of a motion before the Master of the Rolls to dismiss the bill for want of prosecution, with costs, and the plaintiffs thereupon gave notice of a cross-motion, that the bill might be dismissed without costs. Both motions came on to be heard together at the Rolls, and the Master of the Rolls refused to make any order on the former motion; and on the latter ordered that the bill should be dismissed without costs. From this order the defendant now ...ealed; and on the suggestion of Lord Justice ...ght Bruce the parties agreed that the cause ...ld be considered as having come on for a hearing, the affidavits being treated as depositions, the plaintiffs admitting that, as the law now stood, no decree could be asked for by them, and that the only remaining question was whether the bill was to be dismissed with or without costs.

Bethell and Terrell, for the defendant, the appellant, argued, first, that the defendant, having moved to dismiss the bill for want of prosecution, the plaintiffs could not move to dismiss the bill. [Lord Justice KNIGHT BRUCE.—If there was no contempt on the part of the plaintiffs, I think that the pendency of the defendant's motion would make no difference; it would merely have to be taken into consideration with regard to costs.] At all events, a bill ought not to be dismissed without costs upon such an application as this, unless it appears clearly that bill would be dismissed without costs at the hearing; it should also be made promptly to the Court, when it is found out that the authorities which justified the filing of the bill were overruled by subsequent decisions. If the plaintiffs, without putting the defendant to unnecessary expense, had immediately, upon the decision in Gattke's case, come to the court, or on the service upon him of the notice of motion, and had said that the bill had been filed in consequence of the erroneous impression of the law which prevailed in consequence of the decision of The London and North-Western Railway Company v. Smith, his bill might have been dismissed without costs, but this he neglected to do. In such a case costs ought, following the general rule, to go by the event. Moreover, the case of The London and North-Western Railway Company v. Smith, was not such as to justify the filing of this bill, for there the amount in dispute was considerable, here it was small; and it was evident that more expense and inconvenience would be caused by the Court's interfering than by its refusal to do so.

Roundell Palmer and C. Hall, for the plaintiffs, insisted that the case of The London and North-Western Railway Company v. Smith was a sufficient authority for them to institute the suit, and in the cases which had been alluded to as overruling it, the judges who decided them expressly disclaimed any intention of doing so, and distinguished those cases from Smith's case. That the fact of the claim being for a small amount, did not distinguish this from Smith's case, for unless the plaintiffs had applied to the Court, many similar attempts to obtain compensation for alleged injuries to property would have been made by a great number of persons. That under these circumstances the bill ought to be dismissed without costs. They cited Robinson v. Rosher, 1 Y. & C. C. C. 7; and Flight v. Bentley, 7 Sim. 149.

Terrell in reply.

Lord Justice Lord CRANWORTH.—We think that the order of the Master of the Rolls was quite right, except that the defendant ought to have had the costs of his motion to dismiss, and with the qualification which I shall mention; for we think that the bill was filed upon the authority of existing much-considered decisions, which were sufficient to warrant the plaintiffs in filing the bill, so as to entitle them, as was held by my learned brother in Robinson v. Rosher, 1 Y. & C. C. C. 7, to have their bill dismissed without costs. It was argued that this was a special case, and not within the authority of The London and North-Western Railway Company v. Smith, 1 Mac. & G. 216; but we look in vain for any valid distinction between them. The cases are as nearly similar as two such cases can be expected to be. It has been said that the smallness of the demand ought to induce the Court to say that the bill ought never to have been filed. That, however, is always a difficult question to deal with, and it seems that there were many other persons besides the defendant who would be affected by the question. We think the case within the authority of The London and North-Western Railway Company v. Smith, and as the doctrine on which that case proceeded has been since got rid of, the defendant is entitled to have the bill dismissed, but without costs, so far as that case warranted the institution of the present suit. But there is nothing in that case to lead to the inference that the defendant there would not have had his costs if the case had proceeded, and he had obtained compensation in the action which the Court there held must be brought. And in the present case, if the defendant should establish a right to compensation, he will be in a different position from that in which he now stands. We propose, therefore, to vary the order of the Master of the Rolls, by giving the defendant the costs of his motion to dismiss, and to affirm the order in other respects; but to give the defendant liberty to apply as to the other costs of the suit, if he shall before the last day of Trinity Term next establish his right to compensation.

IN LUNACY.
Re POWEL.

Lunacy—Committee of the estate—Appointment of committee of the estate of a lunatic, without a reference to the Master.

This was an application for the appointment of a new committee of the estate of the lunatic. The present committee of the estate having attained the age of eighty-five years, and being in an infirm state of health, was desirous of retiring from the office. Sir John Dean Paul was proposed, and was willing to act in his place, and the heir-at-law and next of kin were anxious that the appointment should be made. The petition was supported by affidavits, containing all the evidence which would be required before the Master in lunacy, and it was therefore asked that the appointment should at once be made without a reference.

Jones Bateman in support of the petition.

Lord Justice KNIGHT BRUCE said that as the evidence was satisfactory, the Court under the circumstances would make the order, but that of course the usual securities must be entered into.

Lord Justice Lord CRANWORTH concurred.

IN BANKRUPTCY.
Ex parte STANER, re STANER.

Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849—Certificate—Conduct as a trader.

A person carrying on the trade of a baker previous to the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act coming into operation, obtained money under the fraudulent pretence of investing it on security, which he never did:

Held, that this was conduct in him as a trader, though not in the course of his trade, disentitling him to a certificate.

Held also, that if the case came otherwise within the Bankrupt Act of 1849, it was not the less so, because the conduct complained of took place before the passing of the Act.

This was an application on behalf of the bankrupt, George Staner, to reverse the decision of Mr. Commissioner Holroyd, refusing to allow him a certificate, and withholding from him protection. The bankrupt was a baker at Margate, and was, it seems, in the habit of borrowing and laying out money on mortgage and other investments. The assets of the bankrupt, whose unsecured debts amounted to about 7,600*l.* were sufficient to pay his creditors about ten shillings in the pound. The bankrupt's application was opposed by two creditors, from whom he had obtained money under the pretence of investing it, but, as he himself swore, merely on his own personal security. The bankrupt, Mr. Jay, one of the creditors, and Miss Fife, the daughter of Mrs. Fife, the other creditor (Mrs. Fife being too ill to attend in court) were examined and cross-examined orally in court, and all adhered to their contradictory statements. Mrs. Fife's affidavit was used in evidence, and on the bankrupt being asked by the Court whether he would wish the matter to stand over until she was sufficiently recovered, so as to give him the opportunity of cross-examining her orally, he declined the offer. The circumstances under which the debts were contracted, and the material facts, are sufficiently stated in the judgments.

Cooke, for the bankrupt, contended,—first, that it was not proved that he had obtained the money from the two opposing creditors under the pretence of investing it upon securities for them; the result of the evidence clearly shewed that he had borrowed it solely on his own personal security, at times when he believed himself solvent, and he would have remained so but for unavoidable and unexpected accidents. Secondly, that even on the supposition that he had obtained those moneys for the purposes ... posing creditors, still, as they had ... by him as a trader, his conduct as a trader was not affected thereby, within the meaning of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849. (Wakefield's case, 17 Law T. Rep. 55; and Dornford's case, 15 Jur. 278; 20 L. J. N.S. 6, Bank.) Thirdly, supposing his contracting these two debts was to be attributable to him as a trader, still, as they had been contracted before the bankrupt came into operation, his case did not come ... that Act.

J. T. Wood for the official and other assignees.

Lord Justice Lord CRANWORTH.—This is another of those distressing cases with which we have got to deal. It is an application by a party against the decision of the commissioner for a certificate, which he thought it his duty to refuse. It is an extremely painful duty to have to perform, sitting in a civil matter, to adjudicate whether a punishment—for such it is in effect—is, or not, to be inflicted. I confess I think the commissioner is right in refusing the certificate, on several grounds. In the first place, before the bankrupt can ask for a certificate, he should have conformed to the bankrupt law since his bankruptcy; he should have stated the truth and the whole truth respecting his estate, and I do not shrink from saying that here he has not done so. I do not believe the statements he has made. There were two transactions relative to loans brought in question. The first was that of Mr. Jay. Now if the question was, whether Mr. Jay could be considered as in any other light than a simple contract creditor, there might be doubt, because his subsequent conduct led to the conclusion that the 450*l.* advanced by Jay should be in the hands of Staner, to be as well secured as he could, on his (the bankrupt's) houses. That is not the question; the real point is, what was the original transaction? Mr. Jay says that he advanced his money to Staner originally on an undertaking that it should be invested on security; he says, that in a letter, which is now lost, Staner told him that it was to be invested on a mortgage of an estate of a Mr. Petley, but after many inquiries made by him, and many excuses made by Staner, the latter called on Mr. Jay, and told him the mortgage was at length completed, but he added that it was taken for 700*l.* or more, and that as he (the bankrupt) had advanced the greater proportion of the money, he would retain the mortgage in his own hands, and give Mr. Jay a security on his own property, and to this Mr. Jay acceded. As I have already stated, it is immaterial to consider, whether that did or did not absolve the bankrupt from the former engagement. But the purpose for which I wish to consider it is this, what was the true transaction? If what the bankrupt has stated to be the true transaction is not so, then he has been deliberately stating what he knew to be untrue. Mr. Jay says it was a contract for a mortgage from Petley. The bankrupt says it was a loan to him on his promissory note. Looking at the documents, which statement do they bear out? The transaction opens by a letter in May, in which Staner tells Jay as to the state of the Funds, recommending him to sell out, and adds, "Now if you get this letter soon enough to have time to answer me to-night do it in the following way: are you desirous to sell out if I can get you five per cent. say upon my own security, for what I expect it may be wanted for is equal to that? next the amount, what would be convenient to invest? Your answer will be waited for by me, because I can do you this service. I shall be very pleased, and do not always have the opportunity." Can any one understand that otherwise than that he was proposing some security other than his own? Mr. Jay agrees to sell out, and letters pass as to the mode of transmitting the money by a registered letter, to which Mr. Jay objects, and then the bankrupt writes to him,—"I take it for granted you will have the money on Friday. The security, you may rest assured, is of the most desirable character, or you should not have the investment. Leave that to me." Now, these are terms utterly irreconcileable with the notion that he was borrowing money on his own security. I come to the conclusion that Jay is a person to be believed, and that the bankrupt is to be disbelieved. One circumstance is important for the bankrupt, that it does not appear in writing that the name of the mortgagor was mentioned. Jay, however, says, it was mentioned in the lost letter; that was fairly a matter for observation, but I do not attach much importance to that, because much that passed between these parties was by word of mouth, and a person desirous of manufacturing a story which was untrue, would more probably have put it on what passed by word of mouth, instead of referring it to a lost letter. I am therefore inclined to regard the circumstance as favourable, rather than otherwise, to the truth of the statement made by Jay. If the case had rested on the evidence of Jay alone, I should have come to the conclusion that the bankrupt had wilfully intended to deceive his assignees and the parties interested in his estate, and had not conformed to the bankrupt laws. The case does not rest here, there is another transaction; and if any thing is to be gained by the maxim "noscitur a sociis," it is by its application to the present case. This transaction, of a similar character to the former, took place between the bankrupt and Mrs. Fife; and in this instance also we have had the advantage of seeing the demeanour and hearing the statements of Miss Fife and the bankrupt, and we have had the affidavit of her mother, Mrs. Fife, who cannot be examined here orally, on account of her illness; and the bankrupt, who knows the evidence she gave before the commissioners, and is probably aware that her cross-examination would not be favourable to him, did not wish that the matter should be delayed on that account. Now, what is the account given by the mother in her affidavit, and in a very straightforward manner by the young woman here to-day? Mrs. Fife lost her husband in 1849, leaving a little money, about 200*l.* in the house. Staner knew them at Margate, and took, or professed to take, some interest in him and his family, and the widow and daughter supposed him to be their only friend. He tendered his advice to them, and appointed to meet them at the London terminus of the Blackwall Railway by the hour, he said, of ten o'clock. The daughter says, and the mother states in her affidavit, that they went, and Staner asked them how they were left off, and was told that she had 200*l.* and that was more money than she liked to have in the house. He said that it was unlucky he had not known sooner, as he could have got it invested; that a Mr. Powell, of Quex-park, was just dead, that the Collinses were, therefore, in want of money, and that he could have got 5*l.* per cent. He then asked them how long it would take them to get the money, as perhaps it was not too late. He then promised to wait while they went for the money, and in the meantime to see if he could manage the matter. They go and get the money, and on their returning with it, he said, he had seen the party and was happy to say it was not too late, and that he could put the money to work directly. Then, relying upon him and his friendship, they put their all into his hands, he takes it, and goes away. The bankrupt denies all this, and that there was to be any security, except his own personal security. It is utterly incredible that the story told by the daughter of Mrs. Fife can be an invention; and it is strangely corroborated by the mode in which the bankrupt himself has answered the questions put to him regarding it. At first, he said, he did not recollect it; why he must have recollected it if it had occurred, and if it had been untrue, he would at once have contradicted it. When pressed with further questions, he seemed to feel his position, and then he denied the story to be true. A man may well say, "I do not recollect whether it rained this day fortnight," but he could not be heard to say, with any hope of belief, that he did not recollect whether a man gave him a blow in the face, or did any act of violence on that day. So, if he was speaking the truth, he would not in this transaction have said he did not recollect. We have the duty cast upon us, in this case, of saying whether we disbelieve this young woman, supported as she is by the affidavit of her mother (too ill to be examined, it is said), or to pay no attention to the oath of the bankrupt. I have no hesitation in saying that, in my opinion, the bankrupt has told a deliberate and intentional falsehood, and that on that ground alone the certificate has been most properly refused him. Further, I believe his debts to have been contracted by fraud, and in every way by means not such as are proper in the conduct of a trader. I do not think his application for his certificate is to be for one moment listened to, and I am of opinion that his petition must be dismissed.

Lord Justice KNIGHT BRUCE.—The agreement of Lord Cranworth with the decision of the learned commissioner would be an affirmation of it, whatever might be my own opinion; therefore it would be unnecessary in me to state my view of the case, whatever that view may be. I think it right, however, not to abstain from stating what my opinion really is. First as to the law. It has been suggested, with great propriety, by Mr. Cooke, the learned and able counsel for the bankrupt, that even if the case set up by the opposing creditors were made out, it does not fall within the 256th section of the Bankrupt Act of 1849, because these particular facts having occurred, these acts having been done by the bankrupt before that statute, they cannot be said to come within its operation. For this no decision was cited; and considering the learning and experience of the learned counsel who supports the bankrupt—Mr. Cooke, I think I may take it no case exists, and I state my opinion to be, that if the case comes otherwise within the Act of Parliament, it is not the less so because the conduct complained of took place before the passing of the statute. Another observation made was, that the debt was not fraudulently contracted by the bankrupt in his trade, and that, therefore, it was not conduct in a trader within the meaning of the Bankrupt Act, and for this my decision in Wakefield's case was referred to and relied upon. My impression is different as to the effect of that case, and I think that such conduct would be conduct of a man in trade shewing him to be unworthy of that degree of estimation which ought to belong to one engaged in the transactions of commerce, or indeed in any other transactions of life.' If in Wakefield's case I said anything contrary to this, I was wrong; but I do not think I so said. My impression has always been, and my opinion now is, that if a man in trade deals in the way alluded to, though not in the course of his trade, or in matters connected with his business, it is, for the purpose of such an application as the present, conduct of a man as a trader within the Act of Parliament. So far as to the law in this case. There are two acts of the bankrupt impeached. How the matter would have stood if Jay's case had been the only one against the bankrupt, I will not give any opinion, because it is not necessary; but I am satisfied on the evidence, so far as any one subject to human infirmity in judging can be satisfied, on the comparison of a conflict of testimony by adverse witnesses, that the money of Mrs. Fife was obtained from her unfairly, improperly, and fraudulently. A state of things was represented to them which did not exist; they were ignorant (I do not use the term in an offensive sense) and helpless women, whom this tradesman, who professed to be their friend, ought to have assisted, advised, and supported, and if he saw they were about to commit an act of imprudence, he ought to have prevented them; at all events, he ought to have told them the exact truth. He allowed them, however, to part with their money in a mistake, which he might have prevented. I come to the conclusion, then, on the evidence, that the bankrupt contracted a debt with Mrs. Fife by fraud and on false pretences. Considering that I come to that conclusion, and considering the 256th section of the Bankrupt Act, I am to ask myself, whether a man capable of committing this single act as to these women, is worthy to receive what I have called a passport to enter into trade again without paying his debts. I am of opinion that he is not, and on the ground of his conduct to these helpless women alone I refuse him his certificate. Let the petition be dismissed, and the costs of the assignees and opposing creditors come out of the estate.

ROLLS COURT.

Re WAUGH.

Costs, taxation of—Married woman—Separate estate—Security for costs—Practice.

A married woman entitled to separate estate had employed solicitors to act for her and had given them some securities for costs incurred by them on her separate estate. She then obtained an order of course for delivery and taxation of their bill of costs, but without the intervention of a next friend. On motion to discharge the order for irregularity in not having a next friend, or in the alternative that security for costs might be given:

Held, that security for costs must be given, or the order must be discharged; that there was no real distinction between the case of an order of course, and any other case: but that the practice having been, though erroneously, to give orders of course without the intervention of a next friend, there could be no costs of the motion.

This was a motion on behalf of Messrs. Waugh and Mitchell, solicitors, to discharge for irregularity an order of course for taxation of their bill of costs obtained by Rossetta Waddell, a client, on the 15th December last; or in the alternative that she might be ordered to give security for payment both of the costs of the application for the order and of the amount which, upon taxation of the bill, should be found due; and that in the meantime proceedings might be stayed, and that Mrs. Waddell might be ordered to pay the costs of and consequent upon this application. It appeared that Mrs. Waddell, who was a feme covert, was possessed of considerable property, which was settled to her separate use, and of which the income was about 900*l.* a year. Messrs. Waugh and Mitchell had for some time acted as her solicitors, and the result was that costs for their professional services to a considerable amount had been incurred. It appeared also that they had obtained from Mrs. Waddell in respect of these costs some securities on her separate estate. On the 15th December, 1851, Mrs. Waddell, describing herself as Rosetta Waddell, formerly Rosetta Bagster, of Warwick-square, in the city of London, now the wife of John James Robert Waddell, obtained an order of course, whereby Messrs. Waugh and Mitchell were ordered to deliver their bill of costs within a fortnight, and a reference was directed to the Master to tax the same, and that Messrs. Waugh and Mitchell might be ordered, upon payment of what should be found due, to deliver upon oath all deeds, books, papers, and writings in their custody. This order was served on the 19th December. Messrs. Waugh and Mitchell now moved to discharge this order.

R. Palmer and Greene, in support of the motion, contended that it was irregular, and ought to be discharged, because it had been obtained by a married woman without the intervention of a next friend. They cited Re Williams, 12 Beav. 510; Re Taylor, 10 Beav. 221.

Roupell, contrà, contended that the intervention of a next friend on behalf of a married woman was merely by way of giving security for costs; but where a married woman has separate estate, and has given security for costs, as in this case, she may present a petition herself, and there is no need of the intervention of a next friend. [The MASTER of the ROLLS.—In answer to a question I sent to the secretary's office, I am informed that the practice is for married women to petition without the intervention of a next friend.] It was a reasonable practice if a married woman had no property, for in that case there was nothing out of which to pay the costs; but where, as here, there is separate estate and money set apart out of it to answer costs, what pretence can there be for these gentleman to require further security? It was assumed that the order was merely waste paper; but if her separate estate went to pay she was as to that a feme sole and had a right to tax the bill of costs.

R. Palmer, in reply, contended that a next friend was necessary, for a separate estate might not be sufficient to liquidate the amount. Moreover, the application should have been by special petition and not an order of course.

Tuesday, March 30.—The MASTER of the ROLLS.—This was a motion to discharge an order of course, obtained by a married woman to tax a bill of costs, on the ground that the order was applied for without a next friend; or, in the alternative, that security for the costs of the taxation might be given. I am of opinion that it is settled in the case of Murray v. Barlee, that a married woman's separate estate is liable for costs. It has been also, I think, the usual practice in a case of this kind to allow a married woman to do without a next friend; but the practice is nevertheless erroneous; and as in all other cases, a next friend is necessary to be appointed, to be answerable for costs to the party sued, so in this a similar precaution must be taken. There is no intelligible reason why, if this had been the case of a special petition, there must have been a next friend, and yet that it should be unnecessary where a common order only has been obtained. Whether there be special circumstances in the case, or it is such that a common order is sufficient, the petition in either case must be by a next friend. The liability, however, of the next friend is not extended beyond his liability in the case of a special petition, but is confined to the costs incurred by reason of the petition. I must, therefore, either direct security for costs in this case to be given, or else discharge the order of course. As for many years it has been the practice to give orders of course without the intervention of a next friend, I will give no costs of this application, but will, if it is desired, make the costs abide the result of the taxation.

April 20 and 30.

GOODAY v. THE COLCHESTER AND STOUR VALLEY RAILWAY COMPANY.

Railway company—Contract—Specific performance—Adoption by a third party of contract between others—Abandonment of scheme.

A railway company who had projected and were promoting a new line of railway, being opposed by a landholder on the line, arranged, through a third party, who professed to be the agent of the company, to purchase his land at a certain price. The landholder accordingly withdrew his opposition, and the Bill passed authorising the construction of the new line. No steps, however, were taken to carry out the scheme, and the compulsory powers having expired, though the time for completing the line had not, the landholder filed his bill against the company for specific performance of the contract to purchase his land:

Held, that there was no contract between the plaintiff and the company, for before they obtained their new Act they could not enter into a contract; and as to their adoption of the contract made by their professed agent for their benefit, as a corporation subsequently established, there had been nothing done after obtaining the Act which the plaintiff's withdrawal of opposition had enabled them to do, and therefore they could not be said to have adopted it.

The Court refused even to put the company on terms to admit the contract at law; but dismissed the bill with costs.

The bill in this case was filed by the plaintiff Gooday to enforce specific performance of an agreement for the purchase from him by the Colchester, Stour Valley, Sudbury, and Halstead Railway Company, of a piece of land for the purpose of an extension line projected by them. It appeared that the company were desirous of constructing a branch line of railway from Sudbury to Lavenham and Melford, but such a work not being within the powers conferred on them by their Act of Incorporation, it became necessary for them to apply to Parliament for the purpose of obtaining the necessary authority. Accordingly, in 1845, they applied to Parliament for an Act to enable them to construct the proposed line, but their application was opposed by the plaintiff, through whose land the new line was intended to pass. It became necessary, therefore, to buy off the plaintiff's opposition; and, accordingly, after some negotiations, an agreement was entered into on the 13th of May, 1847, between the plaintiff and a person who professed to act as the agent of the company, whereby the plaintiff was to withdraw his opposition, and the company were to purchase his land, or so much thereof as they required, for the sum of 1,850*l*. This agreement was not under the seal of the company, nor was the agent who acted for them authorised by an instrument under their seal. The company acted as to the new line simply as promoters thereof, and contracted through a third party for the purchase of land for the purposes of the undertaking. The contract itself was not denied; it was merely alleged that it was void. In consequence of the agreement, however, the plaintiff withdrew his opposition, and the company obtained their extension Act on [illegible] 8th of June, 1847. In pursuance of the agreement the plaintiff delivered an abstract of his title to the land in question, and no objection was taken to the title; and on the 17th of June, 1847, a draft conveyance was sent to the plaintiff's solicitor by the solicitor of the company, and was returned approved. Nothing more, however, was done in the matter, and the contract has never been completed, on the ground, as contended by the defendants, that it was a void contract, not having been under the seal of the company. But the plaintiff alleged that they refused to complete, because he would not, at their request, postpone the payment of the purchase-money, and that they had expressed their determination for that reason to take every legal advantage against him of which they could avail themselves. There was no distinct evidence that the new line of railway had been actually abandoned, but no steps had been taken for constructing the line, and the time for exercising the compulsory powers of their Act had expired in June 1850, though the time for completing the line will not expire till June 1853. Under these circumstances, the plaintiff, in May, 1850, before the expiration of the time for exercising the compulsory powers had expired, filed his bill against the company to compel specific performance of the contract.

Roupell and J. H. Palmer for the plaintiff.—The company admit the contract, and the investigation of title, and its validity; but because the plaintiff refused to postpone payment of the purchase-money, they refuse to complete, and though they have got part of the consideration, the withdrawal of the plaintiff's opposition, yet they will take advantage of every legal objection they can raise to the contract. The plaintiff undertook to withdraw his opposition and sell his land for a given sum; he did the one and offered to do the other; but the company will not accept the offer, and they are therefore compellable to do so. What has been done by the plaintiff in giving his consent to the Act passing cannot be undone, nor can the company restore that part of the consideration The contract was a good contract, and not void for want of being under the seal of the company; it was not made with them as a company, but as individuals promoting a new line before the Act was obtained for constructing it; for if the case is once got beyond the necessity for a corporate seal, it is no longer as to the extension a company transaction, but only one by private individuals acting by a party employed as their agent. Then the company took the benefit of the agreement, and thereby adopted it, and are therefore bound by it. This case differs from Webb v. The Direct London and Portsmouth Railway Company, 9 Hare, 129; S.C. on appeal, 21 L. J. 337, Ex. Ch.; 16 Jur. 323; for in that case there was a regular contract; and in Stuart v. The London and North Western Railway Company, 19 Law T. Rep. 43, there was a contract, in consequence of which the landholder's opposition was withdrawn, but the railway was not carried out, and could not then be completed. In this case, however, they have eighteen months to complete, and they may go to Parliament for an Act to restore them the compulsory powers. If the Court should not decree specific performance, it will at least put the defendants on terms, and compel them to admit the contract in an action at law for damages. They cited Winne v. Bampton, 3 Atk. 472; Macker v. The Foundling Hospital, 1 Ves. & B. 188; Maxwell v. The Dulwich College, cited in Carter v. The Dean of Ely, 7 Sim. 211; Marshall v. The Corporation of Queenborough, 1 Sim. & S. 520; Wilmot v. The Corporation of Coventry, 1 Y. & Coll. 518, Ex. Eq.; The Fishmongers' Company v. Robertson, 5 Man. & G. 131; Edwards v. The Grand Junction Railway Company, 1 Myl. & Cr. 650; Hawkes v. The Eastern Counties Railway Company, 15 Jur. 979; Rex v. The Inhabitants of Throscross, 1 Ad. & Ell. 126; Preston v. The Liverpool, Manchester, and Newcastle-upon-Tyne Junction Railway Company, 1 Sim. 586, N.S.

Lloyd and Goodeve, for the company, refused to consent to the same order as had been made on appeal in Stuart v. The London and North Western Railway Company, on the ground that there were several points in this case which made it differ from the other,—the uncertainty of the contract, for instance. They contended that the agreement was void, as not being under the seal of the company, and that it was not made by any person lawfully authorised as agents for the company, and that nothing had been done by the company which amounted to the ratification of it. They cited The Fishmongers' Company v. Robertson, 5 Man. & Gr. 131; Bland v. Crowley, 6 Ex. Rep. 522; Kirk v. The Bromley Union, 2 Phill. 640.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—I regret that in the present state of the authorities I cannot give the plaintiff a decree. There are two questions to be considered in the present case,—first, whether there is any contract at all between the plaintiff and the defendants for the purchase by the latter of the land of the former, and if it should be found that there is, what remedy this Court can give for the breach of it; and secondly, whether there is any contract between the plaintiff and a third party, of which the defendants have taken the benefit, and by so doing have adopted the contract. Now, it is clear that there is no contract between the plaintiff and the defendants, for before they obtained their Extension Act, they could not, as a company, make any contract at all. Had there existed any such a contract, then it has been settled as a rule of law by recent cases that assuming a contract to have existed between an individual and a railway company, and if the undertaking had been abandoned, the Court will, nevertheless, in the exercise of its discretion, send the case to law, instead of granting specific performance. In this case, however, no sub-contract between the plaintiff and the defendants exists. But it is, nevertheless, immaterial whether such a contract exists or not, if there was a good and valid agreement between the plaintiff and a third party, of which contract the company had received the benefit, and which they had by their acts adopted and ratified. The cases of Edwards v. The Grand Junction Railway Company, and Preston v. The Liverpool, Manchester, and Newcastle-upon-Tyne Railway Company, establish the principle that wherever a third party enters into a contract with the plaintiff, and the defendant takes the benefit of it, he is bound to give the plaintiff the advantage he has contracted for. Here, then, the question is, whether the defendants did adopt the agreement previously entered into by their agent, or alleged agent, with the plaintiff. The contract was entered into with the plaintiff for the benefit of a corporation not then, but subsequently, established, and the withdrawal of the plaintiff's opposition, which was part of the contract, enabled them to obtain their Act of incorporation. Since the Act was obtained, however, nothing has been done, nor any step taken to construct the railway. There is no distinct evidence, indeed, that the railway has been abandoned; but no money has been paid, no land taken, nor any movement made towards carrying on the scheme, and the compulsory powers of the Act have now ceased. Under these circumstances I cannot say that the company has adopted the agreement, or is bound by its terms; and therefore I do not think that I can compel them to admit the contract in an action at law. I must dismiss the bill, but without costs.

VICE-CHANCELLOR TURNER'S COURT.

Reported by J. HENRY COOKE, Esq. Barrister-at-Law.

Jan. 13, 15, 22, 27, and 28.

THE GRAND TRUNK STAFFORD AND PETERBOROUGH RAILWAY COMPANY v. BRODIE.

Bill by one scripholder on behalf of himself and others—Joint-stock Companies Winding-up Acts—Suit conducted by, and costs of, an official manager—Fraud—Stat. 11 & 12 Vict. c. 45, s. 53.

A. B. a subscriber to a railway company, which failed by noncompliance with the Standing Orders, filed a bill on behalf of himself and all other scripholders except such as were defendants, alleging various fraudulent acts by the defendants, such as the issue of spurious shares and the repayment of pretended deposits, praying that the defendants might make good such payments. The p[illegible] back part of his deposits, on giving up the old certificates received new ones; and on receiving back a further part of the deposit, gave up the new certificates, and signed a memorandum engaging to release the promoters. After the answers were put in by several of the defendants, an order for winding up the affairs of the company was made and an official manager was appointed, and afterwards an order, in the causes and the matter, was made for the official manager to carry on the suit. The evidence did not sustain the charges of fraud;

Held, that A. B. could not have maintained the suit and retained the moneys he had received back, the subsequent transactions creating a new contract; that, therefore, the official manager was not in a condition to do so; and that it must be dismissed with costs, to be paid by the official manager without prejudice as to how they were, as between him and the assets of the company, to be ultimately borne.

The bill in this case was originally filed by Mr. Warren on behalf of himself and all other scripholders and shareholders, against the defendants, who were several of them provisional directors, and one of them had been secretary, to the Grand Trunk Stafford and Peterborough Railway Company, which had been projected in 1845. Two guineas had been paid as a deposit by each subscriber. Mr. Warren, the plaintiff, had subscribed for forty shares, and had paid his deposit upon them. The company, which had been provisionally registered, failed to obtain an Act of Parliament in consequence of being too late in complying with the Standing Orders of the House of Commons. Under these circumstances a meeting of the company was called in the month of May 1846, and it was resolved not to prosecute the scheme. It was at the same time also resolved, that the sum of one guinea per share should be repaid to each subscriber as the first dividend or instalment, and afterwards a further dividend of 2*s.* 6*d.* per share. These were paid through the defendant, Mr. Harman, the secretary, by cheques on the company's bankers, signed by some of the provisional directors. The bill alleged that a dividend of one guinea had been paid upon each of 1,490 shares, which had been fraudulently issued, and on which the deposit of two guineas had never been paid. The bill prayed that the defendant Harman might be decreed to repay with interest at 5 per cent. the sum of 1,564*l.* 10*s.* alleged to have been received by him out of the funds of the company by means of twenty-four bankers' cheques given in respect of the alleged spurious scrip certificates, and 235*l.* received or retained by him in respect of dividends upon 200 shares belonging to the company; that he might be decreed to repay all other moneys belonging to the company, and retained by him for his own use which had been received by him, and for which he was accountable; that proper accounts might be taken, for the purpose of ascertaining what was due from the defendant Harman to the company; that it might be declared that the several payments in respect of such alleged spurious scrip certificates were breaches of trust on the part of such of the defendants as had signed the cheques, and that they might be ordered to make good all losses upon the same; that the directors might be directed to refund with interest all moneys of the company retained or applied by them to their own use by way of remuneration for their services, or for purposes not authorised by the subscribers' agreement. In December 1846 the bill was filed, and after several of the defendants had put in their answers, an order for winding up the affairs of the company was obtained. An official manager was appointed, and on the 31st of July, 1849, an order was made in the cause, and in the matter of the company, that the suit should be prosecuted by the official manager, as the nominal plaintiff.

The Solicitor-General (Sir W. P. Wood), Stuart, Bolt, J. Baily, J. Nicholl, Selwyn, P. Stevens, Rogers, Collier, Osborne, Roxburgh, and W. Morris, appeared for the several parties. The arguments lasted the greater part of five days, and are sufficiently stated in the judgment of the Court.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—Two questions, not involving the merits of the case, were much discussed at the hearing,—namely, first, whether the original plaintiff, Mr. Warren, could have maintained the suit; and secondly, what was the effect of the order for substituting the official manager as plaintiff? As to the competency of Mr. Warren to maintain the suit, it appears by the bill that about the latter end of 1845 he had deposited the scrip certificates for his forty shares with the defendant, Mr. Harman, for securing a sum of money; that on the dividend of one guinea per share being repaid, the original scrip certificates were called in, and new certificates were issued; and that on the payment of the further dividend of 2*s.* 6*d.* per share, these new certificates were called in, and the parties who brought them signed a memorandum undertaking to execute a release to the directors when called upon to do so. It was stated that the defendant, Mr. Harman, had signed this memorandum. It appears, therefore, that both on the original and on the new certificates being delivered up, new contracts were entered into by the parties. These contracts the bill does not seek to disturb, but it went on the footing of the original partnership, as if the scripholders and shareholders who had entered into these new contracts were entitled to recover beyond the amounts and [illegible] lated under these contracts. And the first therefore, to be considered was, whether the plaintiff, suing on behalf of himself and the other scripholders and shareholders, could have maintained any such right. It may, I think, on the evidence, be assumed that the defendant, Mr. Harman, is to be considered merely as the agent of the plaintiff, Mr. Warren, in delivering up the certificates, and that both were ignorant of the alleged frauds, but that some of the defendants were cognisant of and participators in such alleged frauds. Upon this assumption it can hardly be denied that the original plaintiff and his mortgagee would be entitled to undo the contracts which were entered into in the manner I have mentioned on the occasion of the new and original certificates being delivered up, nor would they have been held bound by the undertaking to release the directors. But does it follow that they can undo the contracts, and at the same time retain the moneys received under those contracts? I think not; and if the contracts are to be undone at all, they must be undone in toto. What then would be the position of the original plaintiff, Mr. Warren, as between himself and his mortgagee, and as between himself and the other shareholders? As between himself and his mortgagee there would have been an obligation on him to bring back at least the instalment paid on each share; and the difficulty might have been surmounted by making the relief conditional on his doing so. But how would it have been as between the plaintiff and the other shareholders, whom he had assumed to represent? How could the plaintiff compel the other shareholders to refund the sums which they had received? Each of them might at least have a right to elect whether he would abide by the transaction, retaining the moneys, or impeach the transaction and refund the moneys. What right would the original plaintiff (Mr. Warren) have had to make this election for them? If, therefore, the bill rest solely on the right of the original plaintiff to sue, it cannot be sustained. Several other points affecting the same result were brought forward in argument on the part of the defendants, and some of them were not less unfavourable to the right of the plaintiff to sue on behalf of himself and the other scripholders and subscribers. Some of the objections, indeed, were scarcely attempted to be answered on the part of the plaintiff. The conclusion to which I have arrived on this part of the case, therefore, without reference to the question of the merits, is, that this bill cannot be sustained by the original plaintiff, Warren. It remains to be considered, what is the effect of the order for the prosecution of the suit by the official manager. This order depends on the construction of the stat. 11 & 12 Vict. c. 45, s. 53, which enacts that where any action, suit, or other proceeding shall have been brought or instituted, or shall be pending, by or on behalf of the company in respect of which the official manager shall have been appointed, or by any person duly authorised to sue as the nominal plaintiff on behalf of such company, or by any one or more members or contributories of such company, on behalf of himself and the other members and contributories thereof, it shall be lawful for such plaintiffs to substitute the official manager as the plaintiff in such action, suit, or other proceeding, by entering a suggestion on the roll to that effect in an action, and by obtaining an order to that effect in such suit; such order to be obtained on motion or petition, without notice, and that it shall be lawful for the official manager thenceforward to prosecute such suit or other proceedings in the same manner and with the same effect, to all intents and purposes, as if such suit or proceeding had been commenced by the official manager as plaintiff under the provisions of the Act. It has been insisted, on the part of the defendants, that the case did not at all fall within the provisions of the section in question. But I think that it would be difficult to answer some of the arguments which have been urged on that point, particularly as to the character of the suit which was instituted on behalf of the scrip holders and shareholders, and not on behalf of all, but of all except the defendants. I do not, however, think it necessary to give any opinion upon the question whether the case falls within the provisions of the section; because, what the official manager has to make out to entitle him to maintain the suit is, that he had a better right than the original plaintiff. I am of opinion that the official manager had no better right when he became plaintiff than the original plaintiff had; but the moment he took the suit upon himself, he adopted it with all the infirmities attached to it, and by these he must abide. According to the provisions of the section, he was thenceforward to prosecute the suit in the same manner and with the same effect as if it had been commenced by him as plaintiff, under the Act. What he is to prosecute is the original suit, and by that, or by any amendment of it, he must, in my opinion, abide. To construe the words of the section, "as if the suit had been commenced by him," as freeing the suit from objections to which it would have been open if carried on by the original plaintiff, would lead to the most palpable injustice. If that is to be the construction put upon these words, defendants might find themselves called upon at the hearing of the cause to encounter equities which they would have had no opportunity of meeting. It would, in my opinion, require the strongest proof of such an intention on the part of the Legislature, to warrant the Court in adopting this construction, as contended for by the official manager. I find nothing in the Act which at all points to the conclusion that the Legislature had any such intention. Independently of the merits of the case, therefore, I am of opinion that the frame of the pleadings is such, that the bill must be dismissed; but as the merits of the case very materially affect the character of the parties, and are proper to be taken into consideration on the question of costs, I have felt it to be my duty to look into them. The case made by the bill is, that the company's certificates were, in the first instance, printed in blank, as to the numbers and as to the names of the two directors by whom they were to be signed; that these certificates were bound up in books with counterfoils to the certificate, each book containing certificates to the amount of several thousands of pounds; that as they were thus bound up, the directors signed their names to the certificates, and put their initials to the counterfoils, and then handed back the books to the secretary, for the purpose of countersigning the certificates when issued; that the company had also a share register book, in which were entered the names of parties who had signed the agreement, and the number of shares which had been issued to each subscriber; that as the signature of the certificates occupied a considerable time, the directors occasionally took the scrip books home with them for the purpose of signing the certificates, and returning them to the secretary to fill up and sign as they were wanted; that since the time when the defendant Harman became secretary, the scrip book, No. 39, was in the hands of the defendant, Mr. Brodie, for the purpose of signing the scrip certificates, which had already been signed by Harrison or some other provisional director, that it contained certificates for 2,000 shares, none of which had ever been issued, that it was suffered to remain in Mr. Brodie's possession and was never returned to the office of the company; that the plaintiff, Warren, had lately discovered that the defendants Brodie and Harman had entered into some secret arrangement by which they might make use for their own benefit and in fraud of the company of the scrip certificates contained in the book No. 39, so taken from the office by Mr. Brodie; that the defendant Harrison had assisted Brodie and Harman in their acts or proceedings which were to enable them to practise these frauds; that the scrip certificates so made use of by Messrs. Brodie, Harrison, and Harman amounted to 1,500*l.* and the same were spurious scrip certificates and had been cut from the missing book No. 39, and that the remuneration they had paid themselves had not been sanctioned by any meeting of the company. [His Honour, after going through the details of the charges, proceeded.] If the case had to be decided upon the merits, the plaintiff could not have obtained any decree grounded upon these charges, for, in the first place, as to the case against the defendant, Mr. Brodie (which I deal with as being the one most strongly relied upon, and which certainly is the strongest case in the plaintiff's favour), I see nothing in the evidence which could justify the Court in considering him to have been a party to any such fraud as was alleged, nor, indeed, any evidence which could lead to the inference of participation in it beyond the fact of his having been for some time in possession of the book or collection of documents by means of which the fraud was alleged to have been committed, and not accounting for the book, nor for the fact of such possession or retention. But it would be going beyond authority and beyond principle if I were to hold a party chargeable for a fraud on the mere ground that the document by means of which the fraud had been perpetrated had been in his possession and was not accounted for. And as to the case of wilful default on the part of Mr. Brodie, I think the statements do not raise the question. If such a case was raised, it would be inconsistent with the case of fraud as alleged. As to the defendant Harman, who being merely secretary of the company, cannot be charged on any other ground than that of fraud, the evidence fails to shew that he has ever had possession of the document by means of which the fraud was or could have been perpetrated. Without looking to the defence, therefore, the plaintiff, I think, has failed to substantiate his case. But whatever might have been the result as to this part of the case, if the question had depended solely upon the evidence to which I have referred, some passages read by the plaintiff, from the answers, seem to remove all doubt, for the answer of Mr. Brodie shews that he knew nothing of the matter. I am of opinion that if the case could have been determined upon the merits, the bill must have been dismissed as to the 1,490 shares, and it must also have been dismissed as to the directors' remuneration. As to this part of the case, the plaintiff has read the statements in the defendant's answer, which completely and satisfactorily explain it. Having regard to the charges of the bill, whatever relief might have been given as to the other matters, these parts of the bill must have been dismissed with costs. To what extent any decree as to the other matters could have been serviceable to the plaintiff, I am unable to judge. But under the circumstances, I feel it my duty to dismiss this bill with costs, to be paid wholly by the official manager.

BLACKWELL v. PENNANT.

Legacy—"Servant living with me."

A will contained the bequest "to all my servants living with me at the time of my decease, who shall have then lived in my service for three years, one year's wages:"

Held, that all servants at a yearly hiring were entitled, although not resident with him; but that a gardener, who was engaged at a stated sum per week, although it was paid at irregular intervals, was not entitled, although he had lived more than three years in the testator's service.

This was a claim filed by the plaintiff against the executrix of a will for the payment of an alleged legacy of 44*l.* 4*s.* that being the amount of a year's wages at 17*s.* per week. The testator, Mr. Pennant, of Brymber Hall, by his will bequeathed as follows: —"I give to every servant living with me at the time of my decease, and who shall then have lived in my service for three years, one year's wages." The plaintiff was an under-gardener, and had been for many years, far exceeding three, at first at 15*s.* a week, and afterwards at 17*s.* a week. By his claim he alleged that he was entitled to a year's wages, and that his salary was paid at irregular intervals. The widow and executrix of the testator, by her affidavit, said that a book was kept by her husband and herself, marked "Servants at Brymber-house," in which book the name of the plaintiff did not appear; and she deposed that the plaintiff was considered as a weekly labourer, exclusively employed in out-door work; that seven or eight men and boys were employed about the mansion-house and home farm, and that, except during a short time, the defendant was continued in his employ by her at 17*s.* and afterwards at 20*s.* a week, and that it was untrue that the plaintiff had been hired by the testator by the year. She also swore that the employment by her was on the same footing as to term of hiring, viz. weekly, as that on which the testator himself employed the plaintiff, and not different. A man named Jones also made an affidavit, in which he said that the plaintiff had represented himself untruly as hired at a yearly salary: that he had heard the testator say the plaintiff was engaged at 17*s.* a week, but before that at 15*s.* a week, but this was in lieu of some allowances of beer which he formerly had, and that it was always understood that the plaintiff was a weekly servant.

Monday, March 8.—The VICE-CHANCELLOR, after detailing the facts of the case said,—I have no doubt that the plaintiff was a servant living with the testator at the time of his decease, within the meaning of the will. That meaning is to be gathered from the terms used, taken in connection with the circumstances in which the testator was at the time of using them. But the Court is not to place itself in the situation of the testator with any idea of speculating as to what he might have intended, but only to explain the words used, when the words used may be taken in more senses than one. Now, the only important circumstance here is, that the testator had several servants under weekly, yearly, and quarterly contracts of hiring, living, some in the mansion-house, and others in the lodge and cottages on the estate, and it is not certain from the terms of this disposition, whether the testator meant his bounty to extend to both classes or to one class only. It was contended by the defendant, that by the words "living with me at the time of my decease," the testator meant "living along with me in the same house." I do not adopt this view, but think that the expression is equivalent to living in my service. Here the plaintiff was living in a cottage near the mansion, and on the grounds held along with it. It cannot be said that because he was not living within the same house, he was, therefore, not a servant living with the testator, and in his service; I think, therefore, he came within that description: and he had been so for the required term of three years previous to the testator's decease. The cases of Booth v. Dean, 1 Myl. and Keen, 560, and Townshend v. Windham, 2 Vern. 546, were cited, as well as the very late case of Ogle v. Morgan, before Sir J. L. K. Bruce, but reversed on appeal [illegible] the late Lord Chancellor, Lord Truro (18 Law T. [illegible] 196), were referred to. In Ogle v. Morgan, the [illegible]ion turns more on the meaning of the term "domestic establishment," which does not occur here to borrow the meaning of the testator's expressions; and, therefore, I am bound to adopt Lord Cowper's opinion in Townshend v. Windham, that the description, "Servants living with me at the time of my death," is not to be confined to such servants only as were in the testator's house, or had diet from him. But then there is the case of Booth v. Dean, before Sir J. Leach, which is not opposed to this view, but has an important bearing on the present case, because there as here a servant hired by weekly wages claiming under a gift of a year's wages to all servants living with the testator at the time of his decease; and the Master of the Rolls decided that the expression "a year's wages" clearly had reference to a yearly hiring—to servants "usually hired by the year." And this I take to be the right interpretation. When the testator gives to his servants a year's wages, he gives it to those whom he had hired at yearly wages. Has he ever entered into any contract with the plaintiff respecting a year's wages? Has a year's wages ever been defined by him? Nothing of the sort is proved. When the testator gives a year's wages he must mean to such as were hired yearly, or who had yearly contracts. What the plaintiff claims can be taken to be only the aggregate sum payable for fifty-two weeks at 17s. per week. This would be a very strained construction. It is incumbent on the plaintiff to shew that a yearly sum was agreed upon between himself and the testator; but this, I am of opinion, he has not sufficiently shewn. The plaintiff has sworn that he was hired by the year, and that his wages were calculated first at the rate of 15s. a week and afterwards 17s. a week; but he has nowhere sworn that he was paid yearly; on the contrary, his affidavit states that the payments were sometimes half-yearly, sometimes quarterly, but generally at irregular intervals. Not only do the sums of 39*l*. 7s. and 44*l*. 1s. appear unusual and improbable to be selected with reference to an annual engagement; but it appears from the plaintiff's own affidavit that it was adopted with reference to a weekly sum of 15s. and afterwards of 17s. It is clearly very improbable that he should be paid first half-yearly, then quarterly, and then at irregular intervals, if there had been originally a yearly hiring, and on reference to the books it appears clearly that the first entry of payment was calculated at the footing of so many weeks' wages. Then there is in addition the evidence of Jones, which clearly shewed that the plaintiff had complained of the amount of his wages as weekly wages. I am, therefore, of opinion that this claim must be dismissed. If the result had been arrived at on a point of law merely, I should have been disposed to dismiss it without costs; but looking to the case which I have cited of Ogle v. Morgan, and my decision turning on the facts of the case, and the plaintiff not having substantiated the case which he brought forward, I must dismiss this claim with costs.

SAWREY v. RUMNEY.

Will—Construction—Substitutionary gift.

A testatrix by her will gave 1,000*l. stock upon trust for the maintenance of A. B. until she attained twenty-two years of age, and then for A. B. absolutely. By a codicil the testatrix confirmed the bequest except as to the trusts, which she revoked, and declared the trusts to be for A. B. for life, and afterwards for A. B.'s children. By a subsequent codicil the testatrix thus expressed herself:—"I have altered my views respecting A. B. respecting the* 1,000*l. as left in my will, and which I now think may prove a snare for her. I now leave* 500*l. for schooling and board, when at a proper age to be sent to a respectable place for useful teaching:"*

Held, that the 500*l. was an additional gift, and not a gift in substitution for the* 1,000*l. the trusts of which were declared by the former codicil.*

Catherine Rumney, by her will dated the 29th of July, 1847, made the following bequest:—"I give and bequeath unto John Fenwick and Jonathan Thompson the sum of 1,000*l*. Three per Centum Consolidated Bank Annuities, part of the stock standing in my name in the books of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, upon trust, to pay, apply, and dispose of the dividends and annual proceeds thereof as and when the same shall become due and payable, for and towards the maintenance and education of my granddaughter, Catherine Lowdon, until she attains the age of twenty-two years, then in trust for her my said granddaughter, Catherine Lowdon, her executors, administrators, and assigns for ever. But in case my said granddaughter, Catherine Lowdon, shall depart this life before she attains her said age of twenty-two years, then, in trust, for my children living at the time of her death, and the children of such of my children as may then have departed this life, in equal shares and proportions for ever, such children of my said deceased children nevertheless taking only per stirpes and not per capita." By a second codicil, dated the 22nd of February, 1850, to her said will, the testatrix, after fully reciting the said bequest contained in her will, proceeded thus:—"Now I hereby confirm the said bequest of one thousand pounds, Three per Centum Consolidated Bank Annuities, except as to the trusts upon which the same was so bequeathed, and which I hereby revoke, and in lieu thereof I will and direct that the said John Fenwick and Jonathan Thompson shall stand possessed of the said sum of one thousand pounds so bequeathed to them as aforesaid, upon the trusts following (that is to say) upon trust to pay, apply, and dispose of the dividends and annual proceeds thereof, as and when the same shall become due and payable for and towards the maintenance and education of my said granddaughter Catherine Lowdon, until she attains the age of twenty-two years, and when and so soon as my said granddaughter attains the said age of twenty-two years, upon trust to pay the dividends and annual proceeds thereof as and when the same shall become due and payable unto my said granddaughter Catherine Lowdon, to and for her own use and benefit, and without the same or any part thereof being subject or liable to the contract debts or engagements of any husband she may marry, for and during the term of her natural life; and in the event of my said granddaughter, Catherine Lowdon, dying either under or above the age of twenty-two years, leaving lawful issue, then in trust for all and every the children or child of my said granddaughter Catherine Lowdon, and if more than one, in equal shares, as tenants in common, but in case my said granddaughter Catherine Lowdon shall depart this life without leaving lawful issue, then in trust for my children living at the time of her death, and the children of such of my children as may then have departed this life in equal shares and proportions for ever, such children of my said deceased children nevertheless taking only per stirpes and not per capita." The testatrix executed another codicil, dated the 3rd of March, 1851, and which was in these words:—"I declare this is the last codicil to the will and testament of me, Catherine Rumney, of, &c. to say I have altered my views respecting my dear granddaughter, Catherine Lowdon, respecting the thousand pounds as left in my will, and which I now think might prove a snare for her; I now leave five hundred pounds for schooling and board, when at a proper age to be sent to a respectable place for useful teaching under the sanction of my trustees and friends, Mr. John Fenwick, and Mr. Jonathan Thompson, which my other friends and her aunt I hope will approve on." The testatrix died shortly after the date of the last codicil. The question arising in this suit was as to the effect of the last codicil, viz. whether the bequest of 500*l*. was additional or substitutionary.

Malins and Smythe for the trustees.

Martineau, for the residuary legatees, contended that the bequest by the codicil was in substitution for the 1,000*l*. previously given. He cited Heming v. Clutterbuck, 1 Bligh, N.S. 479; Fraser v. Byng, 1 Russ. & Myl. 90; Kidd v. North, 2 Ph. 91; and Russell v. Dickson, 2 Dr. & War. 133.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that it was of course impossible upon such instruments as these, to be sure that the Court can put a construction which would fully carry into effect the testatrix's intention. There was first a gift by the will of 1,000*l*. which was to become absolute on the legatee's attaining the age of twenty-two years, and the income until that period was to be applied for her maintenance. In the second codicil, the testatrix said, "I hereby confirm the said bequest of 1,000*l*. Three per Cent. Consolidated Bank Annuities, except as to the trusts upon which the same was so bequeathed, and which I hereby revoke, and in lieu thereof," &c.; and then she went on to declare the trusts of the 1,000*l*. by which in effect the legatee took a life interest, with a provision for maintenance, and then for her children. Under the will and this codicil, then, there was a provision for the maintenance of this legatee until twenty-two; then a life interest to her, and then the capital to her children; and then came another codicil, in which occurred these words:—"I declare this is the last codicil to the last will and testament of me, Catherine Rumney, to say I have altered my views respecting my dear granddaughter respecting the 1,000*l*. as left in my will, and which I now think might prove a snare for her." The testatrix said that she had altered her views. There was no reference made to the former codicil, but it was an alteration of her views as to what was in the will. His Honour could not speculate on a revocation. He saw nothing to revoke the provisions made for the children of the legatee by the codicil. Whether she had the codicil before her or not, he could not tell. She said, "I now leave 500*l*. for schooling and board, when at a proper age to be sent to a respectable place for useful teaching." Whether she meant 500*l*. in addition to the 1,000*l*. or in substitution for 500*l*. part of the 1,000*l*. he was unable to say, but there was nothing to revoke the codicil, and there was a substitutionary gift for 500*l*. given by the will, which according to the rule of law was not in substitution for the gift in the codicil for another purpose, and not being at all sure, his Honour thought that the 500*l*. was given substantively, and the 1,000*l*. in accordance with the former codicil.

MEYER v. SIMONSON.

Will—Tenant for life—Conversion of property.

A testator gave the residue of his property to his wife and to any persons who might be executors or trustees of his will upon trust to pay to or permit his wife to receive the income and profits thereof so long as she continued his widow, and after her decease upon trust for other persons. A sum of 12,000*l. the testator's share of the capital of a partnership, was, after the testator's death, secured to be paid to his estate according to the articles of partnership by the warrant of attorney of the surviving partner in the following manner. The capital was to be paid off by annual instalments of* 1,500*l. and interest at* 5*l. per cent. per annum was payable on the debt until discharged:*

Held, that the widow was entitled to 4*l. per cent. only of the interest, the remaining* 1*l. per cent. being treated as capital and to be invested, the widow having the interest of such investment.*

Solomon Meyer, by his will dated the 19th of February, 1819, after bequeathing certain legacies, proceeded as follows:—"I give, devise, and bequeath all the rest, residue, and remainder of my real and personal estate and effects whatsoever and wheresoever, unto my said wife and to any person or persons who may be executor or executors, trustee or trustees of this my will, and their heirs, executors, and administrators for and during the term of her natural life, if she shall so long continue my widow upon trust to pay to or permit her, my said wife, to receive the income and profits thereof for her use and benefit so long as she shall continue my widow, and from and after her decease," &c. and the testator appointed his said wife, Gusta Meyer, sole executrix of his will. The testator died in August, 1850, and his will was proved by Gusta Meyer. By articles of partnership dated the 4th of January, 1850, and made between the testator of the one part and Meyer Meyer of the other part, after reciting (among other things) that it had been agreed that the share of the said S. Meyer of and in the said capital stock of the said copartnership should consist of 12,000*l*. it was agreed (among other things) that in case either of the said parties should depart this life during the said copartnership, then the heirs, executors, or administrators of such deceased partner should immediately thereupon transfer and deliver over to the surviving partner the whole of the effects of the copartnership; and that thereupon the surviving partner should execute a warrant of attorney to the legal personal representative or representatives of such deceased partner, with a judgment thereon to be then entered up to secure the payment of the whole and entire amount and capital, sum of money which should have been carried to the credit of such deceased partner in the ledger of the said co-partnership on the last yearly settlement of accounts preceding the death of such partner, with such qualification as therein mentioned, and that such warrant or warrants of attorney respectively should contain a defeazance specifying the mode of payment of such sums or sum of money with interest thereon at the rate of 5*l*. per cent. per annum in manner following,—that is to say, the sum of 1,500*l*. part thereof at the expiration of twelve calendar months following such decease as aforesaid, and the sum of 1,500*l*. at the expiration of each succeeding twelve calendar months, until the whole of such capital amounts or sums so to be ascertained by the ledger as aforesaid, with interest as aforesaid, should be fully paid. By agreement between the executrix and the surviving partner the amount of 12,000*l*. was to be paid to the testator's estate, and accordingly by a warrant of attorney, dated the 22nd of January, 1851, and upon which judgment was entered up, the said sum of 12,000*l*. and interest at 5*l*. per cent. per annum was secured to be paid by Meyer Meyer, by the instalments mentioned in the articles of co-[illegible]. The question submitted by this special case for the opinion of the Court, was whether Gusta Meyer, the widow, was entitled to the whole of the interest payable by the surviving partner, and if not, what part was to be considered interest, and what part capital.

Waley appeared for the widow.

Goldsmid, for the persons entitled in remainder.

Waley, in reply.

The following cases were cited:—Howe v. Lord Dartmouth, 7 Ves. 137; Mills v. Mills, 7 Sim. 501; Fearns v. Young, 9 Ves. 549; Taylor v.

Clark, 1 Hare, 161; and Sutherland v. Cocke, 1 Coll. 498.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that the question in this case was a question familiar to this Court, viz. how to deal with a residue as between tenants for life and those entitled in remainder, where the will contained no direction to convert the property. The case of Howe v. Lord Dartmouth seemed to contain the whole rule applicable to such cases, and the only difficulty was in applying that rule in particular instances. Residuary estate might, for this purpose be considered to consist of three classes; first, what was found at the testator's death invested in such securities as the Court could adopt, as money in the funds or on real securities, and these the tenant for life was entitled to take in specie; secondly, that property which could be sold, having due regard to the interests of parties, and not to sacrifice anything by a forced sale; as to this property, the rule was clear, it must be converted, and the produce invested in permanent securities, and the tenant for life was entitled to the income of such investments; the third class consisted of property not capable, in a reasonable course of administration, of immediate conversion, which was the position of property such as that in the present case. Here there was money reasonably well secured, payable at deferred periods, which could not be immediately sold without involving a sacrifice of both principal and interest. The rule of the Court in such a case was to take the present value of the testator's interest, and to give the tenant for life the full income of that present value; and that was all, as his Honour understood the rule, that the tenant for life was entitled to. In the present case part of the estate was out on personal security, and was payable by annual instalments, and was producing interest at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. It might have been to remain out for a longer period, or there might be a valid contract to pay a larger rate of interest, as 10*l.* per cent.; and the result of Mr. Waley's argument would be that the tenant for life would be entitled to the whole of the income so produced during that period. His Honour did not think that that was the rule of the Court. The testator had entered into a beneficial contract, which increased the value of the residue, but not in the shape of capital. The case could not be stated more beneficially for the tenant for life than by assuming that the debt was well secured, and was sure to be repaid, without any loss of capital. Assuming that to be so, his Honour did not think that the tenant for life could be allowed to have the whole interest of 5*l.* per cent. payable upon the debt: that would clearly be giving her more than a life interest in the present value of the property. (Fearns v. Young, 9 Ves. 549; Caldecott v. Caldecott, 1 Y. & C. 312, 737), and similar cases proceeded upon the principle that 4*l.* per cent. upon the present value, was the amount of interest to which the tenant for life was entitled. Of this interest, then, of 5*l.* per cent. the tenant for life would have as much as she was entitled to, by her taking 4*l.* per cent. upon the sum secured, the remaining 1*l.* per cent. to be invested from time to time, she being entitled to the income arising from that investment, and also from the investments of the instalments of the debt from time to time paid.

Re TINKLER'S TRUST.
Annuity payable out of corpus.

Where real estate had been devised charged with an annuity, with powers of distress and entry, and a railway company had taken a portion of the estate, and paid the purchase-money into Court, the Court directed the sum to be paid to the annuitant in discharge of the arrears of her annuity.

This was a petition presented by Mrs. Tinkler, an annuitant, under the following circumstances:—By his will, dated in January, 1840, R. Tinkler devised real estate to certain uses charged with an annuity of 100*l.* a year to his wife during her life or widowhood, with powers of distress and entry. The testator died soon after the date of his will. The rents of the devised real estates were insufficient for the discharge of the annuity, and an arrear of upwards of 300*l.* became due to Mrs. Tinkler. The Great Northern Railway requiring some portion of the devised land, paid into court the sum of 262*l.* in respect of the purchase-money. The petition prayed that this sum of 262*l.* might be paid to her.

C. J. Simpson, in support of the petition, cited Greathead v. Elliott, 15 Jur. 986; 18 Law T. Rep. 71.

Hislop Clarke, for the devisees, contended that the petitioner was entitled only to the income arising from the fund.

A. J. Lewis for the company.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said, that although the Court would not sell the estates for the purpose of paying off the arrears, yet, as by means of the powers of distress and entry, the devisee could not touch any of the rents until the arrears were discharged, the annuity was in a sense charged on the corpus. Although the Court would not sell at the instance of the person having powers of distress and entry, yet here there had been a compulsory sale, and he thought that the money produced by such sale was available for the payment of the arrears, and the order should therefore be for payment of the fund to Mrs. Tinkler.

Re JAMES'S TRUST.
Trustee Act, 1850.

Where the Court had declared a person a trustee, and directed him to surrender certain copyholds, it was, upon evidence that he could not be found, ordered that a person be appointed to surrender the lands in his stead.

This was a petition presented for the purpose of having a person appointed to surrender certain copyhold lands in the place of a Mr. Phelps, who had been declared by the Court to be a trustee of the lands, and had been ordered to surrender them. From affidavits filed in support of the petition, it appeared that Phelps, who had been described as a solicitor at Newport, in Monmouthshire, was not now known there, and had left no address at the Post-office; and also that it was uncertain whether he was in England or abroad, but that if he was still in England he was avoiding his creditors and could not be found.

W. M. James appeared in support of the petition.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said, that as Phelps had been declared a trustee, the petitioner was entitled, upon the evidence, to an order for the appointment of some person to surrender in the place of Phelps.

MAGAN v. MAGAN.
General Order, 11th November, 1841—Motions of course—Irregularity.

In a cause attached to one of the Vice-Chancellor's courts, an order of course may be obtained in the court of any other Vice-Chancellor.

The word "had," in the above general order to be read "heard."

Semble.—The insertion of seven days instead of eight days in an order nisi is not such an irregularity as renders it void.

An order nisi had been obtained as of course before one of the Vice-Chancellors for a sequestration against the defendant (a member of Parliament) for not putting in his answer. The cause was attached to the Court of another Vice-Chancellor. It had now been transferred to this Court. Seven days to shew cause against making the order absolute had been inserted in the order nisi by mistake: it should have been eight days. Eight days having now expired,

C. Hall moved to make the order nisi for a sequestration absolute, which was granted.

H. Nichols then moved to discharge the order nisi for irregularity, as having been improperly obtained in the court of the Vice-Chancellor, to which the cause was not attached. By the fifth General Order of the 11th November, 1841, it is provided, "That all motions, petitions, and further proceedings in causes in the Lord Chancellor's Court (except any motions or proceedings which are now part heard) shall be had before the judge to whose court the same shall, under the provisions of these orders, be attached, unless removed therefrom by any special order of the Lord Chancellor." He therefore contended that motions of course were included in the terms of this order, and that the one in the present case should have been made in the court to which the cause was attached:—Another ground of irregularity upon the face of the order nisi was, that only seven days were given to shew cause, which should have been eight days. See 2 Dan. Pract. 1 edit. 652.

Forster, contrà, contended that the 5th order of November, 1841, did not include orders of course, but left the practice as it was under the general orders of the 5th May, 1837, by which motions of course are allowed to be made before any of the judges of the court. As to the second point, eight days had expired before the motion to make the order nisi absolute had been made.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The first ground upon which it is contended that this order is erroneous is that it had been obtained in the court of Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce, to whose court the cause was not attached, and that was founded on the 5th order of November 1841, which no doubt in terms directs that all motions, petitions, and other proceedings should be heard before the judge to whose court the cause should be attached. He said he had no doubt that the order in terms included all motions; but then it directs that they shall be "heard," and the question is whether that applies to orders made upon motions, &c. merely matters of course. Now, by the 26th order of 1850 it is directed that any order merely of course may be discharged by the judge to whose court the cause is attached. It thereby assumes that all orders merely of course may be properly made by a judge in a different court, and that it appears to me puts an interpretation on the 5th order of November, 1841, and to shew that that order did not allude to orders of course. As to the other ground, the question is whether seven days being inserted in the order nisi instead of eight, vitiates it, and, therefore, ought to be discharged. The party should have applied to discharge it before the time for making it absolute had expired. The answer ought to have been put in long since. It is not now filed. I think it is not such an irregularity as warrants me in discharging it.

Motion dismissed with costs.

Practice—New trustee.

The application to confirm a Master's report approving of a new trustee must be made by motion, and not by petition.

A petition praying that the Master's report, approving a new trustee, should be confirmed, had been presented, and now came on to be heard. A reference had been made to the Master to approve of a new trustee; he had done so, and had granted a certificate to that effect.

C. Hall in support of the petition.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that he had some time since communicated with Vice-Chancellor Turner on this subject, and he believed with the other judges, and it had then been settled that these applications should be made by motion and not by petition.

JUDGES' CHAMBERS.

Monday, July 26.
(Before ERLE, J.)
MILLER and OTHERS v. CONWAY and BROWN.

Writ of summons—Description of defendant's residence, or supposed residence—Uniformity of Process Act—What sufficient to satisfy the statute and rule of Court, as to the "supposed residence" in describing a party in the writ.

This was an application by the defendant Brown to set aside the writ of summons, and copy and service, on him for irregularity; on the ground that neither the place of his residence, or supposed residence, nor the place where he was, or was supposed to be, was mentioned in the writ and copy. The application was also in the alternative, to set aside the service, and copy, on the applicant, the other defendant not having been served, and was founded on the uniformity of Process Act, 2 Wm. 4, c. 39, s. 1, which enacts that in every writ of summons and copy, the place and county of the residence, or supposed residence, of the defendant, or wherein he shall be, or be supposed to be, shall be mentioned; and if this be omitted, or insufficiently stated, the process shall be set aside. R. M. 3 Wm. 4, c. 10.

The affidavit of the defendant, upon which the application was founded, stated the actual residence of the defendant to be at a different place from that described in the writ, and distant ten miles therefrom, but in the same county; and that the description "Llanhiddel," in the county of Monmouth, of which place he was described in the writ, was unknown to the defendant, but that he knew a parish of that name, or sometimes called so, but did not reside there, or within ten miles of it.

From an affidavit in support of the writ it appeared that the plaintiffs were assignees of one Budgen, a bankrupt, formerly of the place called "Llanhiddel," and were suing as such for a claim alleged to be due to the bankrupt's estate, the official assignee (being the moving party in collecting the assets of the estate) residing at Bristol. That previous to the commencement of the action the attorney of the plaintiffs, who also resided at Bristol, wrote to the defendants, on the subject of the claim for which the action was brought, addressing the letter to them at "Llanhiddel," of which place they were described in the writ, and that the defendants by return of post replied to the application, referring to their attorneys for an undertaking to appear; that such undertaking was applied for but refused to be given, and the writ was accordingly issued, describing the defendants as of "Llanhiddel aforesaid, being the place to which the deponent had written and addressed the said letter so received and acknowledged by them, and which said place deponent for this reason fully believed and understood was the residence of the said defendants," and that at the time of instructing the writ to be issued and served the deponent "supposed and fully believed that the address 'Llanhiddel,' of which place the said defendants are therein described, was the place of residence and business of the said defendants, and the proper address to be inserted in the writ;" and that such supposition was founded principally on the fact of the letter of application sent to the defendants by the address of which they were described having been received and replied to by them, and deponent had in consequence no doubt or hesitation in describing them in the writ as of that place.

The summons was therefore opposed, principally on the ground that this was sufficient to satisfy the statute and rule of Court as to the description, being the "supposed residence" of the defendants or wherein they were, or were "supposed to be" residing at the time of the issuing of the writ.

Erle, J. observed, that if a person had been seen on the top of a coach in the Haymarket, the plaintiff might describe him of "the Haymarket, in the county of Middlesex," and the plaintiff might suppose him to reside in the Haymarket, and that it had been so held. Upon the merits as disclosed by the affidavits, his lordship observed, it was a "bad case" as regards the defendants, and dismissed the application with costs. The summons did not ask for costs.

Summons dismissed, with costs.

SHERIFFS' COURT.

(Before Russell Gurney, Esq.)

Thursday, Aug. 26.

Dossett v. Rymill and Another.

A. hired a horse and gig of B. and the same day pledged it with C. an innocent party for value. After some inquiries made, B. demands the restitution of them from C. who offers to restore them on being satisfied of B.'s right to recover. A magistrate's order is then obtained by B. under 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71, s. 40, compelling C. to deliver the goods to B. which order is immediately complied with by C. A. was, subsequently to this order, tried and convicted on the evidence of B. and C. of stealing the horse and gig, and after such conviction B. enters a plaint against C. for special damage arising from the detention of the goods prior to such restitution:

Held, first, that the order under 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71, s. 40, afforded no defence to the plaint.

Secondly, that there was no evidence of a conversion by C. so as to enable B. to recover in this action.

On the 7th of May, 1852, one Rawlings hired of the plaintiff, a livery stable-keeper, a horse and gig for a few hours, giving a false address. The same day he deposited the horse and gig with Messrs. Rymill and Gower, the defendants, who advanced him 6*l.* upon the security. Ten days afterwards the plaintiff traced out the horse and gig and demanded them of the defendants, who refused to give the same up until satisfied of the plaintiff's right. The plaintiff then applied to a magistrate and obtained an order under the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71, s. 40, for the delivery of the goods, which the defendants at once complied with. Rawlings was not taken into custody until after such restitution of the goods, but was then duly committed for trial and subsequently convicted upon the evidence of the plaintiff and the defendants and their servants.

Pulling, for the defendants, submitted that under these circumstances the plaintiff must be nonsuited. The order of the magistrate, under the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71, was a bar to the present plaint. It was in the nature of a judgment recovered for the goods which formed the subject-matter of the present proceedings. (Comyn's Digest, Action K, 3.)

The learned Judge held that inasmuch as no special damages for the detention could be awarded by the magistrate, his order was no bar.

Pulling then urged that inasmuch as the demand by the plaintiff was previous to the conviction of Rawlings, and the defendants had only refused to give up the goods until satisfied of the plaintiff's right to them, there was no evidence of a conversion so as to entitle the plaintiff to recover the present action. (Green v. Dunn, 2 Campb. 216, note.)

The learned Judge held that the refusal of the defendants to deliver the goods did not, under the circumstances, amount to a conversion; and that the defendants having done all in their power to insure justice being done between the plaintiff and Rawlings, could not be held liable to the plaintiff.

Verdict for defendants.

SUPREME COURT, SYDNEY, NEW SOUTH WALES.

(Before the three Judges.)

Saturday, May 1.

Ex parte Smith, re Mercantile Marine Act.

Stephen, C.J. delivered the judgment of the Court in this case as follows:—

The question in this case is brought before us under the local Act, commonly called the Prohibition and Amendment Act, s. 12, by which an appeal is in effect given to the Supreme Court from all convictions by justices in the exercise of their summary jurisdiction: the party complaining having been convicted by two justices, under the Mercantile Marine Act of 1850, s. 70, of having deserted from the ship Thomas Arbuthnot, he being at the time a seaman belonging to that vessel. The fact of the man's desertion was not denied; but it is contended on his behalf, that the agreement for service entered into by him, and of which the breach is complained of, does not contain the particulars required by the said Act, sec. 46, and so, that his absence from such service is justifiable, or, at any rate, is not liable to summary punishment, under sec. 70. It appears to us most clearly, that if the agreement does not contain those particulars, the seaman is not so liable. The enactment, in express terms, applies only to those who have signed the agreement as required; which must be understood to mean, in the form and manner, and to the effect required. The question to be determined, therefore, is, whether the agreement entered into in this case does, in fact, answer that description. In other words (for nothing turns on the mere form or manner), does the agreement contain the necessary particulars which sec. 46 of the Act requires? Now, that section requires the agreement to set forth, among other things, the following,—"The nature and (as far as practicable) the length of the voyage or engagement on which the ship is to be employed." And the agreement here is, as to that matter, in the following words:—"From London to Plymouth and Sydney, and from thence wherever freight or employment offers—forwards and backwards, and backwards and forwards, in any rotation, and back to her final port of discharge in the United Kingdom, calling at all necessary ports. The voyage not to exceed three years." It was insisted that this description of engagement, or voyage, is too vague and indefinite; and several cases were cited (The Countess of Harcourt, 1 Hag. Adm. 248; The Minerva and George Home, in the same book, 361, 375; and of the Westmoreland, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 216) in support of that position. In deciding the question thus raised, it will be necessary to consider the terms of the Act of Parliament, on which the question arose in those cases; as well as the terms and nature of the particular agreement, to which they severally had reference. At the date of the decision of the three first cases, the Act in force was the 2 Geo. 2, c. 36; by which "the voyage," was required to be expressed. Something determinable, therefore, and specific, was obviously here intended; a statement, as Lord Stowell expresses it, of "the extent," of the voyage; the "precise voyage" contracted for. As to that, however, in the first case, nothing whatever turned on it. The voyage described was from London to Van Diemen's Land, viâ Cork, or elsewhere, and back to London." The ship arrived in the Downs, and the master went up to London; and then, he claimed to take the vessel on to Holland. But the Court held that this was an alteration of the voyage; and consequently not within the contract. The decision, therefore, was not on the ground of indistinctness, or too much generality; but because, simply, the described voyage was at an end. In the case of the Minerva, however, in which the words "or elsewhere," were relied on, the objection of indistinctness was certainly sustained. There was much dispute whether these words had not been interpolated. But Lord Stowell held that, even if originally in the contract, they could only be taken to include such places as were within the natural course of the voyage specified; and that, if construed otherwise, they would be so indefinite as to amount to no description at all. In the case of the George Home, the agreement was too vague and loose to admit of doubt. It was for a voyage "from London to Batavia, and any ports or places in the East India seas or elsewhere, or until her final arrival at any port or ports in Europe." Here, obviously, everything was uncertain. No ultimate port is specified; and there is neither limit to the duration, nor clue to the extent, of the engagement. The case, therefore, one would have supposed, was too clear for controversy; and it seems too isolated in character, to be useful as an authority now. The law then in force required a statement, not of the nature only, or duration of the voyage, but of the voyage itself. It was not possible, therefore, to hold otherwise, than that such a description was a mockery and a snare. Such a description, said Lord Stowell, does by no means answer the purposes for which the law requires the voyage to be made known to the mariner. Those purposes are, "that he may know as exactly as can be described, for what probable space of time he surrenders himself—his services, his interest, his domestic comforts, his health, and personal convenience." "He has a right to be informed, as far as competent accuracy can be applied to the subject." Lord Stowell adds—"It may truly and justly be said that cases may occur, in which the exigencies of commerce may not admit of such accuracy;" but the seaman should receive "full information of all which it imports him to know, in order to determine his mind upon the propriety of his engagement." The general rule is then thus stated, that there must be precision, "as far as is practicable." Such is Lord Stowell's exposition of the law in the year 1825, under the enactments in force at that period. Ten years afterwards was passed Sir James Graham's Act, the 5 & 6 Wm. 4, c. 19; by the 2nd section of which, not the voyage, but "the nature of the voyage" is required to be stated. And the section declares the object of that statement to be, "that the seaman may have some means of judging of the probable period for which he is likely to be engaged." Then, by section 3 (in connection with the schedule there referred to), a form of agreement is given; which provides for two modes of statement in these words:—"Here the intended voyage is to be described, as nearly as can be done, and the places at which it is intended that the ship shall touch; or, if that cannot be done, the nature of the voyage in which she is to be employed." In these enactments two circumstances are found, which appear to us to be worthy of note. First, the declared purpose of the enactment, requiring the nature of the voyage (or, according to the schedule, the voyage itself) to be stated in the agreement, is precisely that which Lord Stowell, as we have seen, had said was the object of the previously existing law. Secondly, the enactment (in the schedule) draws a distinction in terms between a voyage, or places at which the vessel is to touch, and the "nature" of a voyage; a distinction which we therefore conclude was intentional, and deemed important. We now come to the case of the Westmoreland, decided under the last-mentioned enactments; the authority of which has been much pressed on us. In that case the voyage described was, "from London to Swan River, and thence to any port in the Indian or Chinese Seas; and during her stay and trade there, until her return to a port of discharge in Great Britain, or the Continent of Europe. In either case, the voyage to end in Great Britain; and the term of time not to exceed three years." It appears from the report, that the ship returned, in fact, to Great Britain; that is to say, to Cowes—after which the master desired the crew to make sail for Holland. Some of the men, conceiving the voyage to be at an end, went on shore to get advice. This act was treated as a desertion; and the first question was, whether (supposing the voyage not to have terminated, and the agreement to be subsisting and valid) such an act was in truth a desertion. The second question was, whether, if a desertion, in point of fact, it was nevertheless punishable; that is to say, was or not the agreement void? The learned judge, Sir Stephen Lushington, held that the act did not amount to desertion. It became unnecessary, therefore, to pronounce any decision on the validity of the agreement; and the observations, consequently, made by that very distinguished person on that point should, perhaps, rather be regarded as the inclination of his opinion on a point not so fully considered as the former, than as a matured and deliberate judgment. But for the weight which must be ascribed to anything falling from a judge occupying so high a position, and of such eminent talents, we should have been disposed to think that the description of the voyage, in the case of the Westmoreland, was a sufficient compliance with the statute. Not only the primary voyage, but the final port of discharge, and places of intermediate trading, are set forth with considerable precision; and, at all events, are so far definitely stated, that, coupled with the expressed limitation of time, the declared object of the enactment would seem to have been attained. The question, whether the voyage had not, in fact, terminated by the arrival of the ship at Cowes, appears not to have been raised. The objection, however, which struck the mind of the learned judge, evidently was to the very comprehensive description of the port of discharge. And it probably was his opinion, looking at the terms of the schedule, that it is not sufficient to state the "nature" of a voyage, in any case where the course of the voyage itself can be described. If so, the invalidity of the agreement would be established on a ground apparently less assailable, than the one by which alone (according to the report) it seems to be vindicated. It is unnecessary to notice, with any particularity, the provisions in the next succeeding statute, the "General Merchant Seamen's Act" of 1844 (still for the most part in force, being the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 112), by which Sir James Graham's was repealed; because they are, as to the requisites of seamen's agreements, the same as the enactments preceding. The next is the "Mercantile Marine Act of 1850," on which the question in the present case depends. And we observe, in the first place, the important difference between this and the previous enactment, that there is here no schedule, or other provision, by which the words "nature of the voyage" are (as in Sir James Graham's Act) controlled, or affected in any manner. It is true that, by sec. 46, the "nature" as well as "length of the voyage," be specified. But, when we look to the

and find that the distinction (to which we have already adverted) is there clearly drawn, between the description of a voyage, and that of the nature of a voyage,—and when we at the same time bear in mind, that although (for a reason easily collected the object of requiring that description, namely, to enable the seaman to estimate the time, is now no longer expressed, yet Lord Stowell's declaration, of such being in fact the object, remains,—and when we perceive that, in the agreement before us, a seeking voyage is described, the limitation of which, in point of time, is defined, as well as the vessel's final port of discharge, we feel little difficulty in holding that the requisites of the Act of 1850 are satisfied; and, consequently, that the seaman who seeks our interposition has been rightly convicted. It is impossible to say, that the mariner does not in such a case know precisely the space of time for which, in the language of Lord Stowell, he surrenders himself. But, if he knows this, the object (according to the same eminent judge) is accomplished for which he receives information as to the voyage. If, on the other hand, as was well observed during the argument, it were required to particularise it by ports and places specially, there would be then no need to state the probable time; for the seaman could as easily estimate it in that case, as could his employer. The time, however (or, in other words, the expected length of the engagement), is in all cases to be stated or estimated; and this again supports the inference, that the voyage itself in detail need not, but that only its nature, coupled with the time, is required to be stated. Moreover, a new expression has been introduced. The enactment speaks of an "engagement," not "a voyage" merely. The difference may not be very material; for the engagement must, in its nature, be still of the same class or species of employment. But, by using a second term, in addition to that which alone was previously employed, the Legislature must be supposed to have had some object; and the only reasonable one would appear to have been, to give a greater latitude of construction to the thing or matter to be described. Nor is it altogether unimportant to observe, considering some of the topics which have been introduced, that although "Shipping Masters" may not be very superior people, and although, whatever their description or attainments, they probably might not interfere with sailors' agreements, merely because of their improvidence, yet much is done through the intervention of these functionaries, to prevent imposition on seamen, and take care that they shall, at the least, understand the engagements into which they enter. And, this being so, it is very difficult to believe that this man, when he signed the agreement now sought to be repudiated, did not in fact understand and approve of it; with sufficient knowledge at the time, common to sailors of any experience, to what extent and course of voyaging such an engagement was likely to expose him. The main ground, however, on which we rest our judgment, is this; that here the nature of the voyage (as distinguished from the course of the voyage, defined by its termini and intervening places of call), is sufficiently described, and that the duration of the voyage is distinctly and unequivocally described. The meaning of the Legislature, when it used the expression "nature" of the voyage, may be gathered from the language of the schedule, so often mentioned, and to which (as annexed to the Act of 1844) reference is made by the Act of 1850. In that schedule, a clear distinction is drawn between the voyage and places to be touched at in its course, and the nature of the voyage. That distinction must have been apprehended and considered by the Legislature which passed the Act of 1850; because they there, in sec. 20, refer to the schedule. But by sec. 2 of the Act to which that schedule is annexed, requiring a statement only of the nature of the voyage, it is plain that the sole object of that provision was, that the seaman might be enabled to judge of the probable duration of such voyage—not of the particular places to be visited during the voyage. Consequently, the statement of the nature of the voyage, mentioned in sec. 46 of the Act of 1850, may reasonably be concluded to have the same object—that of enabling the sailor to judge of the duration of the voyage. And the more so when we find, that whatever may be said of the voyage, whether its course or its nature, its expected length shall notwithstanding be specified also. Here the voyage was a seeking voyage—in search of employment, wherever likely to offer. The probable length of such a voyage, obviously, it is not practicable to mention. The agreement limits, therefore, a specific time which it shall not exceed. To hold, under such circumstances, that this is no compliance with the statute, would be equivalent to holding that the statute had prohibited such voyages altogether; a conclusion at which we could not arrive, without supposing that the Supreme Legislative Authority of the greatest commercial empire upon earth, was either ignorant of the mighty distant interests which are subject to its power, and of the exigencies of commercial pursuits and enterprise in these vast regions, or that it was indifferent to and careless alike of both It appears to have been thought, that the "comprehensive ambiguity" of terms such as we have been here discussing, was not necessary for any interests of commerce. The fact is far otherwise. To us who live among these rapidly-advancing communities, it is only matter of daily observation that new sources of wealth, new or expanding markets for commodities, new wants and the means of gratifying them, crowd our ports with vessels, which leave them again on voyages, which, before their crews left England, the owners never could have contemplated, and for which they could by no foresight, by any specific contracts, have provided. We have ships departing for China and India, and the various ports in those oceans, for New Zealand, for the Mauritius, for Valparaiso, or Lima, for California, and the thousand islands of the southern seas. And if seeking voyages, or such agreements as those of the Thomas Arbuthnot be prohibited, I would for myself say, that a blow will be struck at this extended and ever extending commerce, the evil effects of which may be felt for perhaps a generation.

The rule was therefore discharged, but their Honours refused to give costs, remarking that a person seeking his liberty ought not to be mulcted with costs except in extreme cases; and it could not be denied that the point involved in this case was one of much difficulty.

PROTECTION CASE.

Re DELEMERE.

A debtor who petitions under the Protection Statutes, who has no estate to administer, and who contracts a debt without probable expectancy of paying it, or by any false representation, will have his final petition refused and his petition dismissed.

The 90th and subsequent sections of the Irish Bankrupt Act up to sec. 107 inclusive, which are copied from the English Protection Statutes, enables any debtor who is unable to meet his engagements with his creditors to petition the Court for protection from arrest, having the concurrence of two-thirds in number and value of his creditors; and the commissioner, upon examining privately into the matter of the petition, may grant protection de bene esse. It is also enacted that, whatever resolutions the necessary number of creditors may come to, they are to be submitted to the commissioner for his approval, and at the meeting for that purpose any creditor may come in and oppose the granting final protection to the petitioner. The petitioner in the present case had obtained the necessary number of creditors to accept of the offer of composition made to them, and he had also obtained his order or protection de bene esse. A meeting was then held for the purpose of having the resolutions of creditors sanctioned by the commissioner and of obtaining his final protection.

Levy now opposed the petitioner on two grounds: first, that he had no estate to administer; secondly, and most important, that he had contracted the debt with his client by false representations as to his circumstances and solvency. It was laid down in Macrae's Practice under the Protection Statutes in England, that the Court should first consider for what purpose the petitioner came into Court,—was to divide his estate, or obtain protection against his creditors? In the present case there was no estate to administer, and the petitioner came there merely to accommodate himself. Then, with regard to the debt due to the opposing creditor, the petitioner represented at the time he contracted it that he was in solvent circumstances, and in partnership with his brother, who was a merchant in Liverpool. The creditor was then examined, and proved the fact as the representations of the petitioner. The goods sold by him was wine, for which the petitioner was to give a bill at three months,—he did give the bill, but post-dated it; this led to inquiry, and the creditor ascertained that he was insolvent at the time; he then sent him back his bill, and required the wine to be given up to him, but the petitioner refused to do so. This wine, which was valued at 40*l.* appeared to be the principal asset returned to meet debts to the amount of 1,000*l.* Under these circumstances, the petitioner appeared to be unworthy of the protection intended by the statute. (Re Reynolds, 13 Law T. 490; Re Watson, 14 Law T. 320.)

The COMMISSIONER said, on looking at the schedule attached to the petition he saw that the petitioner had hardly any estate to administer; at the same time, if the necessary number of creditors signed for him, he (the commissioner) thought the Court should pay due regard to that circumstance: but if there were really no assets to be divided, neither the petitioner nor creditors ought to trouble the Court with the case. But if a debtor whilst in a state of hopeless insolvency contracted a debt by a false statement as to his circumstances, he had no business coming before that Court. It further appeared that at the time the debt of the opposing creditor was contracted, Mr. Delemere had been sued for debts that he had no earthly means of paying. Coupling that circumstance with his statement that he was in partnership with his brother in Liverpool, no such partnership existing, it was impossible his petition could be entertained. Those who sought the protection of the Court under these sections of the statute, which were, to say the least, exceedingly complicated, should come before the Court with a case perfectly free from the slightest fraud.

INSOLVENCY COURT.

Reported by DAVID CATO MACRAE, Esq. of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law.

Monday, August 16.

(Before Mr. Commissioner LAW.)

Re THOMAS ASHBY.

The debts of an insolvent who has obtained a final order under the Protection Acts, must not be inserted in a subsequent schedule under the prison statute.

This insolvent came up to be admitted to bail until the day appointed for his hearing, under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. It appeared that four years ago he had been insolvent under the Protection Acts, and obtained his final order, and that he had inserted the official assignee in the present schedule for the amount of those debts.

Mr. Commissioner LAW ordered those debts to be struck out of the schedule, and excluded from the warrant of attorney which the insolvent must execute previous to his adjudication.

Re WILLIAM ROUTH.

Admission to bail—Outlawry—An outlaw may be admitted to bail.

This insolvent appeared to be admitted to bail till his hearing.

Dowse opposed the application, upon the ground that the insolvent was in custody upon a capias utlagatione, and was an outlaw, and had no civil rights. It was laid down in Tidd's Practice, that in such a case a judge would not discharge under a certificate.

Mr. Commissioner LAW said it was a question of jurisdiction, and the nature of the detainer not being such as would prevent his ultimate discharge, it followed that it would not prevent his intermediate discharge. Objection overruled.

The insolvent was then discharged on bail till his hearing.

Note.—A doubt was at one time entertained, says Mr. Cooke, as to whether a person in custody upon a capias utlagatione could be heard in this court upon his petition, it being contended that outlawry had deprived him of all civil rights, and had debarred him from appearing in any court of justice to seek for any advantage or protection, save only in the court in which the original proceedings had been instituted against him, for the purpose of reversing the outlawry; but in the case of Lord Edward Thynne, the Court held that outlawry was for the purposes of this Act of Parliament to be considered simply as process, that the imprisonment could not be regarded in any other light than as one for the non-payment of money, and that consequently it fell within the provisions of the 7 Geo. 4, c. 57, s. 10, which are similar to those of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 35.

INSOLVENT DEBTORS COURT DUBLIN.

Re BRADSHAW.

Opposition—Payment by instalments.

The Court will not discharge an insolvent upon entering into an undertaking, to be made a rule of Court, to pay an opposing creditor by instalments, it being contrary to the principles of the Insolvent Law, even though that creditor is a menial servant.

Quæry, could the Court enforce such an undertaking after the insolvent obtained his discharge?

The insolvent, who was a dentist, was opposed by several creditors, who did not appear to have any specific grounds beyond the fact, that repeated promises of payment had been made which were never fulfilled. Amongst these was a servant woman, who resided with the insolvent, and to whom upwards of a year's wages were due.

Creighton, for the insolvent, said it was not the intention of his client to take his discharge from the debt due to the poor woman, although there was no fraud in contracting that or any other debt which the insolvent owed, and he proposed to enter into an undertaking, to be made a rule of Court, to pay it by monthly instalments, but it was necessary that he should take his discharge, as his professional pursuits and prospects would be much injured by being obliged to come before the Court again. There were no grounds whatever for refusing his discharge, but he would not take it without binding himself to pay the debt in question.

Mr. Commissioner BALDWIN said he did not recollect having ever heard of such a course being pursued. In the first place, it was contrary to the principles of the insolvent code to pay one creditor in preference to another; and in the second place, when the insolvent was discharged, what authority would the Court have to compel him to carry out such an undertaking?

Creighton.—The Court, he apprehended, would have the same power that any other Court had of issuing an attachment against a party in contempt; it would be a contempt of the Court if he did not fulfil his undertaking or shew cause to the contrary. There was the case of John Francis Walter, reported in 18 Law T. Rep. 20, where the English Insolvent Court discharged an insolvent on entering into such an undertaking.

Mr. Commissioner BALDWIN thought the English Insolvent Court sometimes made decisions that would be more honoured in the breach than the observance. He would, however, adjourn the case and let the insolvent arrange the debt without making the Court a party to it.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S COURT.

(Before Lord Chancellor TRURO.)

HUGHES v. WILLIAMS.

Dec. 2 and 3, 1850; Feb. 26, 1852.

Settlement of mortgaged estates—Covenant against incumbrances—Arrears of interest on legacy.

A. who was seised in fee of four estates, mortgaged two of them, and afterwards executed a settlement, on his marriage, of the mortgaged estates, and of one of the others, under which he took a life interest, with remainder to his son B. in tail. There was a covenant in the settlement by A. against incumbrances, but there was no recital shewing that there were any incumbrances. A. afterwards mortgaged the fourth estate, and took the benefit of the Insolvent Debtors Act. Soon afterwards a judgment-creditor, being also equitable mortgagee of a mining lease on one of the estates, filed a bill against A.'s assignee and B. the tenant in tail, and against the other incumbrancers, praying a sale in satisfaction of the judgment-debt, and of what the plaintiff might pay in discharge of prior incumbrances, subject to the estate and interest of B. under the settlement:

Held, reversing the decision of the Court below, decreeing foreclosure against B. that the settled estate must be regarded as exonerated from incumbrances as between A. the tenant for life, and B. the tenant in tail, and that the plaintiff was subject to the same equities as A. the settlor, and that the judgment being of a later date than the settlement, B. the tenant in tail, was not affected by such judgment.

One of the incumbrances on the estates was a legacy of 800l. subject to the payment of which the estates had been devised by the testator (who died in 1810) to A. The bill was filed in 1845, at which time neither the legacy nor any interest thereon had been paid:

Held, reversing the decision of the Court below, that only six years' arrears of interest previous to the filing of the bill could be recovered.

This was an appeal by the defendant, Edward Richard Rees, against a decree of Vice-Chancellor Wigram, first, upon the ground that it had improperly directed a foreclosure of certain settled estates, to which he was entitled as tenant in tail, under a settlement made by his father Edward Rees; secondly, upon the ground that the person who was an incumbrancer on the estates as a legatee under the will of his grandfather, the father of Edward Rees, had been allowed interest for a greater number of years than he was entitled to claim by the Statute of Limitations. The material circumstances of the case were as follows:—

In the year 1810, the grandfather of Edward Richard Rees, died, having devised his real property, which consisted of four estates, called Tycanol, Foesfack, Panthowell, and Caerdalen, to Edward Rees in fee, subject to a legacy of 800l. to the defendant, Catherine Rees, which remained unpaid at the date of the filing of the bill in 1845.

In 1818 Edward Rees mortgaged Tycanol and Caerdalen to R. B. Williams.

In 1822 Edward Rees executed a settlement on his marriage of three of the estates, viz. Tycanol, Panthowell, and Caerdalen, whereby they stood limited to himself for life, with remainder to Edward Richard Rees, the appellant in tail, and he thereby covenanted against all incumbrances made by himself, or any of his ancestors. There was no recital in the settlement that there were any incumbrances on the estate.

In the year 1823, Edward Rees granted a mining lease of certain collieries, under the Tycanol estate, to a person of the name of Thorpe; and in the year 1836, mortgaged Foesfack to Henry Lawrence.

In the year 1843 Elizabeth Hughes, as personal representative of David Hughes, to whom Edward Rees was indebted in certain bills of exchange, became a registered judgment creditor of Edward Rees, who deposited with Elizabeth Hughes Thorpe's lease, by way of equitable mortgage, and agreed to execute a legal mortgage thereof, as a collateral security for the payment of the judgment debt.

In the year 1844 Edward Rees took the benefit of the Insolvent Debtors Act, and Henry Chappell was appointed assignee of his estate and effects.

In the year 1845 the present bill was filed by Elizabeth Hughes against the several incumbrancers, and against Edward Richard Rees and Henry Chappell, praying, amongst other things, that an account might be taken of the debts due to her, and that it might be declared that she was entitled to a charge and an equitable mortgage, and that it might be ascertained whether the defendants, Williams and Lawrence, were entitled to any charge, and that an account might be taken of what, if anything, was due to Catherine Rees; and that the priority of the estates and charges might be ascertained, and that the plaintiff might be permitted to pay off the debts prior to her own, and that the defendants might be decreed to deliver up possession of, and to convey, the mortgaged premises to the plaintiff, and that what the plaintiff should pay in redemption might be added to her own debt, and that that sum might be raised and paid to her by sale of the hereditaments, or a sufficient part thereof, subject to the estates and interests therein of the issue of the said Edward Rees.

On the hearing, Vice-Chancellor Wigram, amongst other things, decreed that an account should be taken of what was due to Catherine Rees for principal and interest, such interest to be calculated from the end of one year after the testator's death; that an account should be taken of what was due to Williams and Lawrence; that on payment by the plaintiff to Catherine Rees, Williams, and Lawrence, they should release and convey; and that, in default of payment by the plaintiff to them, the bill should be dismissed; that in case Henry Chappell should pay the plaintiff what she should so pay to Catherine Rees, Williams, and Lawrence, and her own debt, the plaintiff should convey to Chappell, but that in default of his paying such sums to her, he should be foreclosed; that in case of such foreclosure, and of Edward Richard Rees paying such sum to the plaintiff, she should convey to him, but that in default of his paying those sums, he should be foreclosed.

Rolt, for the plaintiff, in support of the decree.

The Attorney-General and Pitman, for R. B. Williams, in the same interest.

Freeling, for Catherine Rees, and some other incumbrancers, contended, amongst other things, that the decree was right in giving interest to Catherine Williams for a year after the testator's death, and after commenting upon the 25th and 42nd sections of 3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 27, submitted that there was an express trust created with regard to the legacy within the meaning of the former section; and he cited Ward v. Arch, 12 Sim. 472; Young v. Lord Waterpark, 13 Sim. 201; Christ's Hospital v. Grainger, 1 Mac. & Gord. 460; Gough v. Bult, 26 L. J. 486.

J. Parker and Terrell, for the appellant, Edward Richard Rees, contended that the bill ought to have been dismissed as against him, and they cited and commented on Averall v. Wade, Llo. & Goo. 252, temp. Sug.; Ravald v. Russell, You. 9; Raffety v. King, 1 Keen, 601; 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 13.

Rolt, in reply, contended that the plaintiff was a purchaser without notice, and was therefore entitled to have the mortgages paid out of the estates generally, to be apportioned by the Master. (Neate v. The Duke of Marlborough, 3 Myl. & Cr. 407; Whitworth v. Gaugain, 1 Ph. 728.) With regard to the time from which interest ought to be paid on the legacy, he cited Philippo v. Munnings, 2 Myl. & Cr. 309; Hunter v. Nockolds, 1 Mac. & Gord. 640.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, after stating the before-mentioned facts, and the decree of the Vice-Chancellor, proceeded as follows:—The defendant, Edward Richard Rees, has appealed against the decree, to which he takes these several objections—First, that the interest on the legacy to Catherine Rees is to be calculated from the end of one year after the testator's death, instead of being confined to the period of six years allowed by the Statute of Limitations, 3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 27. Secondly, that, looking to the state of the pleadings and to the merits of the case, the plaintiff has no right to foreclose the appellant. Thirdly, that there is no reference as to the existence and priority of the incumbrances. Fourthly, that a sale would be the proper remedy, rather than a foreclosure. With regard to the first objection, as to the arrears of interest, this must have been an inadvertence in drawing up the decree. The Vice-Chancellor could not have intended to give interest for so long a period; that would have been contrary to one of his own decrees. I allude to Francis v. Grover, 5 Hare, 39. There a testator gave an annuity, and charged the same on his real estate, and then devised the estate to trustees on trust, subject to, and charged with, the annuity to and for the use of his grandson, and Sir James Wigram held that the grandson was not a trustee for the annuitant within the 25th section of the stat. 3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 27, or otherwise; and that under the 42nd section the annuitant could only recover arrears for six years before the filing of the bill. And this is not opposed to the case of Gough v. Bult, 26 L.J. Ch. 486, which was cited at the bar; for that was a case of express trust, and therefore held to be within the saving of the 25th section. With respect to the second objection, that the plaintiff had no right to foreclose the appellant, the state of the pleadings prevents the plaintiff from doing this. The statements and charges of the bill do not drop a single hint of any intention to ask any such decree against the appellant; and when the prayer, so far from seeking such a decree, does not point to any foreclosure at all, but expressly prays that what the plaintiff shall pay in redemption of the several charges may be added to what shall be found due to her; and that the same may be raised and paid by sale, subject to the estate and interest therein of the issue of the said Edward Rees, the son, surely if there ever was a case in which a defendant was liable to be taken by surprise, this is one. Not only is there an omission of any statement, or charge, or prayer applicable to the relief asked at the hearing, but there is a prayer of that which is absolutely inconsistent with that relief, and which expressly saves the rights of the appellant unprejudiced by the suit. I will not, however, dismiss the bill as against the appellant on the mere ground of pleading, because I am of opinion that the bill cannot be sustained against them on the merits; and I think it desirable to decide in favour of the appellant on the merits as well as on the ground of pleading, or rather than on that ground, in order to prevent the possibility of a new bill being filed against him. In the first place, the appellant is to be foreclosed, unless he pays what the plaintiff shall pay to Catherine Rees and R. B. Williams. Now, although their charges may be valid charges on the inheritance, inasmuch as the first was created by the will of Edward Rees, the father, who devised to Edward Rees, the son in fee, subject to the legacy to Catherine Rees; and inasmuch as the mortgage to R. B. Williams was made prior to the settlement by Edward Rees, the son, when he was owner of the fee, before he became tenant for life under the settlement, yet, as he covenanted against incumbrances made by himself or his ancestors, the settled estates must be regarded as exonerated from incumbrances as between himself and the appellant, who claims as a purchaser for valuable consideration under the settlement. The plaintiff is subject to the same equities as Edward Rees himself, and she is not in the situation of a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice, and cannot oblige the appellant to pay off incumbrances against which Edward Rees, the judgment debtor, covenanted by the settlement. To allow Edw. Rees himself to assert the validity of those incumbrances against the appellant would be most inequitable; and how, then, can his assignee, the judgment creditor and equitable mortgagee, who was bound by all the equities to which Edward Rees was subject, and advanced nothing on the security of the land, be in a better position than Edw. Rees? As between Edw. Rees, or the plaintiff as claiming under Edw. Rees, on the one hand, and the appellant as tenant in tail under the settlement on the other hand, I think the effect of the covenant against incumbrances in the settlement is to throw the incumbrances made prior to the settlement on the Foesfack estate, or on the life interest only of Edward Rees in the settled estate. I do not consider it necessary to produce any authority for this view, but a case was cited at the bar which seems to bear very strongly on the point; I allude to Averall v. Wade, Llo. & G. temp. Sug. 252. There a party seised of several estates, and indebted by judgment, settled one of the estates for valuable consideration, with a covenant against incumbrances, and subsequently acknowledged other judgments, and it was held that the prior judgments should be thrown altogether on the unsettled estates. The Lord Chancellor (Sir Edward Sugden) there observed, "Suppose there was no covenant in the settlement, a man seised of estates A. and B. both subject to a judgment debt, settles A. for valuable consideration, without notice of the judgment, the judgment creditor would be compelled to go against estate B. and the persons claiming under the settlement would be entitled to have the settled estates exonerated, at the expense of the unsettled estate; the judgment binds both, and, where there is a settlement of part of an estate, as if free from incumbrances, equity will throw the whole on the unsettled part, which still belongs to the original owner. Here there is a covenant that the estate is free from incumbrances; assuming that there was no such covenant, but a mere declaration that the estate was free from incumbrances, there can be no doubt that that declaration would throw the incumbrances on the unsettled estate. I cannot put the point on lower grounds, but I can put it on much higher. The covenant is enforced, not by giving damages, because this Court does not give damages, but according to the peculiar jurisdiction of this Court, by specifically doing that which ought to be done. I thought, therefore, that by reason of the covenant the judgment should be thrown altogether on the unsettled estate." Having now disposed of the question as to the foreclosure of the appellant on nonpayment of what may be due to Catherine Rees and R. B. Williams, it is only necessary to remark upon the question of the foreclosure of the appellant on non-payment of what may be due to Lawrence, that Lawrence's mortgage is only a mortgage of Foesfack, which is not in settlement, and in which the appellant has no interest; and that, therefore, to foreclose the appellant on non-payment of the debt to Lawrence seems to me to be clearly wrong. And as to the judgment debt itself, in respect of which the bill is filed, that being a debt of Edward Rees, the son, and being subsequent to the settlement, cannot affect the appellant. For these reasons, I think that the bill must be dismissed as against the tenant in tail; and, being of this opinion, and the tenant in tail being the sole appellant, it becomes unnecessary for me to consider the remaining objections which he has urged against the decree.

IN LUNACY.

Torbuck v. Hewitson

Re Hewitson.

Practice—Special case — Trustee Act—Married woman—Conveyance by a married woman of her legal estate in customary freeholds by deed enrolled—Extinguishment of a power of appointment by will.

The legal estate of a married woman, in customary freeholds, was vested in a lunatic trustee, in trust for the married woman, during the joint lives of herself and her husband, for her separate use (without restriction as to alienation or anticipation), with remainder in case she survived her husband, to her absolutely; but in case she died in his lifetime, to such uses as she should appoint, no trusts were declared in default of appointment. She mortgaged the estate by deed enrolled under the Fines and Recoveries Act.

The Court, on a petition under the Trustee Act, vested the legal estate in the mortgagee.

Mrs. Torbuck previously to her marriage, was seised of customary freeholds, held of the manor of Kirkby Stephen, in the county of Westmoreland, and by indenture of the 10th of April, 1818, conveyed them to a Mr. Hewitson, who, by an indenture of the same date declared that he held it upon trust for Mrs. Torbuck, for life to her separate use (without restriction as to alienation or anticipation), with a power of disposition by will; and in default of appointment, in case she survived her husband, to her absolutely. Mr. and Mrs. Torbuck had mortgaged the property, and were desirous of conveying the legal estate to the mortgagee. Mr. Hewitson having become of unsound mind, though not found lunatic by inquisition, an application was made for an order, under the Trustee Act, to appoint a person to convey in his place.

Toller supported the application.

The Lord Chancellor, on an ex parte application, and in the absence of all information touching the custom of the manor, refused to make the order, but gave leave to state a special case under Sir George Turner's Act. The petition to stand over until the special case was filed and both were to be heard together by his lordship.

Wednesday, July 28.—On this day the special case and petition were heard. It appeared to be the custom of the manor, in cases where married women conveyed the legal estate, for the steward to examine them as to their consent, and, if given, to endorse a memorandum to that effect on the deed of conveyance. The deed was then presented at the next Court, and the alienee admitted.

Toller appeared for all the parties interested except the lunatic trustee;

Bickner appeared for him, but was not called on.

The Lord Chancellor said that this appeared to be the conveyance of an estate by bargain and sale and admittance, and that no surrender ...... necessary. The custom of the manor was not to admit on surrender. His lordship having explained the trusts of the deed, said, that the result of the limitations upon which the estate was settled had, in default of appointment by Messrs. Torbuck, the effect of vesting in her the fee. The question was, had she extinguished the power of appointment by will; he was of opinion that she had. If this had been a freehold estate, she would have barred it, and the Act of Parliament did not touch the case. The Act 3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 77, provided that the Act should not extend to lands held by copy of court-roll, of or to which a married woman, or she and her husband, in her right might be seised in any case in which any of the objects to be effected could have been effected by surrender into the hands of the lord of the manor of which the lands might be parcel. The provisions of that Act applied only to estates which passed by surrender; the result therefore was, that she had barred her power, and had converted the estate into a fee-simple. The case was within the Act, and not within the saving, and it was a case in which he should make the order as prayed.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

Reported by Owen Davies Tudor, Esq. of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law.

(Before the Lords Justices.)

Tuesday, July 20.

Re The Great Western Extension Atmospheric Railway Company, and Re The Joint Stock Winding-up Acts, 1848 and 1849, ex parte Wryghte.

Winding-up Acts—Claim against individual contributories.

Where a company or association is ordered to be wound up, the Master has no jurisdiction under the order, to take cognizance of a claim not alleged to be due from the company, but only from individual members of it.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Master charged with the winding up of the Great Western Extension Atmospheric Railway Company, who had refused to admit a claim brought in by Mr. Wryghte, the official manager of the Tring, Reading, and Basingstoke Railway Company, which was then being wound up, for the payment of two sums of 2,000*l.* and 500*l.* advanced, as it was alleged, by the directors of the latter to the directors, and for the use, of the former company. The circumstances of the case are as follows:—On the 23rd of October, 1845, at a meeting of the directors of the Tring, Reading, and Basingstoke Railway Company, a resolution was passed, that 2,000*l.* should be lent and advanced to the directors of the Great Western Extension Atmospheric Railway Company, upon their personal responsibility, for a time not exceeding three months, at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum; and the solicitor of the company was authorised to carry out an arrangement for completing the loan. Accordingly on the following day 2,000*l.* were advanced and lent out of the assets of the company to the directors of the Great Western Extension Atmospheric Railway Company: and the following memorandum signed by twelve of the twenty-one directors of the latter company was delivered to G. P. Hill, esq. the solicitor of the former company, by way of security.

"Great Western Extension Railway Company,

"To G. P. Hill Esq. Oct. 27, 1845.

"In consideration of your lending and advancing to us, the undersigned, the sum of 2,000*l.* we hereby jointly and severally guarantee to you the repayment of the same, with interest at 5 per cent. per annum, within three months from the date hereof."

On the 28th November, 1845, the Directors of the Tring, Reading, and Basingstoke Company passed the following resolution:—"Resolved, That the sum of 500*l.* be lent to the Great Western Extension Railway Company, on the guarantee given to Mr. Hill on behalf of the company, the solicitor undertaking to produce the 500*l.* whenever wanted for the purposes of this company at a week's notice." Thereupon, on the same day, a sum of 500*l.* part of the assets of the Tring, Reading, and Basingstoke Company, was lent to the Great Western Extension Atmospheric Company; and the following memorandum, signed by ten out of the twenty-one directors of the Great Western Extension Atmospheric Railway Company, was delivered to Mr. Hill, as solicitor of the Tring, Reading, and Basingstoke Railway Company, by way of security for the payment of such sum of 500*l.*

"Great Western Extension Railway Company.

"To Mr. G. P. Hill.

"In consideration of your advancing and lending to us 500*l.* we hereby jointly and severally promise and undertake to repay to you that sum, with 5 per cent. interest, on the 1st day of February next.—Dated the 24th November, 1845."

The money advanced upon these guarantees, at any rate the greater part thereof, was used for the purposes of the company.

On the 27th July, 1849, the Great Western Extension Atmospheric Railway Company was ordered to be wound up, and on the 23rd November following, an official manager was appointed.

Early in June 1849, the Tring, Reading, and Basingstoke Railway Company was ordered to be wound up, and soon after Mr. Wryghte, who was chosen official assignee, brought into the Master's office an affidavit to prove a debt of 2,500*l.* against the Great Western Extension Atmospheric Railway Company, being the sum advanced under the before-mentioned guarantees, the whole of which was then due and owing to the company he represented. In December 1851, when the matter came on before the Master, Mr. Wryghte not appearing, his claim was disallowed. But he was again allowed to make his claim before the Master on the 15th of January, 1852, but as he came without the books of the company he represented, and had no other evidence of the debt which he alleged was due except the affidavit he had before brought into the office, his claim was again disallowed, the Master saying, "I adhere to my former decision, and have disallowed the claim, both for want of evidence and as being barred by the Statute of Limitations." A similar application to the Master by Mr. Wryghte on the 6th of February, 1852, was followed by the same result.

On the 15th of February, 1852, Mr. Wryghte appealed to Vice-Chancellor Parker, who seeming to consider that the objection of the Statute of Limitation was the sole ground of the Master's decision, reversed it, as he held that the statute would cease to run, if not from the date of the winding-up order, at any rate from the time when the affidavit of the debt was carried into the Master's office, and he referred back the matter to the Master to review his decision.

The matter accordingly came on before the Master on the 4th of June, 1852, when it appears to have been considered that, according to the decision in Lloyd's case, 1 Sim. 248, N.S. that though the claim could not be proved against the company, it might be proved against the individuals who had made themselves liable by signing the guarantees, and who, together with the other nine directors of the company, constituted the body of contributories put on the list by the Master, as liable to the debts of the company. Leave was thereupon given to Mr. Wryghte, upon giving due notice to the parties to be charged thereby, to carry in an amended claim before the Master. Accordingly, on the 17th June, 1852, Mr. Wryghte carried in the following claim:—"The said W. C. Wryghte, as such official manager as aforesaid, claims of the following parties, as contributories in the above-mentioned Great Western Extension Atmospheric Railway Company, that is to say (here follows a list of names), being the persons who signed the guarantee of the 24th of October, 1845, and who have been settled on the list of contributories of the said company as contributories thereof, the sum of 2,000*l.* with interest thereon from the 24th of October, 1845, until payment, for money lent and advanced on the said 24th of October, 1845, by the directors of the Tring, Reading, and Basingstoke Railway Company, to and for the use of the Great Western Extension Atmospheric Railway Company, of which company the said several persons were then directors; and the said W. C. Wryghte, as such official manager as aforesaid, also claims of the following parties as contributories," &c. The second claim against the persons who had signed the guarantee of the 24th of November, 1845, was in similar terms. Notice had been duly served upon the contributories sought to be charged individually, and upon the amended claim coming on to be heard before the Master he disallowed the same, upon the ground that the Winding-up Acts did not give him jurisdiction in respect of claims made against individuals. From this decision an appeal was presented by Mr. Wryghte to the Lords Justices, who heard it, with other motions, for the Vice-Chancellor Parker.

Daniell and Roxburgh, in support of the appeal, said that the claim was originally made against the company, but on the authority of Lloyd's case, 1 Sim. 248, N. S. and Carrick's case, Id. 505, it was amended and brought in against the individuals who signed the guarantees. [Lord Justice Knight Bruce.—You disclaim to bind the whole company. What authority is there for saying that such a proceeding is within the scope of these Acts of Parliament? How can any one be admitted to claim as a creditor when his claim is not made against the whole company? If you bring before us a claim upon the whole company, evidenced by the act of its agent, of course we shall attend to it? This is a very different proceeding. Lord Justice Lord Cranworth.—All that I decided in Lloyd's case, and Carrick's case, was this,—that where an attempt is made to prove against the whole body of contributories a debt which has been contracted by some of them, it was necessary, before the debt could be admitted, to shew that it had been authorised to be contracted, either expressly or impliedly by the whole body. I have never decided that under a winding-up order a debt or claim could be proved against some only out of the body of contributories, unless the debt had been authorised so as to bind the whole.] In this case, however, the money was expended for the purposes of the company, to whose directors it was advanced and lent, and the debt, although due from individual contributories, is within the operation of the Winding-up Acts. They also cited Upfill's case, 1 Sim. N.S. 391; 15 Jur. 481.

Selwyn, for the official manager of the Great Western Extension Atmospheric Railway Company and Wickens, for some of the contributories sought to be charged, were not called upon by the Court.

Lord Justice KNIGHT BRUCE.—The company, or association in this case directed to be wound up, is the Great Western Extension Atmospheric Railway Company. It seems, the other company now claim, or at one time supposed themselves, to be creditors of the company to be wound up. They may or not have been so; or, being so, the question is not before us. The question raised before us is, whether under the order which I have mentioned, the Master could take cognizance of a demand not alleged to be due from the company, but from some, and only some, of the persons members of it. My opinion is, that the Master has no jurisdiction to enter into such a question. It has been said to be convenient and just that it should be so, inasmuch as, in this particular instance, the money was applied for the purposes of the company. That circumstance can make no difference in the principle, or in the rights of the persons cognisant of the transaction; and concerning a debt of the company, the purpose for which it is applied is absolutely immaterial. If such a demand is to be admitted, the private debts of every individual contributory might be brought in under the order.

Lord Justice Lord CRANWORTH.—I regret if any thing which I may have said extrajudicially in Lloyd's case should have led to the construction which has been put upon it. In that case, if I remember rightly, the Master declined to admit a claim as a debt, unless it were shewn that the company or some of the contributories were liable to it; but he admitted it as a claim. An application was made to me when Vice-Chancellor to reverse what had been done by the Master, and to adopt the claim as a debt. I refused, and at the same time expressed a doubt whether the Master had not gone too far in admitting it as a claim. I thought that, before admitting either a claim or a debt, it was necessary to shew not only that there was a creditor, but also that there was a debtor; and, what is perhaps more material, to go and shew that the debtor was a debtor whose debts were to be wound up under the order. The language attributed to me by the report of the case, seems to have led to the inference that I also meant to say that the Master might adopt a claim against individuals forming part only of the company, if they alone were the parties liable. If the language of the report bears that construction, it is to be regretted, that what was meant, has been couched in language so inaccurate. All I intended to decide or say was, that the claim should not be admitted as a proof, and that I doubted whether it ought to be admitted as a claim until it had been shewn that the parties sought to be charged were the parties liable to the demand.

The order made was, that the appeal motion should be dismissed with costs, but without prejudice to any application which might be made to the Master to prove the debt against the company or association to be wound up.

ROLLS COURT.

Nov. 25, 1851, and Jan. 13.

LAWRIE v. CLUTTON.

Legacy duty—Investment in joint names of husband and wife—Stats. 36 Geo. 3, c. 52; 45 Geo. 3, c. 28—Transfer wife of stock in satisfaction of legacies, &c. husband.

A testator gave several specific legacies, and devised real estates to his wife, and also devised and bequeathed real and personal estate to trustees, in trust for his wife, for life, with remainder over. He also gave a legacy of 10,000l. for the benefit of his daughter and her children. At his death large sums of stock stood invested in the joint names of the testator and his wife, but his estate being insufficient to pay certain specialty debts and the legacies, the wife, who survived and was his executrix, transferred to the trustees of the wife a large portion of the stock standing in the joint names, for the payment of the debts, &c. including the 10,000l. bequeathed to the daughter. The Stamp-office having made a claim for legacy duty on the 10,000l.:

Held, that none was payable under the 36 Geo. 3, c. 52, and 45 Geo. 3, c. 58.

This was a petition by defendants, Owen Clutton and John Clutton, the legal personal representatives of the late Samuel Webb, respecting a claim for legacy duty set up by the crown. The petition came on for hearing with the causes which were heard for further directions, at the close of the sittings after Trinity Term last, and it was then ordered that the sum of 300l. should be paid to the executors in the mean time to answer any liability of the fund in question in the cause, to legacy duty; and the petition was ordered to stand over till the crown was prepared to argue the question of liability. The petition now came on to be heard. It appeared that Samuel Webb by his will, bearing date the 6th of January, 1827, after directing his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses to be paid out of the residue of his personal estate bequeathed to his wife Elizabeth Webb, as her own absolute property, the specific chattels, moneys, and effects therein mentioned; and he thereby also devised certain freehold and copyhold hereditaments therein mentioned to his wife, her heirs and assigns, and devised and bequeathed several freehold, copyhold, and leasehold hereditaments therein mentioned, to or in trust for his said wife, during her life, with divers remainders over to the several ... therein named, and the testator also bequeathed to Kenrick Collett and John Clutton the several sums of Three per Cent. Consolidated Annuities, and Three per Cent. Reduced Annuities, and Four per Cent. Annuities, in his said will mentioned, in trust, that his said wife might be entitled to the interest and moneys thereof for life, and subject to the said life interest, the testator gave the said several sums to the several persons and in the respective amounts in the said will mentioned. The Three per Cent. Consolidated Annuities included a sum of 10,000l. like annuities, which the testator directed should be held in trust that his daughter, Mary Ann Collett, might be entitled to the dividends and income thereof for her life for her separate use, without power of anticipation, and subject thereto in trust for the issue of the said Mary Ann Collett as therein mentioned, with a direction that in default of issue (an event which did not happen) the said sum of 10,000l. Consols should fall into his residuary estate. And as to the residue of his real and personal estate, the testator devised, appointed, and disposed of the same unto and to the use of his said wife, her heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, as her own absolute property and he declared that the provisions thereby made for her were meant to be in bar and satisfaction of dower, free bench, and thirds, and all other claims and demands she might have against his real or personal estate; and he declared that all government or public stocks, funds, or securities which, at his decease, should be standing in the joint names of himself and his said wife should, for the purpose of answering the legacies thereby given, be considered as his property and thereby made liable to the same; and the testator declared that neither of the sums in stock thereinbefore given (with the exception of 5,010l. Four per Cent. Annuities) should be considered a specific legacy; and that with the several legacies of stock thereby given, he intended to give the dividends and income which would become due thereon from and after his decease, and he appointed his wife Elizabeth the sole executrix of his will. The testator made several codicils not affecting the trusts of the 10,000l. Consols, and he died on the 8th of February, 1835, and on the 4th of March, 1835, his widow proved his will. It appeared that the testator's personal property at the time of his death was of less value and amount than the amount of the debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, and that Mrs. Webb paid or provided for payment of the same. Mrs. Webb, on the death of her husband, entered into possession or receipt of the rents and profits of the leasehold and real estates devised to or in trust for her for her life, and remained in such possession or receipt up to the time of her death; she also entered into possession or receipt of the rents and profits of the freehold and copyhold estates devised to her absolutely as aforesaid, and treated such estates as her own property, and she retained possession of such parts of the personal estate of the said testator other than leasehold estates as were not sold by her for the purpose of in part discharging the said debts, funeral and testamentary expenses. It appeared also that at the death of the said testator there was standing in the joint names of himself and his said wife certain sums of Bank Annuities to an amount exceeding the amount of the legacies given by his said will.

By an indenture, bearing date the 16th of March, 1835, and made between Elizabeth Webb, the widow of one part, and Kenrick Collett and John Clutton, of the other part, after reciting the said will of the said testator Samuel Webb, and a certain indenture of the 23rd April, 1831, therein mentioned, and the said five codicils, and reciting certain bonds, &c. for various sums of money which had been given by the said testator to divers persons, being part of the said debts, and that the said Elizabeth Webb had, since the death of the testator, discharged out of his personal estate, his then present ascertained debts (except the moneys secured by the said covenants and bonds respectively) and all the funeral and testamentary expenses, and had also paid certain pecuniary legacies, and legacies of stock, and specified legacies respectively bequeathed by the said testator, but had paid none of the legacies bequeathed to the said Kenrick Collett and John Clutton, upon the several trusts therein-before recited, but that the pecuniary legacies thereinbefore referred to had been satisfied by her, and the whole personal estate of the said testator, remaining in the hands of the said Elizabeth Webb as such executrix as aforesaid, and not specifically bequeathed by him, was wholly insufficient for discharging the said unsatisfied legacies and the moneys secured by the said covenants and bonds, and that the funds invested in the joint names of herself and her husband were so invested without any express trust declared, and now were her own absolute property, and that to effectuate the unsatisfied purposes of the testator, she had agreed to transfer to Collett and Clutton the stocks thereinbefore covenanted to be transferred, and on the trusts thereinafter declared. It was witnessed that the said Elizabeth Webb did for herself, &c. covenant to transfer to Collett and Clutton, and the survivor, &c. the sums of 36,700l. Three per Cent. Consols, and 10,500l. Three per Cent. Reduced Annuities, to be held by them on the trusts of the will and codicil of the said testator. The said sums of stock were accordingly so transferred; and after the other purposes were satisfied, there remained a larger sum than 10,000l. Three per Cent. Consols, which Collett and Clutton retained to meet the 10,000l. Consols intended for Mary Ann Collett. Elizabeth Webb died on the 24th of February, 1836, having made her will, bearing date the 8th of December, 1835, and appointed Kenrick Collett and John Clutton her executors, who duly proved the will. John Clutton, who was the surviving executor, died on the 14th of April, 1841, having by his will appointed Owen Clutton and John Clutton and another person, since deceased, his executors, who proved the will, and thereby became the legal personal representatives of Elizabeth Webb, as well as of Samuel Webb. The question now was, whether the 10,000l. given by the will of the testator, and which was made good by Mrs. Webb, under the provisions of the deed of the 16th of March, 1835, was or not subject to legacy duty. For the purpose of the argument, the Attorney-General and the parties interested in the estate had agreed to admit as true the statements in the petition and in the deed of 1835, and the Attorney-General declined to take a case for the opinion of the Court of Ex.

Walpole for the petitioners.

The Solicitor-General and James, on behalf of the Crown, contended that the claim for legacy duty made by the commissioners was made against the legatee in respect of the money paid on account of the legacy, and not against the donor of the legacy, and, of course, the legatee's estate was chargeable. If an estate was devised subject to a legacy, payment of the duty would not be avoided merely because the parties did not want the land sold. The real question was, whether or not there was a charge?

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—This was a petition presented by the defendants, who are now the legal personal representatives of a lady of the name of Elizabeth Webb, and her deceased husband, Samuel Webb, praying in effect the opinion of the Court upon the question whether legacy duty is or not payable in respect of the sum of 10,000l. Consols mentioned in the will of Samuel Webb, and for the consequential directions in case the Court shall be of opinion that such duty is payable. The case is singular, and the point raised, so far as I am aware, is a new one, and it arises thus. [Here his Honour stated the facts.] The question depends solely upon whether the words of the Acts of Parliament are sufficient to meet and include this case. The statutes upon which alone any question can arise are the 36 Geo. 3, c. 52, and 45 Geo. 3, c. 28. I may state here that a question might have arisen upon the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 76, but this will was previous to that time. There is also a later statute affecting those questions. I shall first consider whether it is affected by the 36 Geo. 3, c. 52, and if not, then whether it is liable to a duty, as being a charge upon land, under the provisions of 45 Geo. 3, c. 28. The words of the statute of 36 Geo. 3, s. 7, are—"Any gift by any will which shall, by virtue of such will, have effect be satisfied out of the personal estate of the testator, or out of any personal estate which he shall have power to dispose of, shall be deemed a legacy." It is clear from this that nothing is to be deemed a legacy unless it be a gift satisfied out of the personal estate of the testator, or out of some personal estate which he had power to dispose of. I am of opinion that the words of the statute do not include this property. It would be a manifest straining of the words to cause them to include property which, in fact, is not, and never was, the property of the testator. The consequence also which would necessarily follow from a contrary decision would be absurd. Suppose a testator having 10,000*l.* in the Funds to bequeath it to A. and at the same time to bequeath to B. a sum of 5,000*l.* standing in the name of A.; as A. gains 5,000*l.* on the whole by the effect of the will, it is probable that he might give effect to it, and elect to take the 10,000*l.* and give the 5,000*l.* to B. But it would be absurd on that account to hold that, under these words of the statute, duty must be paid exactly in the same manner as if the testator had been possessed of 15,000*l.* and had given 10,000*l.* out of the 15,000*l.* to A. and the remaining 5,000*l.* to B.; and yet it is obvious that it must, if good at all, under the words of the statute, be carried to that extent, because it is not in the nature of a charge that the provision of the statute operates at all, but, if sufficient to include the case, it must be because it is a gift by the testator, to be satisfied out of some personal estate which he had the power of disposing of. I am of opinion that these words in the statute apply to funds over which the testator had a power of appointment, but that they cannot be extended to [illegible], which belong to a stranger, and which the testator might induce that stranger to dispose of, as the condition upon which he should be entitled to take another legacy given to him by the testator's will. The argument has not been carried to this extent on the part of the Crown, and I have no hesitation in coming to this conclusion, that the mere fact of electing to take under the will does not make this property, which neither belonged to the testator, nor was property over which he had the power of disposition, subject to any charge for legacy duty under the first statute. There is, however, more difficulty in the second branch of the question, and it was on this account principally that I reserved my judgment. The 45 Geo. 3, c. 28, makes legacies charged upon land liable to the payment of legacy duty. The words of the four sections which apply to the question, are as follows. It enacts, nearly in the words of the [illegible], or 36 Geo. 3, c. 52, "that every gift which by virtue of any will or testament in after the passing of the Act, shall have effect, or be satisfied out of the personal estate or the person so dying, or out of any personal estate which he shall have power to dispose of" (then come the new words), "or which shall have been charged upon or made payable out of any real estate, or directed to be satisfied out of any moneys to arise by the sale of any real estate of the person so dying, shall be deemed to be a legacy." This now applies exclusively to real estate, and, therefore, it is not necessary to consider the various instances which were suggested at the bar of a specific charge created by the operation of the rules of equity clearly. It is a pecuniary legacy, such as where a testator [illegible] 1,000*l.* to A. and leaves to B. a picture, the property of A. because, as there is no question about the real estate in any of these cases, if any duty is payable it must be under the 36 Geo. 3, c. 52. But the question raised under the 45 Geo. 3, c. 28, is that it not merely embraces all cases of legacies charged upon the real estate directly and expressly, but all cases where by operation of the rules of equity a legacy becomes payable out of real estate. Now, if a testator shall devise his real estate to A. and by the same will dispose of 1,000*l.* belonging to A. in favour of B. whatever may be the course of conduct pursued by A., B. would in any event take an interest in the real estate of the testator to the extent of 1,000*l.* If A. elected to take under the will, he would take the estate charged with the 1,000*l.* in favour of B.; and if A. elected to reject the will, the heir-at-law of the testator would in like manner take the estate, but would do so burthened with the payment of the 1,000*l.* in favour of B. And if both A. and the heir-at-law repudiated the real estate of the testator, B. would himself take it as if he had been the original devisee thereof. It is therefore contended on the part of the Crown, that in any event B. would take a bequest of the 1,000*l.* charged on the real estate of the testator; and that if the Court were to hold otherwise the effect would be, that instead of directly charging legacies on the real estate, the testator might produce exactly the same result, and escape the payment of the legacy duty by devising the real estate, and then dispose of the property of the devisee of the real estate to the extent of the legacy intended to be charged upon the land devised. It is certainly extremely difficult to discover any distinction that is not merely nominal between any one of the four following cases which were suggested in the argument at the bar, viz. a devise of land to A. charged with 1,000*l.* Three per Cent. Consols to B.; a devise of land to A. on condition that A. shall transfer the 1,000*l.* Consols to B.; a devise of land to A. on condition that A. out of the Consols standing in his own name, shall transfer 1,000*l.* to B.; or, lastly, a devise of lands to A. and a direct bequest to B. of 1,000*l.* Consols standing in the name of A; and it was argued with great force, that as in the three first cases there would be a clear legacy to B. charged upon the estate devised to A. within the words of the statute, and as the legal effect of the remaining mode of effecting the charge is the same, and that they will all take effect by means of the doctrine prevailing in courts of equity, the consequence with regard to legacy duty must also be the same. It would not, in my opinion, be any answer to this, when it is suggested that there would be considerable difficulty in working out such a principle, if that observation is correct. In the present case it is admitted that the value of the land devised is below 10,000*l.* the amount of the legacy. The duty, if I adopted the principle in this case, would be charged upon the whole value of the estate, whatever that might be, provided it did not exceed the 10,000*l.*, and it is argued that, although in such case this difficulty might be surmounted, still, if the testator devised land to A. and bequeathed to B. a valuable picture, for instance, the property of A. and that A. repudiated the devise, and elected to retain his own property, it would be impossible to determine with precision what sum was to be charged on the estate. It is true that the value of the picture may [illegible] be impossible to be ascertained without actual sale, or even that the saleable value [illegible] be a small portion of its real value both to A. and B. which may consist in a pretium affectionis. But the statute only applies to cases where the gift is charged on real estate; and I have not been referred to, nor am I myself aware of any case that decides that the estate would descend [illegible] the [illegible] law charged with the pecuniary bequest [illegible] of a sp[illegible] bequest to the ex[illegible] [illegible] the specific legacy [illegible] of the [illegible] then would not be [illegible] specific legacy [illegible] it, as a sum [illegible] the testator, which [illegible] specifically bequeathed [illegible] the purpose of [illegible] or of legacy [illegible], therefore, that the will of the testator [illegible] the 10,000*l.* a charge upon his real [illegible] I should not have felt much hesitation in deciding that legacy duty must be paid upon it. But upon the preliminary question which arises on the words of the [illegible] of the statute, in other words, whether the 10,000*l.* is a gift by the will of the testator which has been charged upon or made payable out of any real estate of the testator, I have, on the materials before me, come to a conclusion adverse to the claim of the Attorney-General. It does not [illegible], upon the facts before me, that the testator [illegible] any stock or property [illegible] the property of his wife, [illegible] real estate. The [illegible] will, as stated in [illegible] to this effect. The testator bequeathed [illegible] his daughter and her issue 10,000*l.* Consols, generally, as if he himself had been possessed of [illegible] of that nature, or had possessed personal property sufficient to purchase such an amount. But it is not a specific bequest of any existing or particular sum of Consols, or of any portion of such specified Consols standing either in his own name or in the name of himself and his wife. If he had expressly disposed of 10,000*l.* Consols belonging to his wife in favour of his daughter, she would have had a charge on the land devised to the extent of that legacy. But if, as appears to be the case, he has simply bequeathed a legacy of 10,000*l.* Consols to his daughter and her issue, then, in my opinion, no question of election arises upon the will, but that the widow might have kept the real estate, and have wholly disregarded the bequest of the stock. If a testator, however, having no stock of any description, devises land to A. and 10,000*l.* Consols to B. no obligation lies on A. to make good the bequest to B. but the bequest simply fails because the testator either has no stock, or having some when he made his will, has disposed of it since, or if it is not a specific bequest, but a pecuniary bequest of the value of so much stock, it fails from the deficiency of his personal estate. The latter is the case here. This is not a specific bequest of so much stock, the property of the wife, but a bequest to the value of 10,000*l.* Consols, which fails because the personal estate is deficient; there is nothing in the will, as here stated, that points specifically to the stock, which became the property of the wife on surviving her husband, and in this respect the case resembles the case of Dymmer v. Pitcher, 5 Sim. 35; 2 My. & Keen, 262; but unless that had been done by the testator the widow could not have been put to her election, nor could any question of charge have been maintained. I am, therefore, of opinion that this case does not fall within the words of the 45 Geo. 3, c. 28, and that no duty is payable on the legacy of 10,000*l.* or on so much of it as may be equal in value to the value of the real estate. I have been in some degree embarrassed from not having the will before me; but I have assumed that the petition states what are the words of the will, that in fact they could not amount to a specific bequest of the stock, which was standing in the name of the widow, and having no doubt upon that, my judgment proceeds upon that ground.

VICE-CHANCELLOR TURNER'S COURT.

Reported by J. HENRY COOKE, Esq. Barrister-at-Law.

July 29 and August 3.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL AND THE SHEFFIELD UNITED GAS-LIGHT COMPANY v. THE SHEFFIELD GAS CONSUMERS' COMPANY.

Injunction—Public company—Information—Bill—Nuisance—Laches.

A gas-light company was empowered by Act of Parliament to supply the town of S. with gas, and for the purposes of their business, to take up the pavement of the streets, and they were bound to restore the pavement in a certain manner, and in a specified time. A new gas-light company was projected late in 1851 (of this the old company had full notice), and early in 1852 was completely registered under the Joint Stock Companies Acts. The old company in April, filed a bill for an injunction, but the Court being of opinion that the matter was of a public nature, refused to interfere. The company thereupon, dismissed their bill, and having obtained the sanction of the Attorney-General, they filed an information and bill, and then moved for an injunction to restrain the new company from taking up the pavement, and obstructing the public use of the streets, or damaging the pipes belonging to the old company. The Court, although of opinion, without deciding that the breaking up the streets was a nuisance, considered it only of a temporary nature, and one in which the Court ought not to interfere, and being of opinion that, as the company knew so early as the autumn of 1851 of the intention of the new company, and did not take any steps to interfere until April, 1852, there had been such acquiescence that the parties must be left to their legal remedies, refused the injunction.

This case came on upon a motion to restrain the defendants from breaking up the streets of Sheffield and from laying down any gas mains, pipes, or works, in or under the streets and highways in the borough of Sheffield, and from breaking up, or disturbing for that purpose, any road or highway, and from doing any other act whereby the passage of her Majesty's subjects along such highways, or any of them, might be obstructed or rendered less safe or convenient, or whereby the gas-mains or pipes, or other works of the plaintiffs, might be interfered with or damaged. The application was made upon an information and bill; the information being at the relation of a Mr. Unwin, who was stated to be in some way connected with the company; the bill itself being filed by the United Gas Light Company. The nature of the case made by the plaintiffs was, that there were formerly two gas companies in Sheffield, each company being incorporated under an Act of Parliament, and each Act containing a power to break up pavements, with special provisions for compensating damages caused by that proceeding. The Act of the second company provided for the pavements not being broken up, except upon notice to the first company. There was also a water company in the town of Sheffield, whose Act contained similar provisions respecting the breaking up of pavements, and compensating for damages caused by it. In 1841 an Act of Parliament was passed, by which the two gas companies of Sheffield were united. The united company were the plaintiffs in the present suit. In addition to the special statutes relating to the two gas companies, there was a general Act applicable to all gas companies, containing Parliamentary powers; and this Act contained special clauses as to breaking up, repairing, and restoring the pavements. In the autumn of 1851 the defendants' company was projected. Soon afterwards, a clerk of the two united companies stated publicly that the Highway Board had no authority to permit the defendants to break up the pavement. The defendants then published a handbill, in which they insisted that the Highway Board had such authority. In Nov. 1851, the united company published a counter handbill, stating that the defendants, if they proceeded to break up the pavements in Sheffield, would be liable to indictment, and to the interference of this Court by injunction. On the 10th of Feb. last the company became completely registered. On the 6th of April the directors of the defendant's company made a report, by which they stated that they had authority from the parish boards to break up the pavements, and that the surveyors of highways were favourable to the objects of the company.

In this state of circumstances, on the 17th of April last, a bill was filed by the plaintiffs against the defendants for an injunction similar to that which was asked by the present information and bill. That injunction was refused on the 24th of May. In June the plaintiffs gave notice to the surveyors of highways not to sanction the breaking up of the pavements. Of the several boards and surveyors of highways, some returned answers to the notice, and others returned none. The answers which were returned not being deemed very satisfactory to the plaintiffs, they, on the 6th of July filed the present information and bill. The case raised by these was this:—That the defendants had no legal authority to break up the pavements; that proceeding on their part would be attended with great injury to the highways from the laying down of the pipes, and from the continually recurring necessity of taking up pavements for the purpose of supplying any defects whicl there might be in the veins and pipes, and which might be laid down by the company. The information, therefore, stated a case of public injury continually recurring. The case made by the bill was one of damage to the plaintiffs, arising from the injury to their pipes, which had already been laid down in the streets of Sheffield.

Daniel and Terrell, for the defendants, took a preliminary objection to the case being heard, on the ground that the present case, so far as it consisted of a bill complaining of the invasion of a private right, had been already decided in the former suit, which the plaintiffs had thought fit to dismiss; and, further, that so far as the public was concerned, the preventive remedy, if there was one, was not by suit in this court, but under the Highway Acts; or, if by a suit, one instituted by the plaintiffs on behalf of themselves and the other ratepayers, and not by information with the sanction of the Attorney-General,—a sanction no one knew how obtained. In fact, the suit was nothing but the revival of the old suit,—a quarrel of the old stamp revived,—under the sanction of the Attorney-General, and ought, therefore, to be at once dismissed, and dismissed with costs.

His HONOUR having decided that there was a sufficient locus standi for the plaintiffs in court, determined that the motion should proceed.

Sir W. P. Wood and Amphlett for the motion.

Daniel and Terrell for the defendants.

Sir W. P. Wood was heard in reply.

The following cases, among others, were cited; but the principal one relied upon on the part of the plaintiffs was the Attorney-General v. Johnson, 2 Wils. 87. Mayor of London v. Doughty, 5 Ves. 129; The Attorney-General v. Nicholl, 16 Ves. 338; The Attorney-General v. Cleaver, 18 Ves. 211; and Crowder v. Tinkler, 19 Ves. 617.

Tuesday, Aug. 3.—The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I reserved my judgment in this case, on the motion made for the injunction, considering that the question was one of considerable importance, and not altogether free from difficulty. The first fact urged on the part of the defendants was a formal objection taken by them to the motion. It was said that there had been a previous decision; that the plaintiffs could not maintain their case; that as the United Gas Company had failed in the suit, and now were proceeding by information and bill, notwithstanding the decision against them, the Court ought not to entertain the motion. I think the plaintiffs had sufficient interest to enable them to join in the suit, although probably it would have been more proper for them to have sued on behalf of themselves and the other ratepayers. I could not uphold this, which was raised in the first instance. Another objection, not depending upon the merits of the case, was also made on the part of the defendants. It was said that this was not a bonâ fide information by the Attorney-General, but the case must be looked on as a proceeding by the plaintiff, both as to the information and as to the bill. I feel myself bound to consider, and I did consider, that the Attorney-General would not lend himself to the private views and interests of parties. Therefore, as to the information, I must consider it as a bonâ fide proceeding by the Attorney-General, in his public capacity. The case must, therefore, be decided upon its merits. Before, however, referring to the facts of the case, it may be as well to make some observations as to the authorities. That the Court has power to interfere in cases of this nature I have no doubt whatever. I cannot permit myself to doubt that the Court may, if it has proper cause for its interference, interpose its authority by injunction, whether there may or may not be a case to try at law. There has been no time at which the power of the Court has not been capable of being, and has not been, called in aid for the protection of property and of right, whether public or private. The law gives to the subjects of the country some remedies, and the remedies which the law gives would, in many cases, be insufficient, if the Court had no preventive jurisdiction, unless the aid of the Court might be invoked, and it had at all times been so, to supply the legal remedy. It would be lamentable for the Queen's subjects if there did not exist the power of interposing by injunction, which is one of the most useful powers the Court possesses when exercised as it ought to be with reasonable discretion. But, though the power to interfere in certain cases is undoubted, the rules by which its interference is to be governed are not so clearly laid down. The subject was much considered by Lord Langdale, in a case of Hines v. Taylor, 10 Beav. 78, in which he expressed his opinion as to the jurisdiction in these terms:—"I do not think the case new in principle, for I agree that if a work is going on, which, though not a nuisance in itself, must manifestly end in operations which, when carried into effect, will prevent that species of nuisance in respect of which this Court acts and gives relief, the Court will at once interfere. It is new in its circumstances in this respect, that, as far as I am aware, there is no instance in which there has not been some work commenced capable in its nature of being made the subject of a legal proceeding, except, perhaps, the case of Crowder v. Tinckler, 19 Ves. 617. In the other cases something had been begun upon which the Court might rely as a matter of fact, and which might at once be made the subject of trial. I have looked with some care to find instances to the contrary, but I have found none on which I could at all rely. The only one where it is distinctly stated by way of dictum, is the case of the ancient lights; and all the cases which have since occurred have been more or less connected with a trial to be had at law. I do not mean that a verdict must necessarily be first obtained; because when trials are directed to ascertain the right to relief, this Court will vary its order according to circumstances. In some cases this Court, impressed with the danger of letting the matter proceed, will stop it in the meanwhile; and in others it will not interfere with the works until the result of the trial is known. The Court, under different circumstances, will act differently. The principle on which it acts in these cases is clear. It has in itself a jurisdiction, not to determine what is or is not a nuisance, but to protect the legal right which persons have to avoid nuisances, in a way which courts of law cannot do, namely, by preventing it or the future; and when the Court sees that the nuisance is such that damages given at law, will not do justice to the party, it will interfere by administering its preventive process. It is said that if a trial cannot be had, in this case,—and yet it is clear and apparent that the act about to be done is such as must necessarily give the other party a right to redress and further protection,—this Court will interfere at once; and I certainly do not mean to say that this Court might not have jurisdiction to do so; but you must learn two things,—first, the impossibility of proceeding to trial at law; and, secondly, the certainty that mischief will ensue from the act proposed to be done, in order to induce the Court to interfere beforehand." This gives a very clear summary of Lord Langdale's view of the principles governing these cases, and in that view I concur entirely. I may add to the observations, that as I apprehend it is the duty of a Court of equity in a case of this kind, when called upon for its summary interposition, to have regard to the nature and extent of the injury of which complaint may be made, the time before the application is made to the Court, and, where the extent of the injury is not ascertainable, to the comparative mischief from granting or withholding interference. These are the principles by which this case must be decided. The facts upon which the question comes to be decided, although contained in voluminous affidavits, do not appear to me to admit of much dispute; so far as the interests of the public are concerned, and so far as the private interests of the plaintiffs extend, I see no reason, therefore, for altering the opinion which I have before given on the case. The more careful reading of the affidavits has confirmed the opinion which I have expressed, and I do not think it proper, therefore, to enter into that part of the case. So far as the public interests are concerned, I think the case stands thus,—that the defendants have no legal authority to break up the pavements, and that it is proved that considerable, if not continued recurring inconvenience will be caused by their being permitted to lay down their pipes. Whether or not this inconvenience would amount at law to a nuisance, is not for me to decide. I am rather disposed to think that it would. The question which I have to decide is whether the nuisance, if nuisance it be, would be so extensive and of such a nature as that the Court ought, under the circumstances of this case, to interfere, not merely to prevent it, but to prevent the question of nuisance or no nuisance being presented to a Court of Law for its decision, for that would be the effect of the injunction which is asked. I am of opinion that the Court would not be justified in going that length, and that the injunction ought not, therefore, to be granted. If it is a nuisance, of course it will be but temporary; and if it is a recurring nuisance, the recurrence will be but of a temporary nature. In fact, no case can be found, I believe, where the Court has interfered in which the public right is interfered with by that which is merely a temporary nuisance. Reliance has been placed upon the absence of the legal right of the defendants to do the act, but it is not in every case in which the act done is done without legal authority that this Court can be called upon to interfere. The original ground of its interference is irreparable injury. Its interference has of late years, I admit, been carried much farther. But if the Court is to be called upon to interfere in every case where a piece of pavement is taken up without authority, I know not where its interference is to stop. What nuisance or what trespass may not be brought within its jurisdiction? It is to be observed, too, that the Legislature has provided some remedy for such cases, for the Highway Act throws upon the party doing an injury the cost of repairing it, with a small penalty. I quite agree that although the remedy thus provided cannot oust the jurisdiction of the Court to interfere in a proper case, I think the existence of such a remedy ought not to be disregarded in determining whether the Court, in its discretion, ought or ought not to interfere. If this application had been made at a more early period I think I should have said it was right not to interfere, but whatever might have been done at an earlier period, I think lapse of time alone would be sufficient ground to justify me in declining to exercise the summary interference of the Court. The company was projected in the autumn of 1851, and the town of Sheffield had taken a warm interest in its proceedings, and had full notice of the company having been formed and of its contemplated improvements. Yet the company was permitted to go on without the interference of the Attorney-General up to the last moment, when it was about to lay down its pipes. Expenses must have been incurred. It is admitted that land has been purchased and contracts have been advertised for, and in all probability have been acted upon. Then, and not till then, does the Attorney-General interpose. Upon the effect of lapse of time I adopt most fully Lord Eldon's opinion in The Attorney-General v. Cleaver, and The Attorney-General v. Johnson, where I find his lordship saying, that as there has been considerable delay without applying to the Court for protection, the Court would not consider the party entitled to the extraordinary assistance of a Court of Equity, but would leave him to his legal remedy. The case of The Attorney-General v. Johnson has been much relied upon in support of the present motion; but it is to be observed, that was a case of permanent not of temporary mischief. Many of the reasons which were given in that case would apply to the question of the comparative injury likely to arise from granting or withholding the injunction. Upon all the grounds I have mentioned I must refuse the motion, but without costs. I desire to add, that nothing which I have said must be considered as in the least degree intimating that the Court would not, in every proper case, interfere most promptly to keep companies within proper limits. My opinion agrees most fully with that of Lord Cottenham, that the preventive powers of the Court have in no cases more usefully been exercised than by interfering with such bodies as the present.

Motion refused without costs.

VICE-CHANCELLOR PARKER'S COURT.

Reported by GEO. S. ALLNUTT, Esq. of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law.

March 11, 12, and 16.

EGREMONT v. LEE.

Will—Election—Set-off.

In 1810, T. C. after cancelling his will, wrote a memorandum addressed to his daughter, who was his only child, charging her, after his death, to divide his property among her three children, J., L., and E. The daughter, H. E. treating this memorandum as altogether inoperative, took out administration to T. C.'s estate, and she and her husband, J. E. entered into possession of the real and personal estate of T. C.; and in 1811, by a deed reciting that T. C. had died wholly intestate, and that H. E. and J. E. were desirous of fulfilling T. C.'s wishes expressed in the memorandum, T. C.'s real estate was settled upon certain trusts for the said H. E. and J. E. and their three children. H. E. died in 1827, and J. E. then took out administration de bonis non to T. C.'s estate. Upon the marriage of L. the daughter of H. E. to T. L. in 1829, L.'s interest under the deed of 1811 was conveyed to trustees for the benefit of herself and her children. After her marriage L. was allowed by her father J. E. 300*l. per annum. J. E. by his will, dated in* 1837, directed his debts to be paid, and after reciting his desire to carry into effect T. C.'s wishes, gave his real and personal estate among his children. In 1840 J. E. died, at which time T. L. was indebted to him. T. L. became bankrupt in 1813, but by a deed in 1845, T. H.'s interest in right of his wife to one-third of T. C.'s estate was vested in him. The memorandum before mentioned having been established as a will of personal property, administration with it annexed was, in 1845, granted to L. who, as such administratrix, and as beneficially entitled to one-third, claimed to be a creditor against J. E.'s estate in respect of T. C.'s personal estate received by him:

Held, that neither the deed of 1811, nor the will of J. E. raised a case of election against L. as the deed and will had referred only to T. C.'s real estate

Held also, that the 300l. per annum allowed to L. by J. E. must go in satisfaction of interest in her one-third share, and that T. L.'s debt must be set off against his right in L.'s share.

Thomas Crowther having made a will of his real and personal estate, dated the 21st of December, 1808, cancelled the same on the 1st of May, 1810, and wrote on the back of it a memorandum as follows:—"Me dear child Mrs. Hannah Egremont, you will see I have canseld my will, therefore you are ares-at-law, but I must charge to you to fulfil my will as under at your death. I will and leave to my granson John Egremont my estate in Northgate, Wakefield, or his children lawfully begotten, after that to divide my property equally amongst your three children, John, Louize, and Edward Egremont, or their children, lawfully begotten. At my death give Richard Henry Barker 50l. I promist him. I hope you will strictly fulfil the above from your affectionate father, THOMAS CROWTHER.

"Wakefield, 1st May, 1810."

Thomas Crowther died on the 10th of December, 1810, leaving his only child, Hannah Egremont, his heiress-at-law, and sole next of kin, him surviving, and on the 20th of April, 1811, she took out administration to his estate, as if he had died wholly intestate, and she and John Egremont, her husband, received nearly all his personal estate, and entered into possession of his real estates.

By indentures dated the 24th and 25th of May, 1811, after reciting that Thomas Crowther had died wholly intestate, having cancelled his will, but upon which he wrote a few lines, requesting Hannah Egremont to convey and settle his freehold and copyhold property according to the directions specified by the said endorsement; and that Hannah Egremont and her husband were desirous of complying with and fulfilling the request and intention of her late father. The said freehold and copyhold estates were conveyed and covenanted to be surrendered to C. Crowther and J. Schofield, and their heirs, upon trust, as to part for J. Egremont, the father, for life, remainder to H. Egremont for life, remainder to their said three children equally, as tenants in common in fee, with survivorship, in case either of them should die under twenty-one, and without issue; and if all of them should so die, upon trust for the appointees of Hannah Egremont; and in default for Hannah Egremont in fee. And as to another part, upon trust for such persons as John Egremont, the father, and Hannah, should jointly appoint; and in default upon similar trusts for their said children. And as to another part, in trust for John Egremont, the father, for life, remainder to the said Hannah Egremont for life, remainder to John Egremont, the son, in fee; and if he died under twenty-one, without issue, for E. Egremont, in fee, with a similar executory devise in case of his death under twenty-one, without issue, for Louisa Egremont, in fee; and if all of them so died, upon trust for the appointees of Hannah Egremont; and in default, for herself in fee. A fine was duly levied to the same uses, and the copyholds were surrendered to the trustees. John Egremont, the father, allowed 400l. a year to each of his sons, and 300l. a year to his said daughter Louisa, from the time of her marriage. Hannah Egremont died in October, 1827, and John Egremont, the father, thereupon took out administration de bonis non to Thomas Crowther, and also took out administration to his late wife. On the 8th of October, 1829, Louisa Egremont was married to Tottenham Lee, and indentures of settlement, dated the 7th and 8th of October, 1829, were made previously to such marriage; and thereby, after reciting the deeds of 1811, the one-third share in remainder to which Louisa was entitled in the said freehold estates under the deeds of 1811, was conveyed to Edward Egremont and Legendre Nicholas Starkie, in fee, for the purposes therein mentioned; and trusts were declared of a survivor, which had been made to the same trustees, of her one-third share of the copyhold premises, in favour of T. Lee and his wife and the children of the marriage. In 1836 John Egremont, renounced probate, John Egremont, the grandson, took out administration, with the will annexed, to his father's estate. By his will, dated the 11th of May, 1837, John Egremont, the father, directed his debts to be paid out of his personal estate, and if that should be insufficient out of his real estate, and recited that he had made considerable purchases of estates which were contiguous to and intermixed with the estates comprised in the settlement; and being desirous of making his children and grandchildren thereinafter named interested in the whole of his real estates in Reedney and Swinefleet, and personal property, as well certain estates comprised in his marriage settlement, as those subsequently purchased by him, and to carry into execution and effect, as far as might be, the desires of Mr. T. Crowther, his late father-in-law, deceased, he devised all his real estates in the county of York to Edward Egremont and Thos. M. Maude, their heirs and assigns, upon trust, as to part for Edward Egremont, in fee, subject to the payment of 5,000l. and interest due upon a bond entered into by the testator, in contemplation of Edward Egremont's marriage, and subject to the payment of 3,700l. with interest, at the rate of 4l. 10s. per cent. which interest he directed to be paid to the said Louisa Lee for her life, for her separate use, without power of anticipation; and, after her decease, the testator bequeathed the same sum of 3,700l. in favour of the children of Louisa Lee, as therein mentioned; and in case no child of the said Louisa Lee should attain a vested interest in the same sum of 3,700l then to such persons as Louisa Lee should, by deed or will, appoint; and, in default of such appointment, to E. Egremont And in case E. Egremont should die without leaving lawful issue, then the testator devised the said hereditaments (subject to the principal and interest due on the said before-mentioned bond), to the intent that Louisa Lee and her assigns might, during her life, receive an annuity of 225l. as therein mentioned. And, subject to such annuity, he devised the same hereditaments to Thomas Bailey and Joseph Bayldon Rayner, their executors, administrators, and assigns, for 500 years from the decease of Edward Egremont, upon certain trusts, for the benefit of her children; and, after the determination of the same term, and, in the meantime, subject thereto, to the use of John Egremont, his grandson, for his life, with remainder to trustees, to preserve contingent remainders, with remainder to the use of the first and other sons of his grandson successively in tail male, with remainder to the daughters of his said grandson in tail general, as tenant in common, with cross remainders between them in tail general, with remainder to the use of his said granddaughter, Harriet Frances, her heirs and assigns, for ever. And the testator gave and devised his estate in Swinefleet, called Dixon's Grounds, together with Sill Close, so purchased by him, to E. Egremont and Thos Maude, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, upon trust, to pay the rents thereof to the said Louisa Lee for her life, for her sole and separate use, and, after her decease, in trust for such of the children of Louisa Lee, in such shares and manner as she should appoint, and in default of appointment, in trust for all her children, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns absolutely; and in case there should be no child of Louisa Lee, then that the said last-mentioned premises should be upon the trusts thereinafter declared concerning the residue of his personal estate. And the testator gave and devised all the residue of his freehold estates in Yorkshire to the use and intent that Louisa Lee should receive thereout during her life an annuity of 166l. 10s. for her separate use without power of anticipation; and subject thereto he devised the same estates to Thos. Bailey and Joseph Bayldon Rayner, their executors, administrators, and assigns, for the term of two thousand years: upon the trusts thereinafter mentioned concerning the same, and (subject to the said term of two thousand years, and to the payment of a bond given by the said testator to the trustees of the settlement made on the marriage of his deceased son John) to the use of John Egremont, the grandson, for life, with remainder to trustees to preserve contingent remainders, with remainder to the use of the first and other sons of his said grandson successively in tail general, with remainder to the use of his said grandson's daughters equally as tenants in common in tail general, with cross remainders between them in tail general, with remainder to his said granddaughter, Harriet Frances, for her life, with remainder to trustees to preserve contingent remainders, with remainder to her first and other sons successively in tail general, with remainder to her daughters equally as tenants in common in tail general, with cross remainders between them in tail general, with remainder to E. Egremont for life, with remainder to trustees to preserve contingent remainders, with remainder to the first and other sons of E. Egremont successively in tail general,

Lee for her life, without impeachment of waste, with remainder to trustees to preserve contingent remainders, with remainder to her sons successively in tail general, with remainder to her daughters equally as tenants in common in tail general, with cross remainders between them in tail general, with remainder to testator's brother, Godfrey, his heirs and assigns for ever subject to the payment of 2,000l. to each of his the said testator's sisters, Elizabeth Gee and Sarah Richardson, their executors, administrators, or assigns, and the said testator by his said will declared that the trusts of the said term of 2,000 years were to raise 1,000l. and to pay the same with interest at 4l. 10s. per cent. from his decease to the said E. Egremont; and immediately after the decease of Louisa Lee to raise the further sum of 3,700l. which he bequeathed unto all and every or such one or more of the children of the said Louisa Lee in such shares and proportions, and in such manner and form, as the said Louisa Lee should appoint, and in default of such appointment to her children equally; but in case the said Louisa Lee should die without issue, then the said sum of 3,700l. should not be raised. And the said testator declared that E. Egremont, Louisa Lee, and his said grandchildren, should, upon demand, execute all such deeds and assurances as should be respectively advised by counsel for the purpose of carrying into force and effect the several devises and bequests therein by him made as aforesaid, and of annulling and making void the said settlement; and that if either of his said children, the said Edward Egremont and Louisa Lee, or his said grandchildren, should exercise any right or claim, or demand any title, interest, or property, under the said settlement, or should refuse to execute such deeds and assurances as aforesaid, then and from thenceforth every devise, bequest, interest, benefit, and advantage which they or any of them would otherwise have been entitled to, or might claim under or by virtue of that his will, should cease and be void; and after reciting that he had conveyed certain part of his real estates to his said son John, and after bequeathing certain specific legacies, the testator gave the residue of his personal estate to his executors upon trust to convert the same into money, and to pay thereout his funeral and testamentary expenses and debts, and to invest the residue in Government or real securities, one half thereof to be in trust for the issue of his said son John Egremont in like manner as thereinbefore declared concerning the hereditaments limited to the issue of his said son John, or as near thereto as the different natures of the property would admit of, and the other moiety to be in trust for the said E. Egremont; and the said testator thereby appointed the said E. Egremont and Thos. Mitchinson Maude executors of his said will. By a codicil dated the 12th of May, 1837, John Egremont the father declared that his grandson John should be considered in his minority until he should attain the age of twenty-five years; and by a second codicil, dated the 6th of April, 1838, after reciting that in case of the death of E. Egremont without issue, he had devised certain hereditaments, subject as therein mentioned, to the intent that Louisa Lee should receive an annuity of 225l. and that he had devised the residue of his freehold hereditaments, to the intent that his said daughter should receive an annuity of 166l. 10s. the testator thereby revoked the same gifts, and devised the said hereditaments to the intent that his trustees should receive the said annuities, and pay the same to Louisa Lee, for her sole and separate use, his intention being that no husband of Louisa Lee should have any power over the property devised or bequeathed to her; and further reciting that he had, after divers prior limitations, devised his residuary real estates to Louisa Lee, the said testator thereby revoked the same devise, and thereby devised the same unto his trustees, their heirs, and assigns, during the life of Louisa Lee, upon the same trusts as were declared respecting Dixon's Grounds and Sill Close, during her life. By a third codicil, dated the 18th day of July, 1839, the testator, after reciting that he had lately purchased certain hereditaments situate in the township of Alverthorpe, devised the said last-mentioned hereditaments, and all other hereditaments which he had purchased, or might thereafter purchase, or become entitled to, unto E. Egremont and Thomas Mitchinson Maude, their heirs and assigns, upon and for the same trusts, intents, and purposes as in and by his said will were expressed concerning the residue of his real estate thereby devised. John Egremont the father died in March, 1840, and his will and codicils were proved on the 13th of July, 1840, by the said E. Egremont. On the 2nd of December, 1841, Tottenham Lee was declared bankrupt. On the 1st of March, 1843, administration, with the said memorandum before mentioned annexed, to the estate of Thomas Crowther was granted to Louisa Lee. At the death of John Egremont, the father, Tottenham Lee, was indebted to him in a sum of 3,130l. secured by bond. The benefits given by the deeds of 1811, and by John Egremont's will to Mrs. Lee were considerably greater than those given by the memorandum of 1810, and the annuity of 300*l.* so allowed to Mrs. Lee by J. Egremont was more than the yearly interest of one-third of T. Crowther's personal estate. By a deed of arrangement between Tottenham Lee and his creditors, dated the 19th of February, 1845, all the personal estate to which T. Lee might be entitled under the memorandum of 1810, was vested in him, and his creditors disclaimed all interest therein. In March, 1843, John Egremont, the grandson, instituted a suit (Egremont v. Egremont), for the purpose of having the trusts of the said will and codicils of the said John Egremont, the father, carried into execution, under the direction of the Court, and by the decree made therein on the 22nd day of March, 1844, the usual accounts of the testator's estate were directed to be taken. Louisa Lee, as the administrator of Thomas Crowther, went in before the Master under that decree, and required payment out of the estate of John Egremont, the father, of the sum of 18,319*l.* 11s. 1d. alleged by her to be the amount of the personal estate of Thomas Crowther, but the claim was opposed by E. Egremont, who contended that she could not come in under this decree, but ought to file another bill to establish her claim. The Master having decided in favour of E. Egremont's view, Mrs. Lee, on the 27th November, 1845, by her next firiend, filed a bill on behalf of herself, and all other the creditors of John Egremont, her father, deceased, against Edward Egremont, Tottenham Lee, John Egremont, the grandson, and Harriet Frances Egremont, praying that an account might be taken of the personal estate and effects of Thomas Crowther, possessed or received by John Egremont, the father, and that what was due from him in respect thereof might be ascertained; and that an account might also be taken of what was due to Louisa Lee, in respect of the said allowance of 300*l.* per annum; and that it might be declared that what was due from John Egremont, the father, in respect of the personal estate of Thomas Crowther, together with interest thereon, was payable to Louisa Lee, as such administratrix, with the will of Thomas Crowther annexed as aforesaid; and that what was due in respect of the said allowance of 300*l.* per annum, together with interest thereon, was also payable to her; and that such sums were payable out of the estate of John Egremont, the father, deceased, in a due course of administration; and that the same might be decreed to be paid accordingly; and for the usual accounts and relief. This was the suit of Lee v. Egremont. Edward Egremont then, on the 14th of August, 1846, filed a bill against Tottenham Lee, and Louisa, his wife, and other parties, stating the above facts, and praying that the true construction of the memorandum or will of Thomas Crowther, of the 1st day of May, 1810, might be declared; and that the rights and interest of all parties beneficially entitled to the personal estate of Thomas Crowther, which remained after payment of his funeral and testamentary expenses and debts, might be ascertained and declared; and that in particular it might be declared that Thomas Crowther died wholly intestate as to the beneficial interest in his personal estate which remained after payment of his funeral and testamentary expenses and debts. Or, if the Court should be of opinion that the memorandum or will of Thomas Crowther, of the 1st day of May, 1810, applied to the beneficial interest in his personal estate, which remained after such payment as aforesaid, and contained a valid disposition thereof; then, that it might be declared that the benefits by the will and codicils of the said testator, John Egremont, the father, and by the indentures of the 24th and 25th of May, 1811, given to Louisa Lee and her issue, and the said allowance of 300*l.* per annum, to her were a satisfaction of all the claims and rights of the said Louisa Lee, under the memorandum or will of Thomas Crowther, and that Louisa Lee could not, nor could any person or persons claiming from, through, or under her be allowed to avail herself, himself, or themselves, of any claims or rights, of the said Louisa Lee, under the said memorandum or will, without first giving credit for all the benefits by the indentures of the 24th and 25th of May, 1811, and the will and codicils of John Egremont, the father, given to or intended for Louisa Lee and her issue, and for the said allowance, and that it might be declared that by having accepted the said allowance and the benefits by the indentures of the 24th and 25th of May, 1811, and the said will and codicils, Louisa Lee had elected to take those benefits, and that she and all persons claiming from, through, or under her were bound to give effect to the said will and codicils; but if Louisa Lee had not made her election, then that she and all persons claiming from, through, or under her were bound to make an election, and that in case Louisa Lee was beneficially entitled to any moneys whatsoever from the estate of John Egremont, the father, in respect of any of the matters aforesaid, then that it might be declared that the money so as aforesaid due from Tottenham Lee, her husband, to the estate of John Egremont, the father, should be set off against the moneys to which Louisa Lee was entitled as aforesaid from that estate, or must be considered and taken as payment or part payment thereof, as the case might be; and that in case anything should, under the circumstances therein stated and appearing, and notwithstanding such circumstances be found due to the estate of the said Thos. Crowther from the estate of the said John Egremont, the father, then that all proper directions might be given for raising and paying the same, having regard to the suits of Egremont v. Lee and Lee v. Egremont. This was the suit of Egremont v. Lee.

The Vice-Chancellor said that the case came on upon a bill of Lee v. Egremont, and a bill in the nature of a cross bill of Egremont v. Lee. The bill in Lee v. Egremont was a bill by the personal representative, who was the administrator with the will annexed, of Thomas Crowther against the representative of his deceased administrator, who had received, but had not duly accounted for and applied the assets of Thomas Crowther. Whatever Mrs. Lee, who sued in that character, might recover, there being no debts of Thomas Crowther, no legacies, and no purposes of administration to answer, was a clear and ascertained residue to be divided into thirds, one third of which belonged to Mrs. Lee, or to her husband in her right; and to claim that one-third of the personal estate of Thomas Crowther, as money in the hands of John Egremont, who was his administrator, was really the substance of the litigation in both of these suits. Mrs. Lee's right to that sum, supposing it not to be barred, accrued as an interest in possession upon the death of her mother in the year 1827, and therefore primâ facie, unless something could be found in the case to bar the claim, his Honour apprehended that a decree in the nature of a creditor's decree, in Lee v. Egremont, to the extent to which there might be a demand, was entitled as a matter of course. Now this claim was one that was brought forward after the lapse of upwards of thirty years after the death of both the parents, John Egremont and his wife, after settlements had been made, and after family arrangements had been completed and benefits bestowed, which the Court might have a conviction would not have been what they have been if the claim had been brought forward and known to exist at an earlier period. But, however, upon the principles of this Court, that furnished no equity for denying the claim if it were really found to exist; and therefore the claim must be examined upon legal principles with reference to the facts and circumstances of the case. In the first place, it was contended that the deed of 1811 raised a case of election precluding the children of Mrs. Egremont from claiming anything in respect of the personal estate of T. Crowther, if they took the benefits in the real estate conferred by that deed. Thos. Crowther had left an unattested paper, which had been now decided to apply legally to his personal estate, and which in terms also applied to his real estate; but which, of course, being unattested, was quite inoperative as to real estate. The deed of 1811 recited that Thos. Crowther being in his lifetime seised of or well entitled to certain real property described, departed this life wholly intestate, having some time previous to his decease annulled and cancelled a written document or instrument which purported to be his last will, but upon which he endorsed and wrote a few lines, requesting his only daughter and heiress-at-law, Hannah Egremont, to convey and settle his freehold and copyhold property according to the directions therein contained: it then, after reciting that Hannah Egremont was desirous of complying with and fulfilling the said request and intention, and it is witnessed that for effectuating as near as might be such intention and purpose as aforesaid, the settlement was made. This instrument obviously related exclusively to the real estate; it recited an intention appearing upon a certain document, which, though it was not legally operative, still, just as a request by word of mouth might be operative, was an intimation of Thos. Crowther's intention as to his real estate, and that intention this deed purported to effectuate. If it had contained a recital that Thos. Crowther had died intestate as to his personal estate, and that both Mr. and Mrs. Egremont being in possession of the real and personal estate, were therefore moved to make a voluntary settlement of the real estate, that might have given rise to a question whether parties claiming real estate under that will could dispute what the author of the settlement had asserted in the deed with respect to the personal estate; but it appeared that there was no such intention in that settlement. It recited that Thos. Crowther died wholly intestate, possessed of certain freehold property, which must mean intestacy as to real estate, and it was a settlement of real estate, and it would be mere speculation to consider what intentions, if any, John Egremont and his wife had in respect of the personal estate at the time they executed this instrument. It appeared, therefore, to his Honour that, notwithstanding the benefits of the real estate given to the children, this deed did not interfere with their right to the personal estate under T. Crowther's will, and that immediately after the execution of this instrument any of them might have made a claim to a share of the personal estate of Thos. Crowther. In 1827, Mrs. Egremont died, and Mrs. Lee married in 1829, and a settlement was then made; and if the deed of 1811 had raised a case of election, it was extremely likely that this settlement would have been an election by Mrs. Lee; but if the previous deed raised no case of election, this settlement made upon the marriage of course could be no election. The settlement referred to parts of the deed of 1811, and through the deed of 1811 to the memorandum signed by Thos. Crowther, which at that time was in the possession of Mrs. Lee. If either of the instruments had referred to that memorandum as an instrument affecting the personal estate, no doubt a question of importance would have arisen whether the parties were not bound to ascertain their interest in the personal estate by referring to that memorandum. And whether, on the ground of laches, they were not too late in bringing this claim; but as the deed of 1811 referred to the previous memorandum only, so far as real estate was concerned, and conveyed no intimation to any body reading it that the previous memorandum related to the personal estate, the case stood clear of any observation on the conduct of Mr. and Mrs. Lee in not having had the knowledge conveyed to them of that instrument, and in not having brought forward the present claim at an earlier period. The next part of the case was the question of election on the will of Mr. Egremont. Now the will of Mr. Egremont disposed of his real and personal estate in favour of his children and grandchildren, including Mrs. Lee and her children; and it recited that he had made considerable purchases of several estates, which lay contiguous to, and intermixed with, the estate comprised in the settlement, and being desirous of making his children and grandchildren thereinafter named interested in the whole of his real estates in Reedness and Swinefleet, and personal property as well the estates comprised in the settlement as those subsequently purchased by him in such manner as thereinafter mentioned, and to carry into execution and effect (as far as might be) the desires of Mr. Thos. Crowther, his late father-in-law, deceased; and then the testator, disposed of his real estate. The question was, what were the desires of Thos. Crowther, referred to in that recital? Beyond all doubt, if those desires were his wishes as to his personal estate contained in the instrument of 1810, the question of election would have arisen; but attending to it as closely as he could, his Honour saw nothing to lead him judicially to the conclusion that this will did refer to that instrument. He had already entirely executed the desires of Thos. Crowther as to his real estate. There was, therefore, nothing remaining to be done as to his real estate, and here he recited that, in order to carry into execution and effect the desires of Thomas Crowther, he devised real estate of his own. How could that refer to the desires of Thomas Crowther, expressed in respect of the personal estate of Thomas Crowther? The conclusion that his Honour came to upon the whole of the case was, that this testator, John Egremont, was entirely left unconscious up to the hour of his death that Thomas Crowther had ever expressed or entertained any wish or desire whatever with respect to the disposition of his personal estate. Therefore, it appeared to his Honour that it was quite impossible, without resorting to speculation, to find in this will an express intention to put the parties to their election. Then there was a proviso in the will which really only related to putting the parties who took interests under the marriage settlement upon the terms of confirming the will, as a condition for entitling themselves to the benefits which the will gave to them; and therefore, being under the conviction that, if at the time of the settlement of 1811, or the marriage settlement, or the will, John Egremont had known of this claim, he would have made a different disposition of his property from what he did. His Honour did not see how, with that conviction, he could put the parties claiming under the instrument to an election according to the understood principles of the Court. In this suit, therefore, of Lee v. Egremont, looked upon as a creditors' suit, the plaintiff was entitled to establish against the estate of John Egremont a certain amount of demand, and the question was how much? It had been already stated that the substance of the claim was Mrs. Lee's one-third of the clear residue of that part of her deceased grandfather's estate which was remaining in the hands of John Egremont. It appeared that John Egremont allowed to her for a considerable portion of her life after the marriage 300*l.* a year, and after that time, he made an advance to Tottenham Lee upon his bond. That was reduced. But all the time the amount of the allowances made by John Egremont to Mrs. Lee, or her husband, exceeded the interest of her share of the money belonging to Crowther's estate, which was in his hands. Although, therefore, John Egremont made that allowance to her, not being aware that she and her husband had a demand against him in respect of the one third of the estate in his hands, his Honour considered himself bound to look upon that yearly allowance as a payment made to her in satisfaction of any claim she might have in respect of interest on that sum, and it appeared to his Honour, therefore, that any claim for interest must be a claim that only commenced with the death of John Egremont, and there must be a declaration to that effect in the decree. The next question was the question of set-off, and on that question he entertained no doubt. The case made by Mr. and Mrs. Lee was, that John Egremont, in his lifetime, and before his death, had in his hands a considerable sum of money, which belonged to Mr. Lee, in right of his wife, and which in that right he might at any time have called upon Mr. Egremont to have satisfied in his lifetime. The claim was not brought forward until after the death of Mr. Egremont, and Mr Lee's bankruptcy; but if he had sued before his bankruptcy, it appeared to his Honour that, upon every principle of this Court, whatever was coming to him in respect of that claim must have been set off against the debt due from him to John Egremont. It was, therefore, a right of set-off existing at the time of the bankruptcy, and the set off clearly existed to this extent, that it must be subject to all the claims, whether by way of survivorship or by way of settlement of Mrs. Lee and her children. [illegible] had been referred to upon that subject. Cherry v. Boultbee did not decide the case, because in Cherry v. Boultbee the bankruptcy had occurred in the lifetime of the testator. It was put on this, that the demand from the bankrupt's estate against the testator was a legacy, not arising [illegible] the death of the testator, and that before that [illegible] the demand of the testator against the bankrupt had become merely a right of proof against his estate in the hands of the assignees. Without saying whether that case was to be supported or not, it was a totally different case from the present, where the right to receive and the right to pay were both in existence at the time of the bankruptcy of Lee, because the circumstance that administration was not taken out until after was a mere matter of form. It did not create the debt, nor did it advance the debt; it was only a step necessary to enable the parties to recover that debt which had been so ascertained to be a debt due from John Egremont to the estate of Crowther from the first. The case that had been referred to, Ex parte O'Ferrall, re Gordon, 1 Gl. & Jam. 347, clearly established that there was a right of set-off, subject to the equity of the wife. There was a case of Ranken v. Barnard, 5 Madd. 32, where it appeared the husband had survived the wife, and he, or rather his assignees, were claiming a legacy through the husband as administrator of his wife, and it was held, that that must be set off against a debt due from the husband's estate to the testator; and Mr. Wigram, in his argument, referred to what fell from Sir James Wigram in M'Mahon v. Burchell, 3 Hare, 97, but in 5 Hare, 325, Sir James Wigram complained of the report in 3 Hare, and said that he was misrepresented, and begged that it might be corrected. He said, that in his opinion there was a set-off against the husband in right of the wife, and an amount due to the husband, subject only to the equity of the wife and children. His Honour therefore considered that upon the principles of this Court he was bound to make a declaration to the effect, that, subject to the rights of Mrs. Lee and her children, the amount coming to her and her husband in her right from this estate was to be set off pro tanto against the debt due from Tottenham Lee to the testator, John Egremont. Whatever would be raised in respect of Mrs. Lee's share, must be carried to her separate account. The general costs of the two suits must be paid out of T. Crowther's estate, except so far as the costs in Lee v. Egremont had been increased by the special relief prayed in respect of the annuity of 300*l.* which must be paid by Mrs. Lee, and, except in Egremont v. Lee, the costs occasioned by the claim for election and satisfaction, which must be paid by the plaintiff in that suit.

VICE-CHANCELLOR KINDERSLEY'S COURT.

Reported by W. H. BENNET, Esq. of Lincoln's-inn, Barrister-at-Law.

Dec. 12 and 13, 1851, and Feb. 10, 1852.

PLOWDEN v. HYDE.

Mortgage—Equity of redemption—Effect of will on—After-purchased estates.

A testator, who had the equity of redemption in certain mortgaged hereditaments, made his will devising that estate, and any other which he had contracted to purchase, to trustees upon certain trusts for certain persons, one of whom was his heir-at-law. He subsequently took a reconveyance of the hereditaments in the usual form to exclude the dower of his wife, and with remainders over.

Held, that those hereditaments of which he had obtained the reconveyance did not pass by the devise in his will.

Held, that to put the heir to his election, the testator's intention to devise or dispose of such estate or interest must clearly appear by his will, and this will not disclosing such intention, the heir-at-law was not to be put to his election between the estates thus descended to him and a share of the produce of the estates directed to be sold, and to which he had become entitled.
